The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the House to the resolution (S. J. Res. 143) authorizing the Secretary of War to loan certain tents for use at the meeting of the Imperial Council of the Ancient Arabic Order of the Nobles of the Mystic Shrine to be held at Dallas, Tex., in May, 1913, having met, after full and free conference have agreed to recommend and do recommend to their respective Houses as follows:

That the Senate recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the House, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows:

Restore the matter proposed to be stricken out by the amendment; and in lines 3 and 4 of the amendment strike out the words "Confederate Veterans' Association" and in lieu thereof insert "United Confederate Veterans."

And the House agree to the same.

JAMES L. SLAYDEN,
J. T. WATKINS,
JULIUS KAHN,
Managers on the part of the House.
H. A. DU PONT,
F. E. WARREN,
JOS. F. JOHNSTON,
Managers on the part of the Senate.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the conference report.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask the gentleman what the provision is as agreed to in the conference report.

Mr. SLAYDEN. Mr. Speaker, the Senate receded and agreed to the House amendment restricting the loaning of tents hereafter to two organizations only—the Grand Army of the Republic and the United Confederate Veterans—and another amendment merely changes the title of the Confederate Veterans' Association to the one which they have, of United Confederate Veterans.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, the proposition in the Senate bill, as I recall it, was that no tents should be loaned after July, 1915.

Mr. SLAYDEN. Nineteen hundred and fourteen, I think.

Mr. MANN. Perhaps it was 1914. We struck that out.

Mr. SLAYDEN. Yes; the resolution is as it passed the House, with the exception of the other amendment referred to.

Mr. MANN. We struck the provision out entirely.

Mr. SLAYDEN. Yes; and I say the resolution is precisely as the House passed it, except that the words "Confederate Veterans' Association" are changed to "United Confederate Veterans."

Mr. MANN. We struck out the provision in reference to loaning tents hereafter. The conference has reinserted it. The House struck it out.

Mr. SLAYDEN. Yes; the gentleman is correct.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the conference report.

The conference report was agreed to.

AGRICULTURAL CREDIT SYSTEMS (H. DOC. NO. 1435).

Mr. MOSS of Indiana. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to have printed as a House document some notes on the agricultural credit systems abroad that have been prepared by the Southern Commercial Congress.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Indiana asks unanimous consent to have printed as a House document the paper to which he refers. Is there objection?

Mr. COX. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, how will they be distributed?

Mr. MOSS of Indiana. Just as other House documents are distributed.

Mr. MANN. In the usual number?

Mr. MOSS of Indiana. Yes.

Mr. COX. Will they go through the folding room or the document room?

Mr. MANN. The document room. The usual number is to be printed.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

PAIR CLERK.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the resolution which I send to the Clerk's desk and ask to have read.

The Clerk read as follows:

House resolution 872.

Resolved, That William Tyler Page is hereby appointed as successor to Joseph C. Weir, authorized and named in the resolution adopted by the House April 10, 1911, as special employee and pair clerk.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, this is one of the minority employees, and the law provides for the House appointing a successor.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the resolution?

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the resolution.

The resolution was agreed to.

BUST OF HON. JOSEPH G. CANNON.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the resolution which I send to the Clerk's desk and ask to have read.

The Clerk read as follows:

House resolution 873.

Whereas friends both in and out of Congress have presented to the Hon. JOSEPH G. CANNON a marble bust of himself, with the expressed hope that it be placed in the House Office Building; and

Whereas Mr. CANNON has offered to present such bust to the House of Representatives; and

Whereas Mr. CANNON has been for many years an honored Member of the House of Representatives and was for eight years the Speaker and originated the proposition for the House Office Building: Now therefore be it

Resolved by the House of Representatives, That the House Office Building Commission is hereby authorized to accept on behalf of the House of Representatives the marble bust of Hon. JOSEPH G. CANNON and place the same in a proper position in the House Office Building, and that the thanks of the House of Representatives be, and the same are hereby, tendered to Mr. CANNON for the gift of the said bust.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the resolution?

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the resolution.

The resolution was agreed to.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that I may address the House for 10 minutes.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois asks unanimous consent to address the House for 10 minutes. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, yesterday morning the Republican Members of the House held a caucus at which resolutions were adopted concerning several of the retiring Members on the Republican side who have been officers of the caucus and of the Republican side of the House, and I ask unanimous consent that the resolutions which were agreed to may be read by the Clerk.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois asks unanimous consent that the Clerk shall read the resolutions. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

The Clerk read as follows:

"Mr. BURKE of South Dakota offered the following resolution, which was unanimously adopted:

"'During a period of many years this Republican caucus has been fortunate in having as a presiding officer the gifted and genial gentleman from New Hampshire, the Hon. FRANK D. CURRIER.

"'He has ever presided in a manner most capable and just, and his counsel has always been of the utmost value in our deliberations: Therefore be it

"'Resolved by the Republicans of the House of Representatives in caucus assembled, That in his retirement from the public service as a Representative the Nation loses one of its ablest and most patriotic statesmen, and we, his colleagues, lose one of our dearest and truest friends.'"

[Applause.]

"Mr. MILLER, of Minnesota, offered the following resolution, which was unanimously adopted:

"'By his voluntary retirement from public service the Republican caucus is soon to lose its most efficient secretary, the Hon. N. E. KENDALL, of Iowa. In recent years the State of Iowa has been fortunate in the splendid men she has sent to Congress, but never more fortunate than in the person of Mr. KENDALL. During his four years' service here he has become one of the most influential Members of the House, and as a genial companion he has no superior. His work has ever been characterized by close fidelity to the public interest, by a broad-gauged patriotism, and a true grasp of American ideals. He probably embodies the younger statesmanship of to-day as well as any man living, and it is exceedingly to be regretted that the country is not to have the benefit of his continued service: Therefore be it

"'Resolved, That in his departure from our midst the House loses one of its most able and promising Members, our caucus a most capable secretary, and Congress one of its most beloved Members. That he carries with him our heartiest good will and sincere hope that he will in the future return as a Member of this House, to be welcomed by a host of friends.'"

[Applause.]

"Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania offered the following resolution, which was unanimously adopted:

"'Resolved, That the earnest and effective work of the Hon. JOHN W. DWIGHT, of New York, the Republican whip of the House, has earned the appreciation and thanks of this committee, and that while Mr. DWIGHT'S voluntary retirement from Congress is sincerely regretted, the best wishes of the committee are extended to him in every future undertaking.'"

[Applause.]

COMPILATION OF REVOLUTIONARY WAR RECORDS.

Mr. SMALL. Mr. Speaker, I move to suspend the rules and pass the bill S. 271, with committee amendments.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

An act (S. 271) to authorize the collection of the military and naval records of the Revolutionary War with a view to their publication.

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of War is hereby authorized and directed to collect or copy and classify, with a view to publication, the scattered military records of the Revolutionary War, including all troops acting under State authority, and the Secretary of the Navy is hereby authorized and directed to collect or copy and classify, with a view to publication, the scattered naval records of the Revolutionary War.

SEC. 2. That all such records in the possession or custody of any official of the United States shall be transferred, the military records to the War Department and the naval records to the Navy Department.

SEC. 3. That there is hereby appropriated for the purposes of this act, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, $25,000 for the War Department and $7,000 for the Navy Department: Provided, That the aforesaid sums of money shall be expended, respectively, under the direction of the Secretary of War and the Secretary of the Navy, and that they shall make to Congress each year detailed statements showing how the money herein appropriated has been expended and to whom: Provided further, That no part of the sum hereby appropriated shall be used in the purchase of any such records that may be discovered either in the hands of private owners or in public depositories.

The SPEAKER. Is a second demanded?

Mr. FOSTER. Mr. Speaker, I demand a second.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. MANN. Just what is the motion of the gentleman?

The SPEAKER. The motion is to suspend the rules and pass the bill with committee amendments. The Chair thinks the amendments ought to be read.

Mr. MANN. The reason of my parliamentary inquiry was because the Clerk read the bill, including the committee amendments, as it was to be modified by the committee amendments.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk states that he read the bill with amendments.

Mr. MANN. That is what I said, and that is the reason I made the inquiry whether the motion was to pass the bill with committee amendments.

The SPEAKER. That is the motion. The gentleman from Illinois demands a second.

Mr. SMALL. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that a second may be considered as ordered.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to a second being considered as ordered? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none. The gentleman from North Carolina has 20 minutes and the gentleman from Illinois has 20 minutes.

Mr. SMALL. Mr. Speaker, I can explain this bill very briefly to the House. Substantially it provides for the collection of the military and naval records of the Revolutionary War and provides an appropriation of $25,000 for collecting the military records and $7,000 for the naval records. The bill as it passed the Senate carried an appropriation of $50,000 for the military records and $10,000 for the naval records. It has been amended by the House Committee on Military Affairs, reducing the amounts to $25,000 and $7,000, respectively. Every wise precaution has been taken in the drafting of this bill, particularly in the amendments submitted by the House Committee on Military Affairs, to protect the Government in the collection of these records. It is provided that none shall be purchased, but simply copied. Mr. Speaker, we have been grossly derelict in waiting more than a hundred years for the collection of these scattered records of the Revolutionary War. In order to show the necessity of this I may state that under legislation which Congress has already enacted, the scattered records of the Revolutionary War in the other executive departments of the Government have been collected and are deposited now, respectively, in the archives of the War Department and the Navy Department, but these are not all the records extant, and in order to show that fact I will read first from a communication of The Adjutant General of the War Department addressed to the Secretary of War on March 16, 1910:

But even with the accessions resulting from the legislation before referred to the collection of records of the Revolutionary War in the possession of the War Department, although large, is very far from complete. Many military records of the Revolution, of which there are no other copies in existence, are known to be in the custody of the Library of Congress, the authorities of the several States, and of historical societies and individuals.

Reading from a communication of the Secretary of the Navy, dated March 19, 1910, I quote:

There are further considerable quantities of naval records of the Revolutionary War in various collections owned by societies, institutions, private individuals, libraries, and in the Library of Congress.

And further reading from the communication from the War Department, dated June 4, 1910, I quote:

Many such records of which there are no copies in existence, are in the custody of the authorities of the several States, of historical societies, and of individuals. In addition to this, military records of the Revolutionary War, of which no copies are in the possession of the United States or any of the States, will undoubtedly be found in the possession of the British and French Governments.

These quotations, Mr. Speaker, from these official communications from the War and Navy Departments show that there are scattered records of the Revolutionary War——

Mr. COX. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. SMALL. Certainly.

Mr. HARDWICK. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of order that there is no quorum present.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Georgia makes the point of order that there is no quorum present. Evidently there is not.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I move a call of the House.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois moves a call of the House. The Doorkeeper will close the doors, the Sergeant at Arms will notify absentees, and the Clerk will call the roll.

The roll was called, and the following Members failed to answer to their names:

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Speaker, I move to dispense with further proceedings under the call.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE and Mr. SMALL rose.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. SMALL] is recognized.

Mr. SMALL. Mr. Speaker, how much time have I used?

The SPEAKER. Five minutes.

LIMITATION OF HOURS OF DAILY LABOR.

Mr. WILSON of Pennsylvania. Will the gentleman from North Carolina yield?

Mr. SMALL. I will.

Mr. WILSON of Pennsylvania. I ask unanimous consent for the immediate consideration of the concurrent resolution which I send to the Clerk's desk.

Mr. SMALL. I yield if the gentleman is recognized by the Speaker.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. WILSON] has a resolution that is of pressing importance. The Clerk will report the resolution.

House concurrent resolution 72.

Resolved by the House of Representatives (the Senate concurring), That the President is requested to return to the House of Representatives the bill (H. R. 18787) relating to the limitation of the hours of daily service of laborers and mechanics employed upon a public work of the United States and the District of Columbia, and of all persons employed in constructing, maintaining, or improving a river or harbor of the United States and of the District of Columbia; and that the action of the Speaker of the House of Representatives and the President of the Senate in signing the said enrolled bill be rescinded.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the consideration of the concurrent resolution?

There was no objection.

The concurrent resolution was agreed to.

COMPILATION OF REVOLUTIONARY WAR RECORDS.

Mr. SMALL. Mr. Speaker, I shall add a few words to my former remarks regarding this bill to collect the Revolutionary War records. I may say in addition that all the patriotic societies of the United States are very earnestly asking that it be passed. This is especially true of the Society of the Cincinnati, of which Gen. Hazard Stevens, of Boston, is the president, and I may say I became originally interested in this bill through the president of the Society of the Cincinnati of North Carolina, Mr. Wilson G. Lamb, of Williamston, in that State. We have too long delayed this work of gathering the scattered records of the War of the Revolution, and any further postponement will be inexcusable.

Mr. COX. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. SMALL. Just for a question.

Mr. COX. I listened to the gentleman reading a moment ago from the Secretary of War and the Secretary of the Navy, and it disclosed the fact that some of these records were kept in private libraries owned by private individuals. I see by the bill proposed that no part of this appropriation can be used to purchase books of that kind.

Mr. SMALL. The intention is to secure the records only for copying.

Mr. COX. That is the very question I want to lead up to.

Mr. SMALL. Simply for copying, and not to be purchased.

Mr. COX. Has the gentleman any idea that this work could be completed within the limit of cost of $60,000 called for in the bill?

Mr. SMALL. That is the expectation of the Committee on Military Affairs, which investigated this matter.

Mr COX. One more word. A few years ago, if I recollect, Congress entered upon the idea of republishing the colonial proceedings of Congress. Has the gentleman any idea of what that cost before it was concluded?

Mr. SMALL. I am not informed on that point. Mr. Speaker, I reserve the balance of my time.

Mr. FOSTER rose.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. FOSTER] is recognized for 20 minutes.

Mr. FOSTER. Mr. Speaker, this bill passed the Senate and provided for an appropriation of $50,000 for the War Department and $10,000 for the Navy Department. When it came over to the House it was amended by the Committee on Military Affairs to provide for $25,000 for the War Department and $7,000 for the Navy Department. This amount nobody will agree, I think, will be sufficient for the purpose of securing records of the Revolutionary War and compiling them in the War Department. I observe by the letter which is published in the report that Maj. Gen. Ainsworth said some years ago that the War Department undertook to compile these records, but I suppose, after spending what money they were permitted to spend, the work was abandoned and nothing further came from it. But I observe in this report that he says the amount of time that will be required to make a reasonably complete collection of the military records of the Revolutionary War and the amount of money that will be necessary to expend in doing that work can not be stated even approximately at the present time.

He says further:

It is certain, however, that it will require much time and labor, and will necessitate the expenditure of a considerable sum of money to locate the missing military records of the Revolutionary War that are still in existence outside the files of the War Department, to make or obtain copies of those records, and to prepare them for publication.

I observe also that Mr. Beekman Winthrop, Assistant Secretary of the Navy, says with reference to the probable cost:

With reference to the probable cost, this is also a matter of some uncertainty, on account of unforeseen difficulties in selecting, copying, and compiling the necessary matter. It would be necessary to decide upon the class of material to be selected and copied, and it would be essential, for economical reasons, that the compilation should be practically completed before any printing be done.

Now, what I desire to call the attention of the House to is this, that here is an innocent appropriation bill proposing to appropriate $32,000 to compile the Revolutionary War records. It is an innocent-looking bill, and many Members say, "Why is it not worth $32,000 to compile these records of the Revolutionary War?" And yet I want the House to distinctly understand that possibly, not next year but likely the year after, they will come back to this House asking another appropriation, and then another and another, and they will extend probably over a number of years, and no man knows what it will cost, but it will probably cost a million dollars before they are through with it.

Mr. EDWARDS. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FOSTER. Yes.

Mr. EDWARDS. Does not the gentleman think that these old records ought to be collected at some cost, to say the least of it?

Mr. FOSTER. I will say to the gentleman from Georgia, that I believe that we should have these records in proper shape, but I do not believe that it is right to bring into this House a bill of this kind, cutting down the amount from the appropriation proposed by the Senate in order to lead us to believe that $32,000 is all that is necessary to complete the collection of these records, when every man must realize that it will cost many times $32,000 before you are ever through with it.

Mr. SISSON. And many times $75,000, too.

Mr. FOSTER. Yes; many times $75,000 before you are through with it.

I think, Mr. Speaker, that there have been fair histories of the Revolutionary War written. I believe that to-day we have in the War Department a fair compilation of the records of the Revolutionary War. It is true that here and there over our country are scattered some papers relating to that struggle for our independence that it is advisable we should have; but every man realizes that when you start a department out upon a hunting expedition like this, there is no end to the amount of money they can expend in securing what to them appears to be something of importance.

It is true that old records are of much more value than new records. But let us not go into this matter with our eyes closed, believing that this $32,000 will complete the job. Let us go into it knowing, if we go into it, that it is going to cost many hundreds of thousands before we are through with it.

Mr. COX. And it will necessitate, will it not, according to the testimony taken before the gentleman in charge of the bill, a junket across the ocean?

Mr. FOSTER. Yes. It means visits to France and England and other European countries. Let us not fool ourselves. Let us not deceive the people with a proposition that we are going to get these records for $32,000. If that were all that is to be expended, why has not this committee, why has not the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. SMALL] proposed a limitation upon this bill, that it should be confined to $32,000? No. The Senate was more frank. The Senate came nearer to it than the House has come, because the Senate proposed $60,000, and we propose $32,000.

Now, if the House is going to vote for this, let us vote for it, believing and knowing that it is going to cost hundreds of thousands of dollars before we are through with it. Mr. Speaker, I reserve the balance of my time.

Mr. SMALL. Mr. Speaker, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. HAY].

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Virginia is recognized for five minutes.

Mr. HAY. Mr. Speaker, I do not know upon what knowledge the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. FOSTER] bases his remarks. He knows as well as everybody else in the House that the sum carried in this bill is all that can be expended for this purpose unless Congress chooses hereafter to authorize a further expenditure. He himself acknowledges that it is right and proper that these Revolutionary records should be gathered and should be copied. There is no proposition to expend anything like a million dollars, and the gentleman himself has no knowledge upon which to base any such assertion as that.

Mr. FOSTER. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman yield?

Mr. HAY. Yes.

Mr. FOSTER. Does the gentleman believe that this work will be completed within $32,000?

Mr. HAY. From the evidence before the committee I do believe it can be completed with $32,000.

Mr. FOSTER. Why did you not limit it to $32,000?

Mr. HAY. It is limited to $32,000. You can not expend more than $32,000.

Mr. FOSTER. Not in this appropriation.

Mr. HAY. Exactly.

Mr. FOSTER. But that will not prevent them from coming back and asking for more.

Mr. HAY. No; and no appropriation that is made prevents anybody from coming back for more. If we should put a limit upon it, the next Congress could increase that limit. As the gentleman knows, this Congress can not bind a future Congress.

Mr. FOSTER. I think the gentleman does not mean to convey the idea to this House that this work will be completed at $32,000.

Mr. HAY. The evidence before us was that there were very few of these records that were needed to be gathered together. This bill puts it into the hands of the Secretary of War and the Secretary of the Navy to determine what records shall be copied. We do not propose to purchase any records. We propose only to copy records, and there is nothing in this bill which would make it possible to expend more than $32,000. If the next Congress chooses to spend more, if more is asked for, that will be a question to be determined by the next Congress, and not by this Congress.

This Congress can not place a limitation upon any appropriation which the next Congress can not increase if it desires to do so. The gentleman from Illinois in his anxiety to defeat this bill, in his anxiety perhaps to protect the Treasury of the United States, is undertaking to make the Members of this House believe that we are entering upon an expenditure which will go up into the millions of dollars. It is not possible that that can happen, and the worthy object of this bill ought to appeal to every Member of this House. It has been too long neglected, and the amount of money here involved is not sufficient to deter any gentleman from voting for this measure. I hope, therefore, that the House will pass this bill. [Applause.]

Mr. SMALL. How much time have I remaining?

The SPEAKER. Five minutes.

Mr. SMALL. I yield three minutes to the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. MCCALL].

Mr. MCCALL. Mr. Speaker, if we are to wait until we know the exact cost of copying these records before we begin publishing them, we shall never begin at all. I am entirely willing to take a chance at $32,000 and authorize the work to be begun, and I would authorize the work to be begun even if the committee on the part of the House had authorized the full amount recommended by the Senate.

Mr. MANN. They have.

Mr. MCCALL. The gentleman from Illinois is an old soldier and he should have some sympathy with this movement to protect the sources of our history and to reverence the records of the men who fought in the War of the Revolution and established the independence of this country. There are not a great many of these records left. Time has been at work for nearly 150 years and has destroyed a great many of them, but we do know that the historical societies of the different States and various private collections have a number of these records, and the purpose of this bill is to have the Navy Department have copies made of all the known naval records, and the War Department to have copies made of all the known war records of the Revolution. As to sending men to Germany or France or England, it is entirely easy for our representatives in those countries to find out what records are in the possession of those Governments.

I believe this bill is one that the House ought to pass. [Applause.]

Mr. MANN. There being no limitation in this bill as to the amount which may be appropriated to carry it into effect, would the gentleman be willing to modify his motion by inserting an amendment that the authority granted is within the limitation of the appropriations carried in this bill, so that it will not authorize an unlimited expenditure?

Mr. HAY. Undoubtedly; yes.

Mr. MANN. I had an amendment prepared, if the bill had come up in the House in the regular way, to insert after the word "that," in line 1, the words "within the limitations of the appropriations herein made," so that it would read, "that within the limitations of the appropriations herein made the Secretary of War is hereby authorized," and so forth.

Mr. SMALL. I consent that the gentleman may ask unanimous consent at the proper time.

Mr. HAY. I consent to that, so far as I am concerned.

Mr. SMALL. So do I.

Mr. MANN. I ask unanimous consent that before the motion is put to the House the bill be amended by inserting the words I have indicated.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois asks unanimous consent that before the motion to suspend the rules is put this bill shall be modified by an amendment which he suggests. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. MANN. In line 3 of the bill, after the word "that" at the beginning of the line, insert the words "within the limits of the appropriations herein made."

The SPEAKER. There being no objection, that language will be considered as being incorporated in the bill.

Mr. SMALL. There are several gentlemen who desire time. May I ask if the Clerk did not make an error as to the amount of time that had been consumed?

The SPEAKER. Oh, no. This debate began at half past 11, and it is now 5 minutes past 12. The gentleman from Illinois has consumed only 10 minutes, so that the gentleman from North Carolina and those who are assisting him have really consumed more time than they are entitled to.

Mr. SMALL. How much time have I remaining?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman has no time at all. The gentleman from Illinois has 10 minutes.

Mr. FOSTER. Mr. Speaker, I think the amendment offered by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN], which has been accepted by the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. SMALL] and the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. HAY], improves this bill very materially. I hope, Mr. Speaker, that in the future Congresses there will not be any Committee on Military Affairs who will come here and ask for a further appropriation, and I am quite sure that my good friend from Virginia who so ably presides over the Committee on Military Affairs will keep good faith with the House if he presides over that committee, as I hope he will. I think the amendment means something. What I have been fighting for is that we may limit this amount of money so that there may not be brought into the House an innocent looking bill which will permit these men to roam around over all the States of the Union, and possibly over a part of Europe, to secure certain records that in their judgment are essential to historical records.

Mr. SHACKLEFORD. And coats of arms.

Mr. FOSTER. Yes; and coats of arms, to produce a better history.

Mr. SHERWOOD. Does the gentleman think that by collecting these records a better history of the War of the Revolution could be produced than that contained in Irving's Life of Washington?

Mr. FOSTER. I will say to my friend, Gen. SHERWOOD, who is a good judge of history of the war and who has had experience and distinguished service in the late war, that I am sure after his opinion that there can be no better record of the Revolutionary War compiled by the Government than that contained in the Life of Washington, by Washington Irving, that I do not expect when the records are compiled that they will be of any more service or very much more complete than those now in the history of our country.

Mr. HUMPHREYS of Mississippi. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FOSTER. Yes.

Mr. HUMPHREYS of Mississippi. In reference to the history of the Revolutionary War in the Life of Washington by Irving, I call the gentleman's attention to the fact that that history and all histories of the Revolutionary War are the histories of the movements of great bodies of troops and the history of the generals who commanded those troops.

The gentleman does not believe, I am sure, that Washington, or Anthony Wayne, or Ethan Allen, or any commander of the Revolution could have won that great victory without the trials and the sufferings and the sacrifices of the boys who followed them in the ranks. Now their names are not mentioned in Irving's History of Washington or any other history.

When the State of Illinois erected the great monument on the battle field of Vicksburg, appreciating the very thought that I have suggested, she wrote on that monument the name of every private soldier who served in any Illinois regiment in the siege of Vicksburg—38,000 of them. Does not the gentleman think it is worthy of this Congress, and that this cause is worthy of the appropriation that will endeavor to preserve the simple annals of the privates in the Revolutionary War along with the records of the generals?

Mr. FOSTER. I am just as much in favor as the gentleman from Mississippi in furnishing a complete history of every man who served in the defense of his country, whether he be private or in command of the forces. I say to him that I believe that that history should be written of the private soldier as much as of the general who commanded the forces, but I also say to him that when these records are compiled I fear you will get very little more information about the private soldier than you have at this time. Certainly, I am for the man behind the gun as strong as anyone on this floor.

Mr. HUMPHREYS of Mississippi. I do not see on what ground the gentleman predicates that statement. The State of Mississippi, appreciating the value of old historic records, sent an agent to France and Spain, who, after most laborious research, gathered these records, and it did not cost any $32,000 or one-half such a sum. It cost very little, in fact, and it was not a junket either.

Mr. FOSTER. I do not know how many soldiers there were in the State of Mississippi. I appreciate the gentleman's statement, and I am in hearty sympathy with him and would like to see a history of every man who served in the war preserved.

Mr. KENDALL. Is it not contemplated to make a substantial roster of all the men who served in the Revolutionary War?

Mr. FOSTER. I think it is; but I think that most of the Revolutionary soldiers are recorded in The Adjutant General's office.

Mr. SMALL. Oh, I think the gentleman is mistaken.

Mr. FOSTER. I have succeeded very well in getting the records from the The Adjutant General's office. Of course, they are not always complete. Neither are they in any other war. Those records of the Revolutionary War of course are not as complete as those of later wars, as the early records were not so well kept, but I submit they can never be made so, as in many cases there is no record.

The SPEAKER. The question is on suspending the rules.

Mr. HENRY of Texas. With all due respect, I make the point order that no quorum is present.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will count. [After counting.] Two hundred and eleven Members are present, a quorum. The question is on suspending the rules and passing the bill.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. HENRY of Texas) there were—ayes 159, noes 25.

Mr. HENRY of Texas. With all due respect, I make the point of no quorum.

Mr. MANN. The Speaker has just counted a quorum.

Mr. CULLOP. I make the point that the point raised by the gentleman from Texas is dilatory.

The SPEAKER. Well, it is easier to count. [After counting.] Two hundred and eighteen Members present, a quorum. Two-thirds having voted in favor thereof, the rules are suspended and the bill is passed.

Mr. HAY. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to ask for a conference on the bill which has just been passed, and to appoint conferees.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Virginia asks unanimous consent to ask the Senate for a conference on the bill just passed, and to appoint conferees. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER appointed the following conferees: Mr. HAY, Mr. DENT, and Mr. KAHN.

CALENDAR FOR UNANIMOUS CONSENT.

Mr. HARDWICK. Mr. Speaker, I rise to a point of order.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. HARDWICK. I call the attention of the Chair to clause 3 of Rule XIII, which says:

3. After a bill which has been favorably reported shall be upon either the House or the Union Calendar any Member may file with the Clerk a notice that he desires such a bill placed upon a special calendar to be known as the Calendar for Unanimous Consent. On days when it shall be in order to move to suspend the rules the Speaker shall, immediately after the approval of the Journal, direct the Clerk to call the bills which have been for three days upon the Calendar for Unanimous Consent. Should objection be made to the consideration of any bill so called, it shall immediately be stricken from such calendar; but such bill may be restored to the calendar at the instance of the Member, and if again objected to, it shall be immediately stricken from such calendar, and shall not thereafter be placed thereon: Provided, That the same bill shall not be called twice on the same legislative day.

Mr. Speaker, I think that, under the rules, the Calendar for Unanimous Consent has preference over motions to suspend the rules and pass a bill.

The SPEAKER. The Chair is inclined to think that the point of order raised by the gentleman from Georgia is well taken.

It is in order on the last six days to move to suspend the rules, and while the Chair does not think that the men who drafted this clause of Rule XIII ever intended that it should apply to the last six days, yet if it is literally construed it does apply. The Clerk will call the Calendar for Unanimous Consent.

Mr. ANTHONY. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. ANTHONY. Will it be in order to ask for unanimous consideration of any bill that is not on the Calendar for Unanimous Consent?

The SPEAKER. On this call it will not.

AGRICULTURE APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. LAMB. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's table the bill (H. R. 28283) making appropriations for the Department of Agriculture for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1914, with Senate amendments thereto, disagree to the Senate amendments, and ask for a conference.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Virginia asks unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's table the Agriculture appropriation bill, with Senate amendments thereto, disagree to all of the Senate amendments, and ask for a conference. Is there objection?

Mr. HARDWICK. Mr. Speaker, I object.

Mr. LAMB. Mr. Speaker, I move to suspend the rules, and take from the Speaker's table the bill H. R. 28283, the Agriculture appropriation bill, with Senate amendments thereto, disagree to the Senate amendments, and ask for a conference.

Mr. HARDWICK. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of order that that motion is not in order.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, would it not be in order in any event for the gentleman to move to suspend the rules?

The SPEAKER. Of course it would on that kind of business.

Mr. LAMB. Mr. Speaker, I insist upon my motion.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Virginia moves to suspend the rules, take from the Speaker's table the Agriculture appropriation bill, with Senate amendments thereto, disagree to the Senate amendments, and ask for a conference. Is a second demanded?

Mr. COX. Mr. Speaker, I demand a second.

Mr. HEFLIN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that a second may be considered as ordered.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Virginia is entitled to 20 minutes and the gentleman from Indiana to 20 minutes.

Mr. LAMB. Mr. Speaker, I reserve the balance of my time.

Mr. COX. Mr. Speaker, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Wyoming [Mr. MONDELL].

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Speaker, on page 56 of the Agriculture bill, as it passed the Senate, is an amendment numbered 142, respecting game birds.

Mr. HARDWICK. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of order that there is no quorum present.

The SPEAKER. The Chair has just counted the House twice within 5 or 10 minutes. Evidently there is a quorum present, and the gentleman from Wyoming will proceed. [Applause.]

Mr. HARDWICK. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. HARDWICK. Mr. Speaker, the Speaker just the other day held that it was within the constitutional right of a Member to make the point of no quorum, and that the point that it was dilatory would not lie against it. A short time ago the point of order was made that there was no quorum present, and the further point was raised that it was dilatory, but the Chair nevertheless counted. I think the Chair at least should do the gentleman who makes the point the courtesy of counting the House.

The SPEAKER. But there would be no end to the thing if counting a quorum does not establish the fact that there is a quorum present when the count discloses that a quorum is present. The Chair has counted the House twice within five minutes.

Mr. HARDWICK. But the Chair knows very well that we might have a quorum at one moment and in five minutes have no quorum. It does not appear to me that there is a quorum present.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks that there is a quorum present, and so holds.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Speaker, this proposal of legislation, with the exception of a brief speech in the Senate and a brief speech in the House, a discussion of not to exceed 5 minutes in the Senate, when the bill passed, and a discussion of not to exceed 10 minutes in the House when a bill containing these provisions was on the Unanimous Consent Calendar, has never been considered by this or the other body of Congress. Let us see just what is proposed. It is as follows:

All wild geese, wild swans, brant, wild ducks, snipe, plover, woodcock, rail, wild pigeons, and all other migratory game and insectivorous birds which in their northern and southern migrations pass through or do not remain permanently the entire year within the borders of any State or Territory, shall hereafter be deemed to be within the custody and protection of the Government of the United States, and shall not be destroyed or taken contrary to regulations hereinafter provided therefor.

The Department of Agriculture is hereby authorized and directed to adopt suitable regulations to give effect to the previous paragraph by prescribing and fixing closed seasons, having due regard to the zones of temperature, breeding habits, and times and line of migratory flight, thereby enabling the department to select and designate suitable districts for different portions of the country, and it shall be unlawful to shoot or by any device kill or seize and capture migratory birds within the protection of this law during said closed seasons, and any person who shall violate any of the provisions or regulations of this law for the protection of migratory birds shall be guilty of a misdemeanor and shall be fined not more than $100 or imprisoned not more than 90 days, or both, in the discretion of the court.

The Department of Agriculture, after the preparation of said regulations, shall cause the same to be made public, and shall allow a period of three months in which said regulations may be examined and considered before final adoption, permitting, when deemed proper, public hearings thereon, and after final adoption shall cause the same to be engrossed and submitted to the President of the United States for approval: Provided, however, That nothing herein contained shall be deemed to affect or interfere with the local laws of the States and Territories for the protection of nonmigratory game or other birds resident and breeding within their borders, nor to prevent the States and Territories from enacting laws and regulations to promote and render efficient the regulations of the Department of Agriculture provided under this statute.

There is hereby appropriated, out of any moneys in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, for the purpose of carrying out these provisions the sum of $10,000.

Mr. Speaker, this is, in my opinion, the most revolutionary, the most far-reaching legislation, in its possible and probable effect on our system of government, that has been presented to Congress in the 16 years during which I have been a Member of this body. If this bill should become a law no man who voted for it would ever be justified in raising his voice, he could not logically raise his voice, against any extension, no matter how extreme, of the police authority and control of the Federal Government. It takes from the States control over everything that flies, save some birds of the grouse family, bats, and butterflies, and it authorizes a clerk in a bureau of the Agricultural Department to designate as crimes, punishable by imprisonment in Federal penitentiaries, the slightest infraction of the prohibitions contained in the bill against the capturing, the killing, or taking of any bird that flies anywhere in the Union save those few which never migrate, which, in most instances, are birds of the grouse family only. Under this legislation a bureau of the Agricultural Department could promulgate a regulation having the force of law under which a farmer shooting a crow in his cornfield could be hauled before a Federal grand jury, indicted, fined, and imprisoned—fined not exceeding $100 and imprisoned not to exceed six months. Regulations could be promulgated under which a barefooted boy in any State of the Union snaring a lark or reedbird, taking a shot with his airgun at the smallest and most insignificant of the feathered tribe, could be indicted, tried, condemned, and immured in a Federal penitentiary. No legislation so profoundly subversive of the fundamental principles of our Government has been suggested since the beginning of my service here, and I doubt if it has been in the history of Congress. We do not invoke the strong arm of the Federal Government for the protection of human life or property no matter how much the States may temporarily fail in giving protection. We decline to invoke the strong arm of the Federal Government for the protection of the honesty of elections, but pass this bill and every barrier standing against the assertion of Federal police control in every line and with regard to every act and activity of the American people is broken down, and we no longer have a Government of self-governing States but are well on the way to an empire governed from this Capital.

This legislation seems to have widespread support. Hundreds of telegrams are being received by Members urging them to support it. In my opinion, practically all of them are suggested by a lobby, having its headquarters in a bureau of the Agricultural Department, which, if this bill passes, is in a fair way to become the biggest organization of Federal spies and agents under our Government, and many of those telegrams are hurried on their way by those who expect to secure employment as Federal game wardens at a fat salary.

The organization of place hunters and bird killers who are back of this legislation have left nothing undone to secure its passage. They have, with devilish cunning, prevailed upon committees of State legislatures to recommend, and the legislatures to pass, resolutions indorsing this legislation.

The legislature of my State recently adopted such a resolution at a time and under circumstances which make it clear that the legislature was not advised of the character of what was proposed. I know my people too well to believe that our legislature would with full knowledge approve legislation which would repeal or attempt to repeal or render of no effect our State legislation affecting birds other than perhaps the sage hen.

I know my people too well to believe that they or their representatives are willing to have a swarm of Federal officials appointed over them with power to prevent all killing of game and other birds or to fix the time in which they can be killed or trapped or taken under pain and penalty of fine and imprisonment.

I can not in the limited time at my disposal argue the legal or constitutional aspect of this question. If game by flying over a State line can become interstate commerce, if game can in the same way become Federal property, and, if so becoming, the Federal Government may exercise police jurisdiction over it, then I am so far wrong in my estimate and understanding of the limitations of Federal authority that I can never hope to get right.

If this legislation becomes law and by some inscrutable dispensation of Divine Providence gets past the Supreme Court, let us nevermore attune our Fourth of July orations to the proposition that this is a union of self-governing States and that we of all the peoples of the earth are freest from the annoyance, vexation, devilment, and trying of the irresponsible agents of a centralized bureaucracy, for we shall not only cease to be a people having control of our local affairs, but we shall have established a bureaucracy outrivaling that of Russia.

I am not a pessimist. I have abiding faith in the good sense of my countrymen in the righting of wrongs, in retracing false steps, but I say here and now, measuring my words, that this step, if taken and not promptly retraced, will prove the first long and fatal step toward entirely breaking down the bulwarks which protect the people from centralized tyranny. I shall not be surprised if it would at no distant date lead to open defiance by the people of the Federal authority sought to be exercised under it.

The motion is to suspend the rules and send this bill to conference. I apprehend that can not be defeated, as Members believe if the bill is not put in conference now it will fail; but if this motion carries I hope to secure an opportunity to move to instruct the conferees to disagree to this item and to debate it. If the opportunity for debate is secured I believe the House will reject the Senate amendment.

Mr. LAMB. Mr. Speaker, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. WEEKS].

Mr. WEEKS. Mr. Speaker, the amendment which has just been called to the attention of the House by the gentleman from Wyoming [Mr. MONDELL] includes what is known as the migratory bird bill—a bill to protect birds during the breeding season in different sections of the country. It has been argued that the States should make proper restrictions to prevent the destruction of birds in the nesting season. Many of the States have legislated on this subject, but frequently have not legislated intelligently, and many of them have not legislated at all, the result being that the destruction of birds is going on which will mean the elimination of many species within a reasonable time. I have here an example which I want to call to the attention of the House. It is only one of many which might be instanced. This map which I hold here indicates the flight [indicating the location] of the Wilson snipe, a well-known bird, and its location at different dates during the spring. For instance, March the 10th it is on this line [indicating]; March 20, on that; March 30, there; April 10, there; April 20, there. This color on the map shows the States where legislation has been passed prohibiting the shooting at different periods. Here is a State where the law goes into effect on the 15th of April, the State of Tennessee, and on the 15th of April practically all the Wilson snipe are outside of the United States—are in Canada. Here is a State, the State of Oklahoma, where the law goes into effect May 1, and every Wilson snipe is hundreds of miles north of Oklahoma on May 1. The result is that the law is so ineffective that Wilson snipe is being rapidly destroyed.

Mr. COX. Will the gentleman yield for a question there?

Mr. WEEKS. Yes.

Mr. COX. Who prepared that?

Mr. WEEKS. It was prepared at the Biological Bureau of the Department of Agriculture.

Mr. COX. The head of which is Mr. Palmer?

Mr. WEEKS. The chief of which division is Dr. Palmer.

Mr. SHACKLEFORD. Does the gentleman think the thinning out of the snipe has contributed very much to the high cost of living which now prevails?

Mr. WEEKS. I think it has something to do with the high cost of living, and I think it will have more to do with it in the future.

Mr. HAMILTON of Michigan. Will the gentleman permit me to inquire of him if it is not true that the indiscriminate killing of wild pigeons has practically exterminated them?

Mr. WEEKS. There is not a wild pigeon alive in the United States to-day, and within the memory of man they nearly furnished sufficient game food for the localities where they existed.

Now, this bill not only applies to game birds, but it applies as well to insectivorous birds. It is well known that there are birds that will eat their own weight in insects in a single day.

Mr. FOWLER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WEEKS. I will for a brief question.

Mr. FOWLER. Are there not wild pigeons in the mountains of California to-day?

Mr. WEEKS. I think there is not a wild pigeon in the United States.

Mr. LONGWORTH. Will the gentleman allow me to correct him? There is one wild pigeon in the zoological park in my city.

Mr. WEEKS. The gentleman from Ohio says that there is a wild pigeon in the zoological park in the city of Cincinnati, but I want to correct him. That pigeon has died.

Mr. LONGWORTH. Then it has died since election. [Laughter.]

Mr. WEEKS. The election killed lots of pigeons. [Laughter.] A reward of $1,000 had been offered by a society to find another pigeon to mate that one before it died, and the reward was never claimed. It was impossible to find a pigeon. Now, this bill applies, as I have said, not only to game birds, but to insectivorous birds, and, as I have said, there are many birds which eat their weight in insects in a single day, and a young robin will eat 16 feet of angleworms in a single day. We are appropriating millions of dollars in one form or another to kill insects in this country, and they are very largely the food of birds. We are trying to produce parasites which will destroy certain kinds of insects for whose destruction we are appropriating in the Agriculture appropriation bill hundreds of thousands of dollars a year, and yet we are allowing the unlicensed killing of birds that are doing exactly what we are trying to develop through these appropriations for the Agricultural Department.

Mr. SAUNDERS. May I ask the gentleman a question?

Mr. WEEKS. Yes.

Mr. SAUNDERS. The vital question here is one of power. What section of the Constitution affords authority to enact a provision of this kind?

Mr. WEEKS. We will come to that in a moment. Another gentleman will take up that phase of the question.

I want to add that the gentleman from Wyoming [Mr. MONDELL], who has opposed this bill on two or three occasions, is apparently representing himself, and not even representing his own State. I have in my hand a resolution passed by the Wyoming Legislature indorsing this bill in these terms:

House joint memorial 3.

Whereas there have been introduced in Congress three bills (H. R. 36, H. R. 4428, S. 2367) to afford Federal protection to migratory game birds; and

Whereas there is a very general sentiment in this State in favor of such protection, and an urgent request for the enactment of such a law has been made, as appears by the numerous petitions received: Now therefore

Resolved (the senate concurring), That Congress be, and hereby is, requested to enact a law giving ample protection to migratory game birds.

Resolved, That the legislatures of all other States of the United States, now in session, or when next convened, be, and they are hereby, respectfully requested to join in this request by the adoption of this or an equivalent resolution.

Then it goes on with other paragraphs referring to the same subject. It is signed by the speaker of the house of representatives, the president of the senate, and approved by Joseph M. Carey, governor, on February 17, 1913. [Applause.]

Wyoming is the eleventh State the legislature of which has passed resolutions approving this legislation.

When the hearing was held before the Committee on Agriculture, 44 States were represented by the game commissioners, by the governors, and by others interested in this subject. The game protection societies, the Audubon Society, and a large number of associations, which believe in preserving the birds, were there at great expense to themselves, solely because they recognize the importance of the legislation and especially that there should be no delay in taking action.

Mr. GRAHAM. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WEEKS. I yield.

Mr. GRAHAM. I had a telegram from the State game warden of Illinois yesterday saying that 100,000 sportsmen in the State of Illinois asked me to vote for the measure under consideration.

Mr. LINTHICUM. The gentleman from Wyoming [Mr. MONDELL] thinks it ought to be done by State law. Does not the gentleman find it hard to enforce State law, by reason of the fact of the friendships of the game wardens?

Mr. WEEKS. There is an important point in that suggestion. I have illustrated by this little map that it is impossible to rely on State laws in order to secure effective results.

Mr. HAY. How many employees will it take to enforce this law?

Mr. WEEKS. This bill proposes $10,000. That is the amount of money carried.

Mr. HAY. Does the gentleman believe that $10,000 or ten times $10,000 will be enough for the employees who will be necessary to carry out the provisions of this law?

Mr. WEEKS. My own judgment is that States will pass laws which will accord with the rules that will be made by the Department of Agriculture, and practically the enforcement of this law will be left in the hands of the game wardens of the States, just as the enforcement of other laws applying to such subjects are left with the State authorities.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. WEEKS] has expired.

Mr. LAMB. Mr. Speaker, I desire to take one minute of time to reply to a question asked by my colleague [Mr. HAY] of the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. WEEKS]. We asked this question during the hearings before the Agricultural Committee, and they thought $10,000 would do in cooperation with the wardens in the States and State authorities.

Mr. HAY. What guaranty do we have that there will be that cooperation that the gentleman speaks of?

Mr. LAMB. A number of States have petitioned for this legislation; that will have to be tested.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I yield three minutes to the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. Moss].

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Indiana [Mr. Moss] is recognized for three minutes.

Mr. MOSS of Indiana. Mr. Speaker, I will not attempt a I will leave that field for those who will oppose this measure and who can give no other reason for their opposition. I will venture to assert this early in the discussion, that not a single objection will be urged other than a lack of national power under the Constitution. I have very great respect for the constitutional limitations of our Government; but I am tired of hearing the Federal Constitution pleaded as a bar to rational and progressive legislation, thereby placing the National Government on the wrong side of many questions which so greatly affect the welfare of our people. Every State in the Union recognizes by its legislation that bird life should be protected, and this proposed enactment is simply to place the National Government in active cooperation with the States in discharging this necessary obligation to the general welfare. If it is lawful and right that the States should protect bird life, it should not become unlawful for the National Government to engage in this work in harmony and cooperation with the States. These two sovereignties are now intimately cooperating in various activities to advance the agricultural interests of our Nation, and this proposition is but one further recognition of this mutual relationship and the advantages which come from harmonious action between State and Nation.

This issue is strictly one affecting practical agriculture. I shall not attempt to justify this legislation by pleading the love of a naturalist. Sentiment is fast giving way before that wholesome doctrine that the greatest happiness of the greatest number should be the end and the aim of progressive legislation. We have here presented a choice between protecting man's friends or his foes in the fields of productive labor. Birds are the natural friends of the farmer, and all their natural activities go toward diminishing the increase of noxious insects which prey on the cultivated crops of the farm and orchard. Where birds exist in normal number destructive insects can not exist in abnormal number. This is the balance in nature. If insects were to be unopposed, their increase would soon devastate farm and forest.

In a report made by a Senate committee it is authoritatively stated that one pair of potato bugs will produce from fifty to sixty million in one season, and that one pair of brown gypsy moth in their natural increase if unopposed by any destructive agencies would defoliate the forests of the United States in eight years. These statements are not exaggerated. We are spending vast sums of money, both public and private funds, in fighting the increase of insect life which was unknown to our fathers. The Nation's losses in these directions are not less than $800,000,000 per year, a sum twice as great as is required to build the Panama Canal. We are spending less than half this vast sum in support of our Army, Navy, and pension bureau every year. If these losses were to be overcome, it would soon pay the national debt. It is a toll laid on every citizen of our country, because it is one of the potent causes of the high prices of food products. As a Nation we have wantonly destroyed our bird life just as we have squandered other of our vast natural resources; and now that our Nation is approaching the hunger line, we are told that we have no national power to protect God's creation from destruction and thereby promote our own national and individual welfare.

We are beginning a national campaign of education along agricultural lines. This is a great and a most worthy work. Yet a man can not always roll a stone uphill without exhausting his energy and strength. We can not upbuild a rational system of agriculture unless we take cognizance of the forces in nature, protect our friends and destroy our enemies. This has been true from the beginning and will remain true until the end. Despite all that State and Nation is doing toward agricultural education, our production per acre is remaining stationary and is decreasing per unit of population. Under these circumstances there ought to be no objection to the passage of this measure, which adds national protection to that now given the birds by the State. I do not know whether it is constitutional, but I do know that it is eternally right and in the end right will prevail.

This is all I have to say, Mr. Speaker.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. LAMB. Mr. Speaker, I yield one minute to the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. EDWARDS].

Mr. EDWARDS. Mr. Speaker, I wish to ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD by inserting an able article on "The Economic Value of Birds to the Farmer," by Prof. R. J. H. de Loach, a distinguished specialist. Prof. de Loach formerly resided in Bulloch County, Ga., but is now connected with the University of Georgia and resides at Athens, Ga.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Georgia?

There was no objection.

Following is the article referred to:

BIRDS—THEIR RELATIONSHIP TO THE FARMER.

Many there are who regard the study of birds only for the eccentric, the odd, or even the cranky. This view was not unreasonable perhaps till recently, when so many merits of birds have been discovered, and the United States Biological Survey has taken the matter up and made an exhaustive study of birds in their relation to man. It having been learned that birds are useful, a great many bird societies have been organized for an extensive study of the subject, and among these the most important probably are the American Ornithologists Union, the Audubon Society of America, the Wilson Society, and a great many others of less importance. These societies have reached almost all the States and have created a most wholesome sentiment in favor of bird study and even bird protection, and I might say have so completely changed the viewpoint that one is now considered the exception who does not have some regard at least for the subject.

There are those who still hold to the idea that a desire for sport and the outdoor life is the only impulse that impels one to get acquainted with birds. Such views are unjust and do not credit birds with economic value. When one calls the study a fancy or a hobby, his remarks are narrow and based on unfamiliarity with the subject. Bird study is not only a most enjoyable avocation and even vocation with some, but when systematically pursued leads to an understanding of birds in relation to their own environment, of their relation to man, and proves to be a subject of great economic importance.

It is the duty and should be the pleasure of every citizen to do all in his or her power to protect these valuable creatures and to encourage them to remain about our homes. The best means of accomplishing this end is to disseminate knowledge concerning them. When we consider the number of enemies birds have to contend with we often wonder that they do as well as they do. In order of importance their enemies rank as follows: Man, the elements, accidents, cats, other animals, birds of prey, and snakes. Each of us can play some part in lessening the unnatural dangers that lurk along their pathway. In order to do so we must know the bird and his environment, his habits, his uses, and his difficulties. We must feel a personal interest in him. The question arises, How are we going to begin a study of birds, or what must we have to begin with?

Every bird student should have a handbook, or bird manual, a good pair of field glasses, a standard notebook and pencil, and keen ears and sharp eyes. The whole outfit, except the eyes and ears, will not cost more than $15 or $20. The first lessons are most fruitful if taken in our back or front yards, for then we can take leisure and learn just how a live uncaged bird behaves. The blue jay is a good subject to begin with. No one knows all about this familiar and noisy visitor.

In order to make a successful bird student one must learn to step lightly, talk little, and see and hear everything. A little patience is necessary, but the joy that the study will bring more than justifies the effort.

When you are sure of being in a bird community, or where they are in the habit of visiting and feeding, stand still for several moments at a time, and all the birds seem to come your way. As the procession passes on keep absolutely quiet, and perhaps you will hear some rare music and see some gay colors, all probably strangers to you. Two or three experiences like this will win you to the defense of the birds. You simply can not resist the temptation to get out and learn to name them. In winter, spring, and autumn midday is the time to find birds, but in summer most of the sweetest songs are to be heard in the early morning or late afternoon. Sometimes you will find identification a very difficult problem, but the task grows easier with each visit to the woods, especially if you will use your bird manual between visits and can have access to colored plates.

Within a short time you will be able to identify most birds by their voices alone, so characteristic are they when you know them. Who would not be able to recognize the song of the mockingbird or the caw of the crow? To the bird student the voice of the American goldfinch, the kinglet, the wren, and the vireos is just as characteristic.

According to Burroughs's Wake Robin, birds are generally divided into two large classes—land birds and water birds. In the present paper our purpose will be to give a superficial outline of land birds, with some detailed study of a few of them. The greater number of our land birds are warblers, vireos, flycatchers, thrushes, and finches. The warblers are the most puzzling and probably the most interesting. They are the true wood birds, and you must go to the woods to study them. They are peculiar to America and consist of about 100 species, 70 of which visit the United States. They feed almost exclusively upon insects.

The vireos are a kind of connecting link between warblers and flycatchers and partake the nature and characteristics of both. Only about 15 of the 50 known species are common in the United States. Almost anyone can become acquainted with four of them—the red-eyed, white-eyed, warbling, and solitary vireos.

The flycatchers, usually famous for their pugnacious dispositions, are not properly song birds, but have marked characteristics. They not only fight among themselves, but are continually quarreling with their neighbors. We have about 35 species in the United States, prominent among which are the kingbird, pewee, phoebe, and the great-crested flycatcher.

The thrushes are the birds of real melody, and afford more delight perhaps than any other class. The American robin is the most familiar example. Other prominent members of the family are the wood thrush, the hermit, the veery, and the olive backed. Only about 12 species inhabit the United States.

The finches are usually distinguished by their short conical bills and forked tails. They are our greatest weed-seed eaters, and hence are not as migratory as other birds. We have close to 100 species in the United States. Among them are the sparrows, goldfinch, etc.

Among those not classed above are the thrashers, bobolink, tanagers, wrens, and kinglets, the mocking bird being classed with the thrashers.

Bird literature may be divided into scientific and popular, or systematic and sentimental, and a third which is a combination of the two. Audubon is by far the greatest ornithologist that ever lived, and everyone should have the pleasure of examining his great work, termed by one critic "the greatest monument that art ever erected to nature." On the desolate coast of Labrador he was far happier than any king ever was. So enthusiastic was he and such a master of English that many of his descriptions are poems.

Wilson is our next greatest ornithologist. He was a contemporary of Audubon and had the same love for the birds, but possibly less enthusiasm. Nuttall, the great botanist, was also a true ornithologist, and excels them all in his descriptions of bird songs. Within the last half a century many ornithologists have developed, some of them extremely scientific and others almost too popular. Among the scientific group are Ridgeway, Baird, Brewer, and Coues, Chamberlain and Allen. Among the popular of a high order are Chapman, Sharpe, Brewster, Torrey, and Burroughs. Those who have given special attention to the economic study of birds are C. Hart Merriam, E. H. Forbush, C. M. Weed, and Ned Dearborn. I mention only a few prominent names in connection with each group. Many others in each line of work are doing much to extend the study of birds. Our leading bird magazines are American Ornithology, Bird Lore, the Condor, and the Auk.

Much poetry has been written on birds and bird life, the most famous being Shelly's To a Skylark, Wordsworth's Cuckoo, and Bryant's Bobolink.

II.

Some of our bird laws are good indeed, but the lawmakers remind us of the worldly man who was asked by his pious neighbor to plant a small patch on his farm for the Lord. After much persuasion, the wordly man decided to do so. In the autumn when the church member came around to get the proceeds of the little patch for the Lord, the wordly neighbor said, "Yes; I planted that patch out thar for the Lord, but He never looked after it, and it made nothing." The lawmakers seem to think that all is accomplished when they have passed bird laws, when in reality the work has just begun. Such laws should be rigidly enforced.

In fact, native birds are one of the Nation's most valuable assets. Destroy them, and in a comparatively short time the insects will have multiplied to such an extent that trees will be denuded of their foliage, plants will cease to thrive, and crops can not be raised. This is not fancy, but plain facts.

The chickadee returns to her brood about 200 times a day with not less than 25 plant lice each time for the young. It has been found that a cuckoo consumes daily from 50 to 400 caterpillars or their equivalent, while a chickadee will eat from 200 to 500 insects, or up to 4,000 insect or worm eggs. One hundred insects a day is a conservative estimate of the quantity consumed by each individual insectivorous bird. By carefully estimating the birds in several areas, it has been found that in Massachusetts there are not less than five insect-eating birds per acre. Thus the State, with its 8,000 square miles, has a useful bird population of not less than 25,600,000, which, for each day's fare, requires not less than the enormous total of 2,560,000,000 insects. Or better to express such figures in common measurements, 120,000 average insects fill a bushel measure. This means that the daily consumption of chiefly obnoxious insects in Massachusetts is about 21,000 bushels. This estimate is good for above five months in the year—May to September, inclusive; during the remainder of the year the insects, eggs, and larvæ destroyed by the winter, late fall, and early spring migrants will be equivalent to nearly half this quantity.

On the 23d of June, 1885, the Legislature of Pennsylvania passed an act known as the "scalp act," ostensibly for the benefit of agriculture, which provides a bounty of 50 cents each on hawks, owls, weasels, and minks killed within the limits of the State and a fee of 20 cents to the notary or justice taking the affidavit. The following is from Dr. Merriam's report:

"By virtue of this act about $90,000 has been paid in bounties during the year and a half that has elapsed since the law went into effect. This represents the destruction of at least 128,571 of the above-mentioned animals, most of which were hawks and owls.

"Granting that 5,000 chickens are killed annually in Pennsylvania by hawks and owls, and that they are worth 25 cents each—a liberal estimate in view of the fact that a large proportion of them are killed when very young—the total loss would be $1,250, and the killed in a year and a half would be worth $1,875. Hence it appears that during the past 18 months the State of Pennsylvania has expended $90,000 to save its farmers a loss of $1,875. But this estimate by no means represents the actual loss to the farmer and the taxpayer of the State. It is within bounds to say that in the course of a year every hawk and owl destroys at least a thousand mice or their equivalent in insects, and that each mouse or its equivalent so destroyed would cause the farmer a loss of 2 cents per annum. Therefore, omitting all reference to the enormous increase in the numbers of these noxious animals when nature's means of holding them in check has been removed, the lowest possible estimate of the value to the farmer of each hawk, owl, and weasel would be $20 a year, or $30 in a year and a half.

"Hence, in addition to the $90,000 actually expended by the State in destroying 128,571 of its benefactors, it has incurred a loss to its agricultural interests of at least $3,857,130, or a total loss of $3,947,130 in a year and a half, which is at the rate of $2,631,420 per annum. In other words, the State has thrown away $2,105 for every dollar saved. And even this does not represent fairly the full loss, for the slaughter of such a vast number of predacious birds and mammals is almost certain to be followed by a corresponding increase in the numbers of mice and insects formerly held in check by them, and it will take many years to restore the balance thus blindly destroyed through ignorance of the economic relations of our common birds and mammals.

"The legislators of Pennsylvania were not slow to see their mistake, and a State ornithologist was appointed, and through his efforts this ruinous and absurd law was soon repealed."

Practically all living animals of appreciable size as well as most plants that are visible to the unaided eye furnish food for certain insects. Other insects feed upon dead animals, dead trees, or other decaying animal or vegetable matter. A certain larva has been known even to tunnel into marble. Those insects which feed on live vegetation or living animals are capable of doing great harm if they increase unduly, while those that feed only on dead animals or dead and decaying vegetation may do good in nature, but may also do harm or be of great injury by destroying hides, furs, preserved meats, or clothing.

Birds afford a natural check upon the injurious insects, and wherever forests denote the presence of great numbers of destructive caterpillars or grasses indicate that grubs are destroying the grass roots the birds are not slow to assemble and help restore equilibrium.

Wilson Flagg says, after long years of study, that each species of bird performs certain services in the economy of nature, which can not be so well accomplished by any other species. There are millions of birds in the United States and the sun never passes across the heavens but what they all make some special effort to obtain food. A small per cent of this food in certain seasons is the food of man, and the bird is condemned for eating it, without even considering whether he has been of any service in saving the food from predaceous insects. But most of the food of birds is either injurious insects or noxious weed seeds, the very crops which when left alone give man more trouble than all else combined. It seems that we too often fail to see that we are dependent on birds for protection.

The white-throat sparrow, one of our common winter residents is preeminently a weed seed destroyer and is noted for its love of ragweed, smartweed, knotweed, bindweed, and other members of the polygonum genus. If we estimate that there are about 5 of these birds to the square mile in Georgia for 7 months in the year, from October till April, inclusive, there would be about 297,250 birds in the State, and if each bird ate an eighth of an ounce of weed seeds in a day this species alone would eat 37,156 ounces per day, or 2,322 pounds, or over a ton per day. Extend this over a period of 210 days and it makes 243 tons of these noxious weed seeds destroyed by the white throat alone each year. But this does not represent his worth to the farmer yet, for he eats insects also along with his other diet, and there are probably more individuals of this species in Georgia than I have represented. The robin, though a lover of cherries, feeds largely on the white grub, cutworms, grasshoppers, March flies, and ground beetles. Who shall point the finger of scorn or the loaded gun at him and say he is not worthy of life? One writer has said he is our most native and democratic bird.

Over a million dollars were expended in Massachusetts in less than 10 years to destroy the gypsy moth, and one Gen. Samuel C. Lawrence spent more than $75,000 on his place to get rid of the pest. It has been found recently that the natural enemies of this very predacious insect are largely birds, those which follow having been seen feeding upon the larvæ or caterpillars, viz, black-billed cuckoo, rose-breasted grosbeak, catbird, red-eyed vireo, yellow-throated vireo, and possibly the chickadee, black and white creeper, crow, blue-jay, phoebe, pewee, kingbird, towhee, scarlet tanager, chestnut-sided warbler, yellow warbler, downy woodpecker, redstart, Baltimore oriole, and yellow-billed cuckoo. Does it not pay better to protect the birds than to try artificial means for controlling such insects? Massachusetts thinks so, and has done everything to give the birds a fair showing.

The chickadee holds in check the tent caterpillar by eating the eggs.

The white-breasted nuthatch feeds largely on scale insects and their eggs.

The wood pewee feeds on moths, beetles, flies, gnats, mosquitos, and other small flying insects.

Robins and catbirds eat the famous cecropia moth, one of the worst enemies of groves and orchards.

The Mexican cotton boll weevil that has cost the United States Government so much money, probably about $1,000,000 in direct appropriations, and $5,000,000 to the growers in lessening the crop production, can not be controlled by man, but the following birds are proving almost a specific remedy against the weevil—six species of orioles, the nighthawk, the martin, the bank swallow, the barn swallow, the rough-wing, and the cliff swallow.

Many other species have been known to eat the weevil. Boys who are ever ready to kill with sling shot and pot-iron gun every bird that dares to rise before them are lessening the numbers of these birds every year.

The jay bird, the cuckoo, and the shrike are enemies of the smaller birds, but do more good in a day's work than they do harm. The English sparrow eats fewer insects than most other birds, and at the same time keeps more valuable birds from about towns and farm settlements.

Thus far I have brought to your attention only the purely economic relation of birds to the farm. Shall I not take a moment to prove that a knowledge of birds will bring greater reward even than this? Can we afford to close a paper on birds without suggesting their influence on human life? Perhaps we have not thought of all the factors that go to make strength of character. Nature, when understood, wields a powerful influence on human character.

In the early history of England, the Druids had for their temples of worship greenswarths overshadowed with large branching oaks and their hymns a mingling of the voices of nature during the day, while at night they listened silently to the music of the stars, and I often wonder if our modern methods of worship are more wholesome.

I approach this last phase of the subject with a considerable degree of enthusiasm, since, if my acquaintance with the birds has meant anything it has meant a heightening of my sense of the beautiful in nature. It has been the means of putting me in the proper attitude to enjoy nature. The bird adds beauty to the landscape and invests it with a personality. Nuttall says: "Of all the classes of animals by which we are surrounded in the ample field of nature, there are none more remarkable than the feathered inhabitants of the air. They play around us like fairy spirits, elude approach in an element which defies our pursuit, soar out of sight in the yielding sky, journey over our heads in marshaled ranks, dart like meteors in the sunshine of summer, or, seeking the recesses of the forest and the waters, they glide before us like beings of fancy."

Chapman says: "Birds because of their beauty, the charm of their songs, and the ease with which they may be observed, are doubtless the forms of animal life which first attract the young naturalist's attention. His interest in them gives evidence of an inborn love of nature. Too often this priceless gift is lost simply through lack of encouragement and instruction. Properly developed it should prove a never-failing source of pleasure and inspiration, if indeed its influence does not become the most potent factor in our lives."

Forbush says: "The beauty of birds, the music of their calls, the majesty of their soaring flight, the mystery of their migrations have ever been subjects of absorbing interest to the poets, artists, and nature lovers everywhere. Prominent among the undying memories of men are mental pictures of the birds of childhood, their coming in the spring, their nesting, and their chosen haunts. Many an exiled emigrant longs in vain to hear again the outpouring melody of the skylark as it soars above the fields of England."

May we not add that their songs now heard from the leafy groves and shadowy forests inspire delight or recollection of the pleasing past in every breast? How volatile; how playfully capricious. How musical and happy are these roving sylphs of nature, to whom the air, the earth, and the water are alike habitable.

The study is growing more popular every year, and once interested means to leave off many other kinds of sport. What is there to a game of tennis, or golf, or hockey? Health and nothing more. Per se, the game is nothing but momentary pastime. How different it is with bird study. Here you find health in your rambles and at the same time get an insight into the beauties of nature. To know the birds is to have useful resources of life. You become a friend of the birds and help protect them, and in this way prove a benefactor to the human race as well as to the bird race.

So inspiring have I found the pursuit of bird study that I have chosen to take a day with them many times instead of going to the circus or to the polls. For may we not serve better by catching a glimpse of nature's laws and help to vindicate them than to help elect to the modern political office? Again, does it not prove more satisfactory to see nature as it is than to stand around the offensive circus ring and watch and sympathize with caged animals and birds, and I had almost said people?

Literature is full of reference to birds, and every Bible reader well remembers the oft-quoted expression, "The voice of the turtle is heard in the land." Who has not heard the cooing of the dove has missed one of the finest treats nature has to offer.

Shakespeare makes over 600 references to birds and bird life, and in all literature from the earliest down to the present the bird holds a prominent place. The makers of literature are generally people who think and control the destinies of nations, and surely if they all have recognized the æsthetic value of the study of birds that is an additional reason why everybody should have some feeling for the study.

Shall I ever forget the old mulberry tree in our yard down on the farm, where I first learned to love the birds. My love for them at that time was mingled with savagery, for I always thought to have a crossbow or slingshot near at hand, and took advantage of the birds to develop, as Maurice Thompson would say, "The witchery of archery." But it was there that I learned to name most of the birds that visit southeast Georgia, and sometimes I long to live those days over. Now the old mulberry tree is almost a wreck and the birds seem not to visit there as they once did.

All young people are born naturalists, and for the safety of agriculture, horticulture, and floriculture, as well as forestry, should be trained in their early lives. Generally the uninstructed student of birds begins his study by making a collection of eggs, observes Mr. Chapman, without learning anything useful about the birds. With our bright-eyed youths bubbling over with enthusiasm and energy, how much good they may be led to accomplish by a few well-directed lessons on birds. One young chap who had not been properly trained boasted that he had robbed 10 robins' nests in one season, and the season was not over then.

Let us turn the tide and flood the little minds that are committed to our care with the sweet influences of bird music. Let us erect a monument of our fitness to lead in their memories by bringing to their attention before it is too late some of the best and most substantial avenues to happiness. Have we not seen from the record of other bird lovers that "he who, in the still forest of evening, harkens to the exquisite notes of the hermit thrush—that voice of nature, expressing in sweet cadences of pathos and ineffable mystery—experiences amid the falling shades of night emotions which must humble, chasten, and purify the most upright and virtuous of men."

Have you ever been to the woods to catch the first morning melody of the wood thrush or the hermit? Have you ever been out at midday in August and heard the indigo bunting repeat its tree-top strain for more than a half hour at a time? Have you ever been to the woods late in the afternoon and into the evening and heard the robin heavenward lift his evening hymn or the vesper sparrow sing her sweet farewell to the dying day? Have you ever heard the cheerful notes of the bluebird as she wended her way northward on a clear, cool March morning? Too few of us, I fear, have experienced these pleasures, and yet they are among the richest that heaven and earth offer.

Mr. MOSS of Indiana. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to revise and extend my remarks in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the gentleman's request?

There was no objection.

Mr. LAMB. Now, Mr. Speaker, I yield two minutes to the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. ANTHONY].

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Kansas [Mr. ANTHONY] is recognized for two minutes.

Mr. ANTHONY. Mr. Speaker, I hope the House will agree to this provision that has been inserted in the agricultural appropriation bill by the Senate.

To my mind there is no more important section in the bill than this one, which protects the insectivorous and weed-seed eating birds of this country from the destruction that now follows them from the northern to the southern border of this country. This is a measure that will be worth millions of dollars yearly to the farmers of this country, and, aside from its economic value, the element of protection to the game birds of this country should not be overlooked.

The wild pigeons, the ducks, and the geese that used to be counted by the millions in this country have been pursued and hunted from the time of their flight from the North to the South all during the winter, and then on their return in the springtime their flight from the Gulf of Mexico to the Lakes and watercourses of Canada in the mating season; they have been all but exterminated in every State of the Union, until now there is but a small remnant of those millions of game birds left to the country.

I hope the House will agree to this provision that has been inserted in the Senate and give effect to a measure that has been demanded by both the agriculturalists and the sportsmen of the country. [Applause.]

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. LAMB. Mr. Speaker, I yield one minute to the gentleman from Maryland [Mr. LINTHICUM].

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Maryland [Mr. LINTHICUM] is recognized for one minute.

Mr. LINTHICUM. Mr. Speaker, I am particularly interested in that provision in this measure giving the protection of the Federal Government to certain migratory game and insectivorous birds. It is an act of long-delayed justice toward the birds that awakens within me memories of youth, recalling a painful incident of boyhood, in which my attention was first directed to the thoughtless cruelties practiced on these little feathered friends, who add beauty and life to our fields and forests and perform an indispensable service in every agricultural community.

I remember when a lad on our old homestead in Anne Arundel County a family of wrens built them a nest on our place. Every year we looked forward to their coming and every year they appeared regularly, occupying their pleasant quarters, raising an interesting family of young. We boys on the farm became quite familiar with the wrens; we grew to regard them as friends and would look into their nest, count the little eggs deposited there, and admire the open-mouthed, hungry nestlings which finally emerged from the tiny shells. And the wrens, never being disturbed by us, did not appear to mind our familiarity in the least.

One hot summer day my brother and I, with a small colored boy who was our inseparable companion on our jaunts about the farm, were walking along when suddenly Mrs. Wren flew up on a fence near us. Almost simultaneously we three boys each caught up a stone and threw it at her. Our aim was all too true. Poor Mrs. Wren dropped limply in her tracks. I can yet remember the look of terror and dismay which came upon the faces of my brother and our colored companion as we beheld the fatal result of our act. We knew that in the nest she had just left there was a family of little wrens too young to feed themselves, who would wait in vain for their mother's return, finally to die of slow starvation. We tried by every means in our power to revive Mrs. Wren, but our efforts were unavailing. Too late we realized the tragedy of which we had been the authors.

I do not recall any act of my life attended with more poignant sorrow than my participation in this thoughtless crime of boyhood. With tear-stained faces we gazed at one another and the dead body of the mother bird lying before us. Then, as though moved by a common impulse, the three of us dropped on our knees and prayed God to forgive us for having murdered Mrs. Wren and brought this great calamity on her family. I do not know what was the fate of the little wrens, for we boys were too ashamed to ever mention our wanton act of cruelty to anyone, nor did we ever look into the wren's nest to see what became of her helpless little ones.

But the death of that mother wren was not in vain. The enormity of our offense was so thoroughly impressed on three young minds that never again was one of us guilty of like wrongdoing, and I am proud to say that ever afterwards my rôle was that of protector of the birds instead of destroyer of them. On my farm, "Twin Oaks," at Linthicum Heights, in Anne Arundel County, there is a small forest inhabited by birds, and I would almost as soon see my own cattle mistreated as these feathered friends who sojourn with me each year, adding beauty to my place, doing a most important work in destroying insects, and enlivening the landscape with their sweet melody.

As I grew older I learned the value of the birds. I found that they served a far more useful end than that of pleasing ornaments and rich music makers. I came to understand how God had created the world and all living things, giving man dominion over all, and how the birds, through destroying the insects, did a most necessary work and were of inestimable value to mankind. I saw that if there were no birds the worms and other insects would soon multiply so rapidly that they would destroy the vegetation of the earth and it would be impossible for the farmer to raise his crops.

OBJECT OF THIS MEASURE.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I shall be brief in stating my views upon this measure, which deals with a problem vital to our agricultural communities.

The provision now under discussion aims to give the protection of the National Government to migratory birds during breeding season. It has been shown that much good has followed the enactment of similar laws by many States of the Union. Those urging the present measure justly assume that if good has come from State legislation along this line, far greater good will follow the enactment and enforcement of this law by our National Government.

The protection of the wild life of our country is of the utmost importance. Who among us does not remember the pleasure afforded by these little friends of forests and fields? Who is so fortunate as not to recall some barbarous act performed against them in his younger days, whose only excuse is that he did not know better at the time? We should begin a campaign of education, teaching not only the pleasure to be had from a closer acquaintance with our bird friends, but also the benefits which the farmers derive from their presence. To many it has never occurred that man is the only living creature who takes life for sport or pleasure; others take life, but when they do so it is always for food or in self-defense—never for pleasure alone.

The history of our treatment of the birds presents a case in which man has not only taken life principally for pleasure, but in which in doing so he has cruelly butchered faithful little servants placed here to add color and life to the fields and forests, to fill the land with their glad songs, and to work for his interests all the long day.

Legislation alone will never assure that complete protection toward which this measure is a step. Real protection will come through educating our people to the value of the birds, that they may realize the part played by them and the other inhabitants of our forests and fields and streams as economic factors in our everyday life. Unless backed by strong sentiment and effective public cooperation, legislation will accomplish little.

The gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. WEEKS] has cited an example showing the inadequacy of the laws in many States. In some States many of these valuable migratory birds are not protected at all. In others hunters are prohibited from killing them during periods when the birds are not in those States at all and free to kill them when they are there. Now, when the inadequate legislation of one State results in destroying the natural rights of another State by depriving it of the presence and enjoyment and valuable services of the birds I think it time for Uncle Sam to step in and say, "Hands off, gentlemen; these birds belong to all the States, and I shall see that they are protected for all."

VALUE OF BIRDS.

Mr. William T. Hornaday, in his excellent work, Our Vanishing Wild Life, sagely observes:

The same kind of common sense that teaches men to go in when it rains and keep out of fiery furnaces teaches us that as a business proposition it is to man's interest to protect the birds. Make them plentiful and keep them so. When we strike the birds we hurt ourselves. The protection of our insect-eating and seed-eating birds is a cash proposition—protect or pay.

Were I a farmer no gun ever should be fired on my premises at any bird save the English sparrow and the three bad hawks. Any man who would kill my friend Bob White I would treat as an enemy. The man who would shoot and eat any of the song birds, woodpeckers, or shore birds that worked for me I would surely molest.

Illustrating the value of birds I quote from that splendid paper by Prof. R. J. H. de Loach on The Economic Value of Birds to the Farmers. He says:

The white-throat sparrow, one of our common winter residents, is preeminently a weed-seed destroyer and is noted for its love of ragweed, smartweed, knotweed, bindweed, and other members of the polygonum genus. If we estimate that there are about 5 of these birds to the square mile in Georgia for seven months, in the year, from October until April, inclusive, there would be about 297,250 birds in the State, and if each bird ate an eighth of an ounce of weed seeds in a day this species alone would eat 27,156 ounces per day, or 2,322 pounds, or over a ton per day. Extend this over a period of 210 days and it makes 243 tons of these noxious weed seeds destroyed by the white throat alone each year. But this does not represent his worth to the farmer yet, for he eats insects also along with his other diet, and there are probably more individuals of this species in Georgia than I have represented.

The chickadee returns to her brood about 200 times a day with not less than 25 plant lice each time for the young. It has been found that a cuckoo consumes daily from 50 to 400 caterpillars or their equivalent, while a chickadee will eat from 200 to 500 insects, or up to 4,000 insects or worm eggs. One hundred insects a day is a conservative estimate of the quantity consumed by each individual insectivorous bird. By carefully estimating the birds in several areas it had been found that in Massachusetts there are not less than the enormous total of 2,560,000,000 insects. Or better to express such figures in common measurements, 120,000 average insects fill a bushel measure. This means that the daily consumption of chiefly obnoxious insects in Massachusetts is about 21,000 bushels. This estimate is good for about five months in the year, May to September, inclusive; during the remainder of the year the insects, eggs, and larvæ destroyed by the winter, late fall, and early spring migrants will be equivalent to nearly half this quantity.

Prof. de Loach recites that—

Over a million dollars were expended in Massachusetts in less than 10 years to destroy the gypsy moth, and one Gen. Samuel C. Lawrence spent more than $75,000 on his place to get rid of the pest. It has been found recently that the natural enemies of this very predacious insect are largely birds, those which follow having been seen feeding upon the larvæ or caterpillars, viz, black-billed cuckoo, rose-breasted grosbeak, cutbird, red-eyed vireo, yellow-throated vireo, and possibly the chickadee, black and white creeper, crow, blue jay, phoebe, pewee, kingbird, towhee, scarlet tanager, chestnut-sided warbler, yellow warbler, downy woodpecker, redstart, Baltimore oriole, and yellow-billed cuckoo.

The chickadee holds in check the tent caterpillar by eating the eggs.

The white-breasted nuthatch feeds largely on scale insects and their eggs.

The wood pewee feeds on moths, beetles, flies, gnats, mosquitos, and other small flying insects.

Robins and catbirds eat the famous cecropia moth, one of the worst enemies of groves and orchards.

The Mexican cotton-boll weevil, that has cost the United States Government so much money, probably about $1,000,000 in direct appropriations and $5,000,000 to the growers in lessening the crop production, can not be controlled by man, but the following birds are proving almost a specific remedy against the weevil: Six species of orioles, the nighthawk, the martin, the bank swallow, the barn swallow, the rough wing, and the cliff swallow.

Many other species have been known to eat the weevil. Boys who are ever ready to kill with sling shot and pot-iron gun every bird that dares to rise before them are lessening the numbers of these birds every year.

According to Prof. de Loach, "Wilson Flagg says, after long years of study, that each species of bird performs certain services in the economy of nature, which can not be so well accomplished by any other species. There are millions of birds in the United States, and the sun never passes across the heavens but what they will make some special effort to obtain food. But most of the food of birds is either injurious insects or noxious weed seeds, the very crops of which when left alone give man more trouble than all else combined. It seems that we too often fail to see that we are dependent on birds for protection."

ROBIN REDBREAST.

When we know the bids better and learn to distinguish one species from another we grow to have our preferences just as we now have a stronger liking for one person than another, because of some prominent trait of character which appeals to us. And the better acquainted we get with the birds the more human-like we find them.

There is the robin with his red breast, stately and erect. Every time I see him there is suggested that poem of childhood, "Who killed cock robin?" Nor shall I ever forget the noble part he is assigned in that tragic tale of juvenile books, The Babes in the Wood. You will remember that after the cruel uncle, intrusted with their care, had abandoned the helpless children in the deep wood in order to destroy them and secure their lands, and death had sealed their eyes in peaceful sleep, it was the robins who tenderly covered them with golden-brown leaves of the forest, giving them a tomb which any king might envy.

The food of the robin is: Insects, 40 per cent; wild fruit, 43 per cent; cultivated fruit, 8 per cent; miscellaneous vegetable food, 5 per cent; yet, Mr. Hornaday tells us in his book on Our Vanishing Wild Life that in Louisiana, Mississippi, North Carolina, South Carolina, Tennessee, Texas, Florida, and our own State of Maryland the robin is legally shot and eaten. As indicating how they are slaughtered in some of these States, he tells of one small hamlet of Tennessee which "sent to market enough dead robins to return $500, at 5 cents per dozen; which means 120,000 birds."

THE MARTIN.

My grandfather found, soon after he settled in Anne Arundel County, that the black martins would chase away all crows and therefore was anxious to have them come and live on his place each year when they moved to our section of the country. Probably you have seen the martin. He is a very black bird, less than one-fifth the size of a crow, only infinitely more swift in his flight and a much better fighter. Unlike the crow, the martin is not destructive to anything about the farm. There are two kinds of martins, the black martin and the bee martin. The black martin is not a song bird; his language is a chatter, but he can spy a crow at the longest distance, and when he sees one he will dart after him making a noise which sounds like Zee! Zee! Zee! and Mr. Crow is very glad to seek other sections and escape his ferocious attacks.

Grandfather erected a large bird box for the black martins and welcomed them to his farm, and in this box they would settle each year—the whole family, a very numerous lot. Unlike the bee martin, which will make its nest almost any place, the black martins insist upon having a good home and will not come unless assured they can find comfortable quarters. In fact, so particular are they that each year they send out scouts in advance to locate homes. These scouts go to the places to which the martins contemplate moving and return to the family and report if good quarters can be obtained, and if a good home can not be had the black martins will go elsewhere.

After grandfather died my father occupied his farm and we learned more about the martins. One year after the martin family left, the sparrow family moved into the bird house. My father did not notice that the martins' quarters were occupied by the sparrows, or else he neglected to clean them out, for the scouts of the martins who came found the bird house occupied by the sparrows, and so the martins did not come at all that year. We missed them greatly, and next year father took care that the sparrow family was moved out early in the spring, so that when the martin scouts came they would find everything in readiness for occupancy. The scouts who came that year evidently made a favorable report, for one morning not many days later we folks at the house heard great chattering and excitement near the bird box and knew that the martin family had arrived.

THE BOBWHITE.

I can not better describe man's ungrateful treatment of one of his faithful bird friends than by here recording Mr. Hornaday's reference to the bobwhite:

And take the bobwhite quail, for example, and the weeds of the farm. To kill weeds costs money—hard cash that the farmer earns by toil. Does the farmer put forth strenuous efforts to protect the bird of all birds that does most to help him keep down the weeds? Far from it! All that the average farmer thinks about the quail is of killing it, for a few ounces of meat on the table.

It is fairly beyond question of all birds that influence the fortunes of the farmers and fruit growers of North America, the common quail, or bobwhite, is one of the most valuable. It stays on the farm all the year round. When insects are most numerous and busy, bobwhite devotes to them his entire time. He cheerfully fights them from 16 to 18 hours per day. When the insects are gone, he turns his attention to the weeds that are striving to seed down the fields for another year. Occasionally he gets a few grains of wheat that have been left on the ground by the reapers, but he does no damage.

The following are records of single individual meals of bobwhite:

Of grasshoppers, 84; chinch bugs, 100; squash bugs, 12; army worm, 12; cutworm, 12; mosquitoes, 568 in three hours; cotton boll weevil, 47; flies, 1,350; rose slugs, 1,286. Miscellaneous insects consumed by a laying hen quail, 1,532, of which 1,000 were grasshoppers.

F. M. Howard, of Beeville, Tex., wrote to the United States Bureau of Entomology that the bobwhites shot in his vicinity had their crops filled with the weevils. Another farmer reported his cotton fields full of quail, and an entire absence of weevils.

And yet, because of its few pitiful ounces of flesh, 2,000,000 gunners and 10,000 lawmakers think of the quail only as a bird that can be shot and eaten. Throughout a great portion of its former range, including New York and New Jersey, the species is surely and certainly on the verge of total extinction.

Mr. Hornaday concludes his remarks on bobwhite by proposing the following toast, dedicated "To my friend, the Epicure":

The next time you regale a good appetite with blue points, terrapin stew, filet of sole, and saddle of mutton, touched up here and there with the high lights of rare old sherry, rich claret, and dry monopole, pause as the dead quail is laid before you, on a funeral pyre of toast, and consider this: "Here lies the charred remains of the farmers' ally and friend, poor bobwhite. In life he devoured 145 different kinds of bad insects and the seeds of 129 anathema weeds. For the smaller pests of the farm he was the most marvelous engine of destruction that God ever put together of flesh and blood. He was good, beautiful, and true; and his small life was blameless. And here he lies, dead; snatched away from his field of labor and destroyed, in order that I may be tempted to dine three minutes longer, after I have already eaten to satiety."

LOSSES FROM INSECTS.

According to an official report in the Yearbook of the Department of Agriculture for 1904, the table here shown gives the annual values of farm products in the United States and losses chargeable to insect pests:

Product.	Value.	Percentage of loss.	Amount of loss.
Cereals	$2,000,000,000	10	$200,000,000
Hay	530,000,000	10	53,000,000
Cotton	600,000,000	10	60,000,000
Tobacco	53,000,000	10	5,300,000
Truck crops	265,000,000	20	53,000,000
Sugars	50,000,000	10	5,000,000
Fruits	135,000,000	20	27,000,000
Farm forests	110,000,000	10	11,000,000
Miscellaneous crops	58,000,000	10	5,800,000
Total	3,801,000,000	.....	420,100,000
Animal products	1,750,000,000	10	175,000,000
Natural forests and forest products	.....	.....	100,000,000
Products in storage	.....	.....	100,000,000
Grand total	5,551,000,000	.....	795,100,000

Says Mr. Hornaday:

The millions of the insect world are upon us. The birds fight them for us, and when the birds are numerous and have nestlings to feed the number of insects they consume is enormous. They require absolutely nothing at our hands save the privilege of being let alone while they work for us. In fighting the insects our only allies in nature are the song birds, woodpeckers, shore birds, swallows, and martins, certain hawks, moles, shrews, bats, and a few other living creatures. All these wage war at their own expense. The farmers might just as well lose $8,250,000 through a short apple crop as to pay out that sum in labor and materials in spraying operations. And yet, fools that we are, we go on slaughtering our friends, and allowing others to slaughter them, under the same brand of fatuous folly that leads the people of Italy to build anew on the smoking sides of Vesuvius after a dozen generations have been swept away by fire and ashes.

Of the value of the birds to our fields, orchards, and forests this same writer adds:

Millions of Americans and near Americans, both old and young, now need to be shown the actual figures that represent the value of our birds as destroyers of the insects, weeds, and the small rodents that are swarming to overrun and devour our fields, orchards, and forests. Will our people never learn that in fighting pests the birds are worth ten times more to men than all the poisons, sprays, and traps that ever were invented or used?

We can not spray our forests; and if the wild birds do not protect them from insects nothing will. If you will watch a warbler collecting the insects out of the top of a 70-foot forest oak, busy as a bee hour after hour, it will convince you that the birds do for the forests that which man with all his resources can not accomplish. You will then realize that to this country every woodpecker, chickadee, titmouse, creeper, and warbler is easily worth its weight in gold.

WHEN THE BIRDS ARE GONE.

What happens when the birds are destroyed is well shown in an article in the Zoological Society Bulletin for January, 1909, from Richard Walter Tomalin, of Sydney, New South Wales.

In the subdistricts of Robertson and Kangaloon, in the Illawarra district of New South Wales, what 10 years ago was a waving mass of English cocksfoot and rye grass, which had been put in gradually as the dense vine scrub was felled and burnt off, is now a barren desert, and 9 families out of every 10 which were renting properties have been compelled to leave the district and take up other lands. This is through the grubs having eaten out the grass by the roots. Plowing proved to be useless, as the grubs ate out the grass just the same. Whilst there recently I was informed that it took three years from the time the grubs were first seen until to-day to accomplish this complete devastation; in other words, three years ago, the grubs began work in the beautiful country of green mountains and running streams. The birds had all been ruthlessly shot and destroyed in that district, and I was amazed at the absence of bird life.

Prof. de Loach tells us that—

Birds afford a natural check upon the injurious insects, and wherever forests denote the presence of great numbers of destructive caterpillars or grasses indicate that grubs are destroying the grass roots the birds are not slow to assemble and help restore equilibrium.

He further says:

Our native birds are one of the Nation's most valuable assets. Destroy them, and in a comparatively short time the insects will have multiplied to such an extent that trees will be denuded of their foliage, plants will cease to thrive, and crops can not be raised.

BIRDS AND THEIR FRIENDS.

Whoever will take the trouble to study the birds is sure to become a strong defender of them. Not only do they work ceaselessly in man's interests but they exert an influence on his life that brings him into harmony and closer touch with all nature. With glad song they fill his world with brightness and joy and give ornament and motion to the land. Our woods and fields would indeed be dull and silent without them.

Audubon, the greatest ornithologist the world ever produced, traveled to the desolate coast of Labrador to study bird life, and there "was far happier than any king ever was." His writings are termed by critics "the greatest monument that art ever erected to nature." It is said that "so enthusiastic was he and such a master of English that many of his descriptions are poems."

Nuttall, the great botanist, was also an ornithologist, a contemporary of Audubon, and wrote most entertainingly and truly of bird songs.

Burroughs and other writers have written of the birds in a popular way and have done immense good in getting everyday people interested in their life and habits. And, after all, it is the cooperation of everyday people that we seek. In fact, it is that very class this measure aims to restrain. We should educate every American to understand that our real friends are the birds and that it is as foolish and harmful to hurt or destroy them as it would be to cut off our fingers.

I shall vote for this measure, and I hope that those who prize the welfare of our agricultural communities and all lovers of nature will vote for it also. It is a tardy step toward protecting these children of the fields and forest who, during the long years they have been the objects of our ferocity and the recipients of our ingratitude, have never ceased to work faithfully for us. A happy day has come when man has at last opened his eyes to the beauty and value and worth of these little creatures which Providence, in its infinite wisdom, placed here to do the important work for which they were created. Not only do they perform a work most essential to man's material well-being but give pleasure to his eyes and music to his ears.

Mr. LAMB. I yield to the gentleman from California [Mr. KAHN].

Mr. KAHN. Mr. Speaker, I heartily favor the amendment under discussion. Many varieties of migratory game and insectivorous birds are nearing extinction. The game birds provide a source of food supply which ought to be conserved as much as possible. While nearly every State in the Union has enacted game laws to protect wild ducks, brant, snipe, plover, wild pigeons, and other varieties, it has been conclusively shown by the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. WEEKS] that in many instances the closed seasons occur after the migratory fowl have left the State in which the law is in force. This Government is spending approximately $5,000,000 a year in the cause of conservation of our forests. This Government is spending thousands of dollars a year to protect the cotton boll against destruction by the weevil. This very bill carries over $40,000 for the protection of orchard and other fruit trees against diseases, and nearly $30,000 for the control of diseases of forest and ornamental trees and shrubs. There is also an item of $25,000 for the control of diseases of cotton, truck, and forage crops, and related plants.

It seems to me, Mr. Speaker, that it is just as important to protect the various varieties of migratory game and insectivorous birds in their passage from one State to another as it is to protect inanimate things like trees and shrubs and plants. I remember when I was a boy wild mallard or canvasback ducks in California were so plentiful that they sold in the markets as low as $2 and $2.50 per dozen. To-day they cost that much per pair. The fact that they have become scarce by reason of the enormous slaughter that has been going on for many years has added materially to their price. This destruction of game birds is another feature in the problem of the high cost of living.

I believe this legislation to be timely and necessary, and I hope that it will become part of the Agriculture appropriation bill.

Mr. WEEKS. I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD.

There was no objection.

Mr. LAMB. Mr. Speaker, how much time have I remaining?

The SPEAKER. One minute and a half.

Mr. LAMB. I will ask the gentleman on the other side to use some of his time.

Mr. COX. I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. SISSON].

Mr. SISSON. Mr. Speaker, I call the attention of the House first to the property rights involved in this bill. When we get properly in our minds the property rights involved every man in the House who has ever studied law for one minute will realize that the Federal Government has absolutely no jurisdiction in this matter.

Mr. WEEKS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SISSON. I have not time to yield. The gentleman had 10 minutes. I want to say to the gentleman that I am afraid his education and training have been erroneous and in the wrong school, so far as the Federal Government is concerned, if he does not at once appreciate the principles involved. All young lawyers when they first enter the law school are taught that the property in all wild animals, or, as the technical phrase is feræ naturæ, is in all the people of a particular government. In the beginning of this Government all of the wild animals belonged to the colonies by the common law, and that is a part of the law of this land, and the property in all of these animals and all of the birds is now in the people of the States. This bill in express terms endeavors to deprive the people of the States of their property in these birds. In the first place, the birds feed upon the property of the people of the States, and a man has no property in a wild animal or a bird until he has it in custody or until he has brought it to the ground, and then it becomes his own.

But another question to my mind more serious even than the constitutionality of the measure—because many men do not view the Constitution with the same reverence that I do, when they pledge themselves at that desk to support it—when we take into consideration the cost of administering this law, the gentleman seeks to avoid it by saying that it will be executed in conjunction with the States. Nobody believes that. Nobody believes this law will be executed through the State officials; and in order that you may keep surveillance of all the birds in their migratory flight, and as they stop on their way from the South to the North, or from the North to the South, means a multiplication of Federal officers.

And there is another feature that has been lost sight of, so far as the discussion of this bill is concerned, and that is that in line 5, page 57, down to line 12, on the same page, you find the right given the Agricultural Department to make regulations which shall be promulgated by the Secretary of Agriculture and after three months they become a part of the criminal laws of the United States.

Mr. DIES. Does not the gentleman think that a farmer whose crops are being depredated upon by birds should be allowed to kill them in defense of his crops?

Mr. BARTLETT. No.

Mr. SISSON. Under this bill no farmer, whatever damage may be done to his crop, would be authorized to destroy any bird. It would not matter how many birds were on his farm, he would not have the right to destroy that which was destroying his farm and depriving him of his property, thus depriving him of that right which every man has, not only under the common law but under the laws of all the States, to protect himself against depredations which are being actually committed.

But especially do I call the attention of the House to the language on page 57, from lines 5 to 11, where there is a most unreasonable provision, that the regulations of the Secretary of Agriculture shall become a part of the criminal laws of this country.

In order that I may convince the House of the correctness of my position, I will cite the following decisions:

The point is settled by the case of Greer v. State of Connecticut (161 U. S., 519). A statute of Connecticut, while providing an open season for the killing of birds, made it an offense to have the birds in possession with intention to procure their transportation beyond the limits of the State. The offense with which Greer was charged was the possession of game birds for the purpose of transporting them beyond the State, although they had been lawfully killed within the State. The Supreme Court of Connecticut sustained the conviction, and the case was carried to the Supreme Court of the United States upon the claim that the Connecticut statute was repugnant to the commerce clause of the Constitution of the United States. In stating the case, Mr. Justice White said that the sole question was whether the State of Connecticut had "the power to regulate the killing of game within her borders so as to confine its use to the limits of the State and forbid its transmission outside of the State." (161 U. S., 522.)

He said (p. 522):

"The solution of the question involves a consideration of the nature of the property in game and the authority which the State had a right lawfully to exercise in relation thereto. From the earliest traditions the right to reduce animals feræ naturæ to possession has been subject to the control of the law-giving powers."

The learned justice then examines the law of Greece, Rome, France, Germany, and England. At page 527 he says:

"The practice of the Government of England from the earliest time to the present has put into execution the authority to control and regulate the taking of game."

This authority, he says, passed to the Colonies, and then to the States. Citing many American cases, he says, at page 528:

"The adjudicated cases recognizing the right of the State to control and regulate the common property in game are numerous."

At page 529 he says:

"The common ownership and its resulting responsibility in the State are thus stated in a well-considered opinion of the Supreme Court of California: 'The wild game within a State belongs to the people in their collective sovereign capacity. It is not the subject of private ownership, except in so far as the people may elect to make it so, and they may, if they see fit, absolutely prohibit the taking of it or any traffic and commerce in it if deemed necessary for its protection or preservation or the public good.'

At page 530 he says:

"In view of the authority of the State to affix conditions to the killing and sale of game, predicated as is this power on the peculiar nature of such property and its common ownership by all the citizens of the State, it may well be doubted whether commerce is created by an authority given by a State to reduce game within its borders to possession, provided such game be not taken, when killed, without the jurisdiction of the State. The common ownership imports the right to keep the property, if the sovereign so chooses, always within its jurisdiction for every purpose. The qualification which forbids its removal from the State necessarily entered into and formed part of every transaction on the subject and deprived the mere sale or exchange of these articles of that element of freedom of contract and of full ownership which is an essential attribute of commerce."

At page 532 he says:

"The power of the State to control the killing of and ownership in game being admitted, the commerce in game, which the State law permitted, was necessarily only internal commerce, since the restriction that it should not become the subject of external commerce went along with the grant and was a part of it. All ownership in game killed within the State came under this condition, which the State had the lawful authority to impose, and no contracts made in relation to such property were exempt from the law of the State consenting that such contracts be made, provided only they were confined to internal and did not extend to external commerce."

The point of the decision is emphasized in the dissenting opinions of Mr. Justice Field and Mr. Justice Harlan, who were of opinion that the game was property and, therefore, an article of commerce because it had been lawfully killed. The decision of the court proceeded upon the ground that the game was not property and, therefore, not an article of commerce and the statute of the State forbidding its transportation beyond the State was, consequently, not repugnant to the commerce clause of the Constitution of the United States.

On the same ground the court, in New York ex rel. Silz v. Hesterberg (211 U. S., 31), held that a statute of New York making it an offense to have possession of game within the State during the closed season, although it had been lawfully taken in foreign countries during the open season there, was not repugnant to the Constitution of the United States. Geer v. Connecticut, supra, was followed and applied. In concluding his opinion, Mr. Justice Day said, at page 43:

"The New York Court of Appeals further held that the so-called Lacey Act (31 Stat., 187, ch. 553, U. S. Comp. Stat., 1901, p. 290) relieved the regulation of the objection in question because of the consent of Congress to the passage of such laws concerning such commerce, interstate and foreign, within the principles upon which the Wilson Act was sustained by this court. Re Rahrer (Wilkinson v. Rahrer, 140 U. S., 545).

"In the aspect in which the game law of New York is now before this court we think it was a valid exertion of the police power, independent of any authorization thereof by the Lacey Act, and we shall therefore not stop to examine the provisions of that act."

In Rupert v. United States (181 Fed., 87), in the Circuit Court of Appeals for the Eighth Circuit, decided March 5, 1910, a conviction under the Lacey Act was sustained, the court saying at page 90:

"Quail belong to the State or Territory, or rather to the people collectively thereof, and are subject to the local laws as to killing and the times therefor and the shipment. These propositions have been put at rest by the Supreme Court. (Geer v. Connecticut, 161 U. S., 519; Lawton v. Steele, 152 U. S., 133.) It is for the State legislature to say when quail may be killed. It may provide that they shall not be killed at any time. It may provide that they may be killed for use at home only and not killed for shipment out of the State, which, if allowed, would result in the extinguishment locally of such game. And no one doubts the validity of game laws which prohibit killing of game on the lands of another. It is quite likely that every State of the Union has such laws, and such was the common law. The individual having no ownership in the game and allowed at certain times, if at all, to kill the same at certain places for particular uses only, it does not become the general subject of commerce free from all inhibitions."

Mr. COX. I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. BARTLETT].

Mr. HARDWICK. Mr. Speaker, I raise the point of order that there is no quorum present.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Georgia raises the point of order that there is no quorum present. The Chair will count. [After counting.] One hundred and ninety-five Members, a quorum, are present.

Mr. BARTLETT. Mr. Speaker, I have no objection to the exercise of proper power to control and regulate the killing or trapping of game birds or the protection of some birds, whether they are migratory or local. My State and a number of States have in the exercise of that power granted to them by the people and reserved to them in the convention that made the Constitution of the United States regulated strictly the killing of game and all kinds of birds. It is against this unusual extraordinary attempt to exercise the power by the Federal Congress that I propose to suggest that Congress has not the power.

I apprehend, Mr. Speaker, that never since the Congress assembled did a bill ever find its way into the Congress using such extraordinary, unusual, and remarkable language as does this bill. It says, after describing the character of birds migratory in character that pass from one State to another—are hereafter deemed to be within the custody and protection of the Government of the United States and shall not be destroyed or taken contrary to the regulations hereafter provided for.

We have invaded the rights of the States, we have gone and seized the police power in many instances, but it is left to the officers provided for in this bill to extend their arms and gather the birds of the air under the commerce clause of the Constitution of the United States, so that they not only control them but declare them to be in the custody of the United States when they never have been in the custody of anyone else.

Mr. WEEKS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BARTLETT. I can not. Why, Mr. Speaker, even under kings and monarchs, it never was pretended or believed that these animals, feræ naturæ, belonged to anybody except to the man that captured them and reduced them to possession. I have in my hand a decision of the Supreme Court of the United States of Geer against the State of Connecticut which upheld the State of Connecticut in its right to protect game of all sorts, migratory and local. The syllabus in that case is as follows:

The provision in the General Statutes of Connecticut (revision of 1888, sec. 2546) that "no person shall at any time kill any woodcock, ruffled grouse, or quail for the purpose of conveying the same beyond the limits of this State, or shall transport or have in possession, with intent to procure the transportation beyond said limits, any of such birds killed within this State" is legislation which it is within the constitutional power of the legislature of the State to enact.

Mr. Speaker, I protest against this innovation of the Constitution and the rights of the peoples in the States and all the people thereof. [Applause.]

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Georgia has expired.

Mr. COX. Mr. Speaker, how much time have I remaining?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman has five minutes.

Mr. COX. Mr. Speaker, let no man be deceived when he votes for this bill; let him understand that he is voting for the most far-reaching measure that in my judgment was ever offered to the Congress of the United States. Let him who believes to-day there is one particle of power reserved to the States under the Constitution, when he votes for this bill, ever afterwards be estopped from standing on the floor of this House and complaining in behalf of the doctrine of State rights. It is a pity that this House can not have more time in which to discuss this bill. It is objectionable from many, many standpoints. Remember, gentlemen, that when you come to vote for this bill you are not voting for a law passed by Congress. You are voting for a bill that gives the Secretary of Agriculture the power to make the law. You are granting a bureau in this department the right to make rules and regulations that will come home to roost upon your citizens. How are you going to enforce it? Why, there is no question in the world but what in less than 10 years there will be an army of inspectors traveling all over this country designated as deputy United States marshals, for the purpose of enforcing this measure. I hold in my hand the hearings had before the Forestry Committee of the Senate and the entire bulk of the argument was, not for insectivorous birds, but for the game birds. Who appeared before the committee? Who has read the hearings before that committee? I undertook to get a copy of the hearings before the Agricultural Committee, which considered a similar measure, and I was told that there were none. Who appeared for this bill before the Senate? He who has read the hearings knows that one of the attorneys for the American Game Bird Association in this country came before the committee and undertook to argue the constitutionality of the question, and he did not succeed. There is not a letter or line in the Constitution on which to hang it.

Mr. WEEKS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. COX. For a question.

Mr. WEEKS. The gentleman has raised the point that there was no representative before the committee. There were representatives of 44 States before the Agriculture Committee.

Mr. COX. Oh, Mr. Speaker, I can not yield for a statement, I yielded for a question. The Boone and Crockett Club, a corporation or company organized in the State of New York, appeared here, and not one word did the representatives say in behalf of insectivorous birds. But all their argument was for game birds. Let me appeal to you gentleman from the South. Do not be caught on this pin hook.

Mr. LAMB. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. COX. I refuse to yield. Do not be caught on this pin hook, with the arguments that these insectivorous birds will destroy your boll weevil, and for that reason you ought to support it. You have come to Congress, and Congress has granted you $1,500,000 to exterminate the boll weevil. Why have you not found out heretofore that these insectivorous birds would do that?

And to-day it is admitted that nothing has been found that will exterminate the boll weevil, and yet men stand on the floor or this House and insist that these insectivorous birds will destroy the weevil. This is not so, no one believes it for a moment. If it be so, the Southern States engaged in growing cotton, lying as they do contiguous to each other, and extremely interested in the preservation of cotton from the ravages of the weevil, long ago would have enacted uniform bird laws and rigorously and religiously enforced them.

No one appeared for this bill before the Senate committee except sportsmen, men interested in game birds, such as wild geese, ducks, cranes, and so forth, and scarcely a word was said before that committee in favor of the birds which perhaps might do the farmers some little good in destroying the insects which prey upon the products of the fields.

The whole bill is a delusion and a snare. It would have been impossible to put this bill through, simply to protect the game bird, and in order to get it through they had to couple with it a provision about which the fathers of this measure care nothing whatever. Who is the Boone and Crockett Club? Where is it? What was it organized for? It was founded in 1887 by ex-President Roosevelt, and Mr. Sheldon who appeared before the Senate committee in favor of the measure said that the proposed measure was advocated by this club for the conservation of big game, forest reserves, and perhaps it was responsible for big-game refuges. Mr. Sheldon of course was, and is, an ardent advocate of this measure, because he is a member of the Boone and Crockett Club, and no doubt in the world but what this club is in favor of the pending measure, because they are genuine sportsmen.

This ardent advocate laments long and loud concerning big game fast disappearing because he says that members of clubs like the Boone and Crockett Club no longer hunt on foot, or on horseback, but hunt in automobiles, and in fact one of the complaints against the depletion of game is because men do hunt in automobiles. Not many men in this country, compared with the total population, have much time to hunt for pleasure; most of them are rigorously employed in trying to earn a little bread and meat instead of going on pleasure jaunts and trips, slaying, slaughtering, and killing game.

The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. GRAHAM] a few moments ago hit the keynote of the entire situation when he said that he had just received a telegram from the State of Illinois announcing the fact that 100,000 sportsmen in the State of Illinois were in favor of this measure. I have no doubt but what every sportsman and every gentleman of leisure throughout the country is ardently in favor of it, and their desire is that the big game of this country be protected at the expense of the people solely for the purpose of gratifying their pleasures during their leisure hours.

No one knows and no one dares prophesy how much this bill will cost to enforce it, and if it is not enforced it will be a dead letter on the statute books. Let no one comfort himself, however, with the hope that this bill will never be enforced, because the sportsmen throughout the country will see to it that it will be enforced. I do not believe that the farmers of this country are willing to be taxed not less than $1,000,000 per year to enforce its provisions to the end that the sportsmen from the great cities and centers of population may during their leisure hours have an enjoyable time at the people's expense. I have called attention to the fact that we are not voting for a law. We are voting to give a great department—Agriculture Department—complete and plenary power to make rules and regulations, and which when made and promulgated these rules and regulations shall become the law. And under these rules and regulations a farmer or a farmer's boy can, and no doubt will, be hauled into Federal courts and there prosecuted, compelled to pay a fine, and languish in jails or prisons for having violated a rule or regulation of the Agriculture Department, and this, perchance, only for having killed a crow or a sparrow. And all this to satisfy the whims and caprices of the sportsmen of the country. This should well be denominated a sportsmens' bill pure and simple instead of a bill to protect the birds. It is a measure in disguise, is loaded, but the people in the last analysis will be called upon to pay the bill without any corresponding benefit to them.

The hearings disclose the fact, no secret about it whatever, that their intention is to employ and appoint deputy United States marshals to enforce its provisions. The people may think they are for it, but when they wake up and find a deputy United States marshal in every county of the United States, at a salary of from $1,200 to $1,800, and in addition his per diem allowance at not less than $2 per day, they will realize that they have been buncoed, and buncoed by the "smart set" who live in cities, live luxurious lives, with nothing to employ their time except hunting, fishing, and sporting.

On the question of enforcing the law, while Mr. Pierson, one of its advocates was before the committee, this question was propounded to him, "Suppose this bill become a law, how are you going to enforce it?" He answered, "One way would be to have United States marshals deputized for the purpose."

He was further asked, "You would have to have a great many marshals and game wardens in every State?" To this he answered, "Yes." Further examination was as follows: "It would require an army of men?" Answer: "Would it not be possible to deputize various State officers to act as deputy wardens?" Question: "It is a question whether the State officers would accept the commission without pay." Answer: "That, of course, is a very pertinent question and one that will have to be faced."

So there is no concealment among the authors of this measure as to how they propose to enforce its provisions. Their plan is plain and simple—by appointing deputy United States marshals to do the work. Already the game wardens of the State are costing the States many hundreds of thousands of dollars, and along by the side of the State game wardens will travel a Federal game warden, looking around and seeing where he can find some poor unfortunate individual to arrest, because he must make a showing, and he will be imbued with the idea that the only way to make a showing is to arrest some farmer or farmer's boy, haul him off to the Federal court, and impose a fine or penalty upon him. This bill is but the inroad and the beginning of other and more dangerous bills yet to follow, to everlastingly destroy the rights of States, build a strong centralized Government, and annihilate and destroy the Government of the United States. It is a mere waste of time and a waste of breath and energy to stand upon the floor of this House and undertake to discuss a question along constitutional lines. But the time will come, I know not when, when the people will wish they had harkened and listened to the voice of the Constitution.

This bill is unwise and iniquitous and never should be passed, for the reason that it delegates all power to the executive arm of the Government, that it is unconstitutional, that it usurps the powers of the States reserved by them under the Constitution, and that it is an interference by the Federal Government with the police powers belonging to the States.

Mr. SMITH of New York. Mr. Speaker, ever since the second year of George Washington's first term as President of the United States the State of New York has extended a protecting arm over migratory birds. In 1791 the New York Legislature passed a law establishing a closed season for woodcock, and ever since that date the policy of game protection, and especially of song-bird protection, has been marching triumphantly onward, until at the present time New York has the distinction of having a more enlightened code of game laws and of enforcing them with greater strictness than any other State in the Union. Few inhabitants of the Empire State realize the scope of their own wild-life problem. Each year the State spends close to $300,000 for the protection and propagation of fish and game. It has in its employ 125 game protectors, at a salary of $1,500 each per year, who devote their entire time to the prevention of violations of the game law and apprehension and punishment of those who violate it. In 1912 more than $50,000 in fines and penalties were collected by the State conservation commission, and the 160,000 who annually pay their dollar for a hunting license realize that except for this protection the wild life with which the rural and wooded districts now teem would long since have been extinct.

In 1912 the State also planted 130,000,000 fish in the streams and waters of the State. Its game farm distributed, free of charge, thousands of pheasant chicks and many more thousands of pheasant eggs to stock the covers of the Commonwealth. The deer in the Adirondack Mountains and in the Catskills have been so well protected and their natural enemies have been so completely exterminated that deer are now more numerous in the State of New York than at any time since the white man penetrated north of Albany, and this despite the fact that New York last year stood third among the States of the Union in the number of deer killed by hunters.

It will be evident from these facts, Mr. Speaker, that the wild-life problem has engaged the serious attention of the State of New York; but I want to call the attention of this House to some of the more advanced and progressive measures which prove that in advocating this bill, as so many of the citizens of New York have done, they are acting with no selfish purpose in view. I have advanced these facts to show that the inhabitants of my State are only asking the Federal Government to do for others what for almost a century and a quarter New Yorkers have been doing for themselves. It is obvious that New York, single-handed and alone, can not protect the migratory game and song birds, for the protection of which the nation-wide sentiment has made itself felt in this House.

Practically, since the Civil War it has been a criminal offense to shoot song birds and other insectivorous birds within the State of New York. To-day every schoolboy knows that the robin, the bluebird, the thrush, the meadow lark, and all the other feathered songsters that make the country air glorious with their melody are his friends and your friends, and he recognizes that they have just as good a right to life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness as he has.

For long years New York has been protecting with a strong arm ducks and swan and geese and brant during their mating season and during the flight to their nesting grounds. No New Yorker may shoot a duck after the 10th day of January, and what is the result of this? It is that these wild creatures know as well as you and I do that they are immune from molestation, and during the past few winters Great South Bay, Shinnecock Bay, and even Oyster Bay, to say naught of our inland lakes and our great boundary waters, Lake Erie and Lake Ontario, have been the homes of greater and greater flocks of migratory wild fowl. More and more are they found on the nesting grounds, which before the prohibition of spring shooting were being rapidly abandoned.

The establishment of closed seasons and the enforcement of good laws have done much for the native game of New York State; but, as I have already pointed out, New York could do relatively little single handed to protect the wanderers which visit her for a time and then fly now north, now south, were it not for the fact that two years ago she placed upon her statute books the most beneficent game law that has ever been written in this country. At one stroke the Bayne-Blauvelt law stopped once and for all the sale of game. New York stopped, Mr. Speaker, not only the sale of her own game, but the game from your State and the game from the State of the gentleman from Wyoming [Mr. MONDELL] and the game from every other State in this Union. It is impossible to buy within the borders of the State of New York the meat of a single American game bird or animal. What was the effect of this law, Mr. Speaker? The effect, the instantaneous effect, was that the market hunter, the man who my friend Dr. Hornaday calls the "game hog," was in a flash deprived of his most voracious and most profitable market. A great blow for the protection of migratory birds had been struck. Some of my friends in Maryland and some of my friends in North Carolina told me that before the Bayne-Blauvelt nonsale of game law was a week old the price of ducks in those States had fallen to less than one-half of what it had been before. The hungry crowd along the "Great White Way," the great hotels which cater to this great crowd, have roared and protested in vain, and no one in the State of New York would ever dream of rescinding this beneficent measure, which has accomplished its purpose so thoroughly and so completely.

The preservation of these wild creatures is a sacred duty. Great as has been the victories in some States of the army of defense, they have not sufficed to keep pace with or offset the ravages of the army of destruction, with its ever more deadly arms and ammunition.

Mr. Speaker, I have pondered over this problem long and thoughtfully. I have spoken with men who have made a life study of this question, and I have been convinced as strongly as I was ever convinced of anything that the only instrumentality that can protect what has been eloquently called the "remnant of our wild life" and preserve it for generations yet to come is the long, strong arm of our National Government.

Mr. AYRES. Mr. Speaker, I merely want to say that I am heartily in favor of any proper measure for the protection of the migratory birds of the United States. The humane societies of the entire country have joined in an effort to give these feathered friends of ours protection from their enemies. The sentiment of the great majority of our citizens is undoubtedly in this direction.

Mr. EDWARDS. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. PEPPER. I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. LAMB. Mr. Speaker, I yield the balance of my time to the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. MCLAUGHLIN], a member of the committee.

Mr. McLAUGHLIN. Mr. Speaker, it is true that this bill has not been considered on the floor of the House, but it has received a great deal of consideration, and the charge that the Members are not well informed respecting it is not true. It was fully considered in the Senate. Very extensive hearings before the Committee on Agriculture were had, and notwithstanding what the gentleman from Indiana says those hearings were printed. As the gentleman from Massachusetts says, representatives from 44 States have appeared before the committees of the House and Senate, all in favor of this bill.

Mr. ANTHONY. The governors of 30 States indorsed it.

Mr. McLAUGHLIN. Mr. Speaker, I have not time to argue the merits of the proposition, but I wish to answer one or two statements that have been made by gentlemen in opposition to it. It is not true, as charged, that the head of a bureau is permitted to formulate and promulgate rules and regulations. The bill expressly provides that these regulations shall be prepared by the Department of Agriculture, at the head of which is the Secretary of Agriculture; that he shall cause the same to be made public and shall allow a period of three months in which they may be examined and considered before final adoption, permitting, when deemed proper, public hearings thereon; and, after final adoption, shall cause the same to be submitted to the President of the United States for approval. It is not unusual for Congress to authorize a department to make rules and regulations similar to those which may be provided under this bill, and that, when so made, they shall have the force and effect of law as if the same had been enacted by Congress itself. Rules are often adopted in this way, which make certain acts, or failure to act, misdemeanors, punishable by fine and imprisonment; and it is not an improper delegation of power by Congress to a department. Rules, and penalties imposed for their violation, have been upheld and approved by the courts of the United States in suits involving the precise questions of the right of Congress to authorize a department to make the rules and the regularity of proceedings for their enforcement.

The entire Forestry Service is administered under regulations adopted by the Secretary of Agriculture, and the violation of many of these regulations is a criminal offense, punishable by fine and imprisonment, and it has been found by experience that the rights of persons and property are not endangered, but are duly and properly safeguarded by these regulations and their enforcement. It would be practically impossible for Congress to enact into law suitable regulations to give effect to the first paragraph, which, by amendment, is to be made a part of this appropriation bill. It would be impossible for Congress to prescribe and fix closed seasons, having due regard to the zones of temperature, to breeding habits, and the times and line of flight of migratory birds, or to select and designate suitable districts for different portions of the country within which or outside of which it shall be made unlawful to shoot, kill, seize, or capture migratory birds which this bill would protect. Rules and regulations proper in one section of the country or at one time of the year would not be applicable to another section of the country or at another season or time of the year. The regulations must be formulated in the first instance by the experts of the Bureau of Biology, prepared by men who understand and know conditions of climate in different parts of the country and are familiar with the habits and courses of flight of the birds. It is necessary for us to give only a little thought to the difficulty of preparing these regulations to show that it is impossible for Congress to adopt them or to enact them into law except as they may become law by authority of Congress acting through the Department of Agriculture, approved by the President of the United States.

This is not a drastic measure, as stated by the gentlemen who are opposing it; it is not an attempt of Congress to override or interfere with local laws of the States. The bill expressly provides that nothing contained in it shall be so construed as to affect or interfere with local laws for the protection of migratory game, or other birds resident and breeding within the borders of the State. The bill is framed to encourage the several States to enact laws and regulations for the protection of birds and to enable the Department of Agriculture to cooperate with the States for the protection of the birds. The bill is intended as a cooperative measure and to enable the Federal Government to act only in case the laws of a State are not sufficient for the protection of migratory birds, or in case officials charged with executing State laws fail in the performance of duty. Some of the States have enacted effective laws on this subject, and in such cases this measure would in no way interfere with their execution by State authorities. The protection of these migratory game and insectivorous birds is of immense importance to the people of the entire country. If proper protection is given by State laws and State officials, the spirit of this measure will be satisfied; but if in any State there be no law, or if it is not executed, it is incumbent upon Congress, in line with its duty to advance and protect the welfare of the entire country, to enact such a law as this and see that it is executed by its officials.

Some of the gentlemen who have spoken in opposition to this measure seem to think an immense sum of money will be necessary to enforce it. The Department of Agriculture, in recommending enactment of this law, asks for only $10,000. This is certainly a trifling sum, and if it is found to be sufficient no one can complain of the law because of the expense of executing it. If, from time to time, larger appropriations are asked, Congress will exercise its judgment. If larger amounts are asked than Congress thinks ought to be expended, they can easily be refused.

I submit that objections made to this bill are not sound. It ought to be enacted into law and every reasonable effort made to enforce it.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman has expired. All time has expired.

The question is on suspending the rules, taking the bill from the Speaker's table, disagreeing to the Senate amendments, and asking for a conference.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. Cox) there were—ayes 127, noes 16.

Mr. HARDWICK. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of order that there is no quorum present.

The SPEAKER. Evidently there is not a quorum present. The Doorkeeper will close the doors, the Sergeant at Arms will notify absentees, and the Clerk will call the roll.

The Clerk called the roll; and there were—yeas 287, nays 15, answered "present" 7, not voting 72, as follows:

The name of Mr. ADAMSON was called and he answered "Present."

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Speaker, I offer the resolution of instructions which I have sent to the Clerk's desk.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the resolution.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That it is the opinion of the House that the conferees on the part of the House should not agree to Senate amendment numbered 142 in form or substance.

Mr. GARDNER of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, I raise the point of order that that is not a privileged motion and is not a motion to instruct.

The SPEAKER. What is the gentleman's objection?

Mr. MANN. The gentleman's objection is——

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will suspend a moment until the Chair can read it.

Mr. GARDNER of Massachusetts. As it is worded this is simply a resolution expressing the opinion of the House. It would not be in order as a motion to instruct, because in effect that would be to repeat that which the House has already done. The House has already disagreed to the Senate amendments, including the migratory-bird amendment. Now, the gentleman from Wyoming proposes to put that disagreement motion once more with regard to one particular amendment. If it is in order as to that particular amendment, it is in order on other amendments in severalty, and when each one has been disagreed to in severalty we shall merely have repeated that which has already been done by disagreeing to the amendments en bloc. I raise the point of order that in itself this is not a resolution of instructions and therefore not privileged.

Mr. MANN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GARDNER of Massachusetts. Certainly.

Mr. MANN. The House having disagreed to the amendment, is it the same thing for the House to add in their opinion the House conferees ought not in conference to agree either in form or substance to the amendment?

Mr. GARDNER of Massachusetts. Why, distinctly not; and the gentleman did not listen to what I said.

Mr. MANN. I did listen to what the gentleman said.

Mr. GARDNER of Massachusetts. I said in the present form it is simply a resolution of the opinion of the House, which is not privileged because it is not a resolution of instructions.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Speaker, I think the point of order of the gentleman from Massachusetts is not well taken. There is a rule that is common in parliamentary law that the conference shall be free. My recollection is that on many occasions the House has expressed its opinion touching a Senate amendment for information to its conferees who act for the House conference.

Mr. GARDNER of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, on the face of the proposition it is not a resolution of instructions. It is an expression of opinion of this House, and nowhere can it be found that a resolution expressing an opinion can interrupt the regular order of business.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I am quite sure, without being able to lay my hand upon the precedent, that it has been frequently held that expressions of opinion of the House, addressed to the conferees, is considered as an instruction, and hence would be in order.

The SPEAKER. The Chair would like to ask the gentleman from Massachusetts what is the difference between this proposition in this paper and if the House should say the House instructs the conferees on the part of the House not to agree to Senate amendment so forth and so on?

Mr. GARDNER of Massachusetts. Because one is binding and the other is not binding.

The SPEAKER. Now, the Chair will ask the gentleman another question. Suppose he was one of these conferees and the House asked this, what would he do; would he pay any attention to this?

Mr. GARDNER of Massachusetts. I probably should be very much influenced by it, but that is not the point, Mr. Speaker.

One of the strongest foundations on which the right to instruct conferees rests is the fact that it provides a necessary check on the Speaker, which is desirable, inasmuch as it is the Speaker who has the appointment of the conferees. Any study of this question of instructions will show that fact at once. I do not know whether this point of order has ever been raised before.

The SPEAKER. Now, the gentleman has no doubt that the House can instruct these conferees, has he?

Mr. GARDNER of Massachusetts. Not the slightest, but it may not instruct them to do something which they have already practically been instructed to do when we voted to disagree with all the amendments.

The SPEAKER. This amendment simply warns the conferees that they must reflect the will of the House as expressed in the motion to suspend the rules. The Chair overrules the point of order, and the Clerk will report the resolution again.

The resolution was again reported.

Mr. GARDNER of Massachusetts. A parliamentary inquiry, Mr. Speaker. Would a resolution offered at the present time to agree to that amendment have precedence over that motion?

The SPEAKER. To agree to the amendment?

Mr. GARDNER of Massachusetts. To agree to the Senate amendment.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks not, because the House just voted five minutes ago that it would not.

Mr. GARDNER of Massachusetts. Yesterday evening that very motion was put by the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. HARDWICK] to agree to an amendment to which the House had just disagreed.

The SPEAKER. Nobody raised a point of order.

Mr. MANN. Will the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. GARDNER] yield for a question?

Mr. GARDNER of Massachusetts. Yes.

Mr. MANN. Would it not be in order now, the previous question not having been ordered, to move an amendment to strike out the word "not"?

Mr. GARDNER of Massachusetts. I did not understand the gentleman.

Mr. MANN. If the previous question be not ordered on the question, would it not be in order to move to amend by striking out the word "not"?

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Speaker, I desire to be recognized in favor of my motion.

Mr. GARDNER of Massachusetts. I move to amend the motion of the gentleman from Alabama by striking out the negative feature.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Speaker, I have the floor.

Mr. GARDNER of Massachusetts. The gentleman from Wyoming [Mr. MONDELL] did not have the floor. "The gentleman from Massachusetts" had it.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. GARDNER] had the floor.

Mr. MONDELL. I was demanding recognition, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. GARDNER of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, the rules of this House declare that when a question is under debate certain motions are in order.

The SPEAKER. The Chair holds that the rule provides that a motion to strike out the word "not" is one of the things that is in order.

Mr. LAMB. I think I have the floor, Mr. Speaker.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Wyoming——

Mr. MANN. A parliamentary inquiry, Mr. Speaker.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. MANN. When a bill is under consideration in the House, is not the gentleman in charge of the bill entitled to the floor for debate, although he may not be entitled to cut out a preferential motion? Is not the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. LAMB] entitled to the floor for an hour, and to control that hour, and during the hour move the previous question if he desires to do so?

Mr. LAMB. That was the point I was going to make, Mr. Speaker.

The SPEAKER. The Chair is inclined to believe that when the motion of the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. LAMB] to suspend the rules and send this bill to conference carried, that the control of the gentleman from Virginia over that matter ceased.

Mr. MANN. The motion of the gentleman from Virginia has not been defeated by the vote of the House.

The SPEAKER. The Chair knows that he has not been defeated, but is this a part and parcel of the consideration of this bill?

Mr. FITZGERALD. I think it is, Mr. Speaker, because if the Speaker does not recognize anybody on this motion the conferees will be appointed and the matter will be disposed of, and until it is disposed of the gentleman in charge of the bill is entitled to recognition. If that be not the case, any gentleman desiring to occupy time can very easily take control from those in charge of the business by a motion to instruct the conferees.

The invariable rule in the House has been, according to my experience, that while a motion to instruct is a preferential motion, if it be made prior to the naming of the conferees, the gentleman in charge of the bill has always been recognized as controlling the floor.

Mr. MANN. Always.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Otherwise, those in charge of the bills would be at the mercy of the minority.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Speaker——

Mr. GARDNER of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. GARDNER of Massachusetts. Does a motion to lay the gentleman's instructions on the table carry the bill to the table?

The SPEAKER. It undoubtedly does. The Chair is inclined to hold that——

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Speaker, as late as yesterday this same question was passed upon by the Chair.

Mr. MANN. No; it was not.

The SPEAKER. It was not passed upon. Nobody raised it, and the Chair does not like to raise parliamentary points himself, although he can do it.

Mr. MONDELL. If my recollection serves me aright, after the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. HARDWICK] was recognized, and I was recognized by the Chair before the interruption of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN], somebody did make the inquiry as to whether the gentleman in charge of the bill was entitled to control the time, and the Chair, if I recollect rightly, said that the gentleman had not demanded it.

The SPEAKER. In order to cut the whole matter short, the Chair will recognize the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. LAMB].

Mr. LAMB. Then, Mr. Speaker, I move the previous question.

The previous question was ordered.

Mr. SAUNDERS. Mr. Speaker, has the previous question been ordered without debate?

The SPEAKER. There will be 40 minutes of debate.

Mr. SAUNDERS. Whenever the previous question is ordered without debate, the right attaches of 20 minutes' debate on a side—40 minutes' debate.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Speaker, this is a subsidiary motion to a question that has been pending before the House. The amendments to the agricultural appropriation bill have been disagreed to, and, if I recollect correctly, a motion has been made to suspend the rules and concur in the Senate amendments. When the previous question is ordered on the adoption of a conference report without debate, it has been held that as debate has been had on that question, no debate is in order.

I recall very distinctly, during a long filibuster in this House two or three Congresses ago, that that very question arose. The gentleman in charge of the conference report on the District of Columbia appropriation bill, Mr. McCleary, of Minnesota, presented the conference report and moved the previous question. After the previous question was ordered I made the point of order that there was 40 minutes' debate, and Speaker Henderson, if I recall correctly, referring to the rulings, held that the bill had been debated. This is an incidental question connected with the consideration of the appropriation bill.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will ask the gentleman from New York: Is this case parallel with the case he is talking about? This transaction is under a suspension of the rules. No previous question had been ordered. But how does that fit in with this decision of Mr. Speaker Henderson that the gentleman is citing?

Mr. FITZGERALD. This proceeding is not under the suspension of the rules.

The SPEAKER. The Chair knows this is not.

Mr. FITZGERALD. The House has disagreed to the Senate amendments and asked for a conference. Under the practice of the House the next step is for the Speaker to appoint the managers of the conference on the part of the House. When that is done the matter is disposed of, and it is messaged to the Senate. If the Chair recognizes some one to move to instruct the conferees before he announces the managers, that is a preferential motion, but it is a motion that is incidental to the matter still before the House. That has been debated, and the previous question applied to it not only cuts off amendment but necessarily cuts off debate.

This motion to instruct the conferees is not an original proposition upon which there has been no debate. It is incidental to this whole question of disagreeing to these Senate amendments and sending the bill to conference. On these subsidiary motions debate is not in order if the previous question be ordered. For instance, suppose the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. GARDNER] had been recognized to offer an amendment and moved the previous question. Would there then be debate because the amendment had been offered and not debated? After the previous question had been ordered would debate be in order?

The rule, as I recall, is that when any proposition is under consideration on which the previous question has been ordered without debate, there shall be debate for 20 minutes on a side.

What is the purpose of the motion? It is to prevent a question being put to the House without any discussion whatever. But this is not such an original proposition as is contemplated by the rule. It is one of the incidental, subsidiary questions that arise in the transaction of the business of the House.

I do not believe it was ever contemplated by the rule that debate should be permitted after the previous question is ordered under these circumstances.

Mr. SAUNDERS. Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER. For what purpose does the gentleman rise?

Mr. SAUNDERS. I made the point of order and desire to submit the rule upon which I rely.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will proceed.

Mr. SAUNDERS. Under rule 27, third paragraph, section 884, I find the following:

> When a motion to suspend the rules has been seconded it shall be in order before the final vote is taken thereon to debate the proposition to be voted on 40 minutes, one-half of such time to be given in favor of and one-half to debate in opposition to such proposition; and the same right shall be allowed whenever the previous question has been ordered on any proposition on which there has been no debate.

The SPEAKER. The Chair would like to ask the gentleman from Virginia a question. Would the gentleman hold that when a bill is reported back to the House from the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, and the gentleman in charge of it moved the previous question on the bill and all amendments thereto to final passage, that there was 40 minutes' debate on that?

Mr. SAUNDERS. That is not this situation. In the case put by the Speaker the main proposition, which was the bill and amendments, had been debated in the Committee of the Whole.

The SPEAKER. Is it not practically the same situation?

Mr. SAUNDERS. No, I think not.

The SPEAKER. Why not?

Mr. SAUNDERS. This bill has practically gone to conference. The motion of the gentleman from Virginia was to take up the bill and amendments under suspension of the rules, and send same to conference. This was ordered by the vote of the House. But the pending proposition is one that relates essentially to the conduct of the committee in conference. One motion that has been carried related to the disposition of the bill. The pending motion operates upon the members of the committee on conference. It is an expression of the will of the House, and is intended to direct and control in part the attitude of the committee when in conference. This resolution is an appropriate matter to be debated, since if adopted, it will express the sense of the House upon a Senate amendment that is of more than doubtful constitutionality. It is a separate and distinct proposition expressing, as I have said, the sense of the House upon one specific item of the bill. The gentleman who offered it was recognized in the first instance to offer it. What sort of analogy exists between this situation and the precedents submitted by the gentleman from New York? The reading of the rule itself is a sufficient answer to all the objections that have been made: What does the rule say?

The same right of debate shall be allowed whenever the previous question has been ordered on any proposition on which there has been no debate.

I am not concerned to answer at length the gentleman from New York who says that it was never intended for the rule to apply to such a situation as the one before us. It is sufficient to say that and derive the meaning and plain intent of the rule from the simple and definite language in which it is stated.

Mr. SHERLEY. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SAUNDERS. Certainly.

Mr. SHERLEY. What would the gentleman say to the note which you find under the rule—"when previous question ordered without debate on motion not debatable, no debate allowable under this rule," a decision made by the present occupant of the chair?

Mr. SAUNDERS. That is not this situation at all.

Mr. SHERLEY. That was a decision by the present occupant of the chair. I admit that the case is not parallel with this, but it successfully answers the contention of the gentleman that the language of the rule precludes any case arising where there should not be debate under the previous question.

Mr. SAUNDERS. Not at all. When the rules provide that certain propositions are not debatable, this rule does not apply so as to give debate upon the previous question, for the simple reason that the previous question has not cut off debate.

These propositions are not debatable under any circumstances. Hence the application of the previous question has not operated prejudicially to the right of debate. But this matter is debatable, and the use of the previous question has eliminated a full discussion on the merits. Hence the rule applies so as to give 20 minutes on a side. In the case cited by the gentleman from Kentucky the previous question did not limit the right of discussion. The rules had already provided that the motion to which the previous question was directed was not debatable. Plainly the application of the previous question to a nondebatable proposition would not make it debatable. In the case in hand the resolution is one calling for debate, and proper to be debated under the rules.

Mr. GARDNER of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, I want to make one suggestion. It all depends upon whether this is an incidental motion. If it is an incidental motion, it is not debatable. If it is not, it is, and in deciding whether it is an incidental motion I invite the attention of the Chair to the fact that the conferees have not yet been appointed.

The SPEAKER. On which side does it have a bearing?

Mr. GARDNER of Massachusetts. I think this is an incidental motion.

Mr. SAUNDERS. Mr. Speaker, I have not yielded the floor. I desire to call attention to the fact that the previous question had not been ordered heretofore in respect to the motion of the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. LAMB] to send this bill to conference, though I think that this fact makes no particular difference in this connection.

The SPEAKER. The other transaction was under suspension of the rules.

Mr. SAUNDERS. Yes; that is true. The bill and amendments were taken up under suspension of the rules, and were not debatable, save as to the 40 minutes provided for. The pending resolution is debatable on its merits, but before the proponent of the same could secure the floor for this purpose, the gentleman from Virginia was recognized and moved the previous question. Hence the latter portion of the rule comes into operation and affords a debate of 40 minutes.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, it seems to me that this is a very simple proposition. The gentleman from Virginia [Mr. SAUNDERS] relies upon the last clause of paragraph 3 of Rule XXVII, which says:

And the same right of debate shall be allowed whenever the previous question has been ordered on any proposition on which there has been no debate.

There has been debate of 40 minutes on the Senate amendments. Under the motion of the gentleman from Virginia to suspend the rules and disagree to the Senate amendments there were 40 minutes of debate on the Senate amendments. So upon the main question there has been debate. The Chair will notice a statement on page 341 of the Manual, referring to debate:

It may not be demanded on a proposition which has been debated in Committee of the Whole or on a conference report if the subject matter of the report was debated before being sent to conference.

The subject matter has been debated on the motion of the gentleman from Virginia to suspend the rules and disagree to the Senate amendments, and the principal or main question having been debated, debate is not in order after the previous question is ordered on a mere incidental motion relating to the subject matter which has been debated.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Speaker, I will ask the Chair to hear me for just a moment. The rule with regard to the previous question is intended to give an opportunity to debate for a limited time every debatable question.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will ask the gentleman a question. Has not this very identical question—that is, the substance of it—been debated for 40 minutes?

Mr. MONDELL. It has not.

The SPEAKER. Did not the gentleman himself make a five-minute speech upon it?

Mr. MONDELL. I did not, Mr. Speaker. The question before the House a moment ago was the question of suspending the rules and sending the Agriculture bill to conference, and in the discussion of the question of whether the bill should go to conference there was some reference made to a certain amendment of the Senate, but the question of instructions has not been debated for a moment.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will ask the gentleman this: Were not the entire 40 minutes of debate used up on this very identical amendment?

Mr. MONDELL. Whether they were or not seems to me entirely irrelevant. The question then before the House was, Shall we send the bill to conference?—and many gentlemen might desire to send the bill to conference who would also desire later to instruct with regard to a particular item. The argument was not then on the question of instruction, but on the question of whether the bill should go to conference. And the item that was discussed then may not be discussed now. The Chair has no knowledge of what the discussion shall consist of, but what I want to emphasize is that the House has not for one moment discussed the question of whether or not the conferees shall be instructed.

Mr. SAUNDERS. Mr. Speaker, I desire to say just a word more. I do not wish to unnecessarily protract this debate, but it seems to me this is a highly important question upon which a ruling is asked. This rule should not be so construed as to unreasonably cut off the very limited debate that is provided, a debate which if allowed in the present instance would be conducted upon a constitutional question of considerable interest. Matters before this House, that are proper to be discussed, ought to be discussed within reasonable limits, and the rules should be so interpreted as to favor some debate at least, if such a conclusion can be fairly reached by the presiding officer. I wish to call the attention of the Chair to the fact that this motion, properly speaking, and in a parliamentary sense is not an incidental motion.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will ask the gentleman why it is not incidental?

Mr. SAUNDERS. Because in familiar parliamentary law such motions as deal with the main proposition, as for instance the motion to amend a bill, or postpone it, are incidental motions, but the motion to instruct a committee is not an incidental motion. The first motion made by the gentleman from Virginia related to the bill itself, to the disposition of the bill. The second motion relates to the men who are to deal with the bill. Neither in form, nor in substance, is the motion of the gentleman from Wyoming, a motion incidental to the motion of the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. LAMB]. In no sense is it subsidiary to the motion of the gentleman from Virginia. Having sent the bill to conference the House is asked by a separate and independent motion to express its opinion upon one proposition, and to impress that opinion upon the members of the conference. It matters not that in the course of the debate one, or more gentlemen may have discussed certain phases of the amendment to which the instructions relate. This was not debate on the Mondell resolution, but on the Lamb motion.

The main proposition first under consideration was whether or not the bill and amendments should go to conference. Discussion on this point, and incidentally discussion on the merits, or demerits of the proposition to protect migratory birds, is not, and can not be considered as discussion of the motion to instruct the conferees of the House to reject this amendment in conference. Debate on this motion is not a repetition of former debate, for the obvious reason that it is directed to an essentially different proposition. One motion deals with the thing itself, and amendments, the other deals with persons. The House might doubt the wisdom of an amendment and yet be unwilling to instruct its conferees to reject it in conference.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SAUNDERS. Permit me to finish. Obviously the motion of the gentleman from Wyoming has not been debated. If the motion is properly debatable, the previous question has precluded debate.

The pending motion proposes to instruct the committee. The motion is directly addressed to this committee, and intended to control their action. Who has discussed this phase of the matter, or the propriety of limiting the discretion of the committee. The merits of the proposition to protect migratory birds is one thing, the propriety of controlling the action of the committee in this respect is quite another and different thing. These considerations very clearly show that this motion is not an incidental motion to the motion of the gentleman from Virginia. It does not deal with that motion at all, for that motion is a closed incident. An amendment to the Lamb motion, if in order would have been an incidental motion. But this motion looks to the future, and looks to the men who will deal with the bill and amendments during the period that the same will be temporarily out of the House. It orders the conduct of these men in their relation to the subject matter of the conference that the House has ordered by its prior action. I submit that such a motion is not fairly an incidental motion, and should not be so held so as to cut off the very limited debate provided for by the rule. The suggestion that if debate is allowed on this motion an interminable series of debates will be possible, is not well taken. Any motion incidental to the motion of the gentleman from Wyoming would not be debatable if the previous question is moved. Even in the case in hand the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. LAMB] might have debated the Mondell resolution briefly, and then moved the previous question. That action on his part would have cut off all further debate.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Speaker, I wish to call attention to two decisions in sections 5497 and 5498 of Hinds' Precedents, volume 5:

> The word "proposition" in the rule, providing as to debate after the previous question is ordered, means the main question and does not refer to incidental motions.

The gentleman from Virginia [Mr. SAUNDERS] contends that this motion to instruct is not an incidental motion; that it is not incidental to the main proposition—that is, it is a question which stands by itself and apart from all other questions to which it might be related. What standing would it have here except as an incident to this procedure of sending this bill to conference?

Mr. SHERLEY. And it could not get its preference except by being incidental to it.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Unquestionably it has no standing whatever apart from this proceeding of sending this bill to conference; that is what makes it privileged. It is privileged at this particular stage of this proceeding before the Chair announces the managers on the part of the House. If it were not offered at this time it would not be privileged, it would not be in order, and it would have no standing whatever. Mr. Speaker, in the paragraph in the Precedents giving the history of this rule for debate after the previous question in certain instances the reason is given for its adoption. Upon a number of occasions legislation of the utmost importance had been passed by being called up and the previous question ordered on it and no debate whatever had. In the two decisions which are found here, which the Chair has before him, I think it is made clear that this is an incidental question, and is not in order.

The SPEAKER. There is a certain class of motions that may be called summary proceedings, and all these motions are lumped off in the rules under the head of "incidental." If this kind of a motion was ruled to be debatable, you could never get through with the business of the House, and the Chair holds that there is no debate under it on the theory that it is incidental to the main question. There are three different propositions which have been argued—the two the gentleman from New York cited and another one about three pages farther on in the same volume. The question is on the motion of the gentleman from Wyoming.

The question was taken, and the Chair announced the noes seemed to have it.

On a division (demanded by Mr. MONDELL) there were—ayes 36, noes 117.

Mr. HARDWICK. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of order that there is no quorum present.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Georgia makes the point of order that there is no quorum present. The Chair will count. [After counting.] Two hundred and nineteen gentlemen are present, a quorum.

So the motion was rejected.

Mr. EDWARDS. Mr. Speaker, would it be in order to offer instructions at this time?

Mr. WEEKS. Mr. Speaker, I offer the resolution which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the resolution.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That it is the opinion of the House that the conferees on the part of the House should agree to Senate amendment 142 in form or substance.

Mr. WEEKS. Mr. Speaker, on that I demand the previous question.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of order that a resolution of instructions having been offered and the previous question ordered on it and the matter disposed of, no further motion is now in order.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, it seems to me that the motion for instructions is itself open for amendment unless the previous question be had, but there can not be an indefinite number of motions offered in the way of instructions. The motion for instructions being made, any gentleman may offer an amendment by adding additional instructions, but only one main motion for instructions, I think, can be offered. Without a holding to that effect, unless the Speaker hastens the naming of the conferees in spite of Members demanding recognition, we would be in a position where upon one of these bills in conference with a large number of Senate amendments it would be impossible to ever finish.

The SPEAKER. The Chair is ready to rule. This is analogous to a motion to recommit, and there can be but one motion to recommit that is in order, and it is amendable; anybody could have amended it if he got the chance without the previous question being ordered; and it has been held by the Chair's predecessors, and also by the present occupant of the chair, that when a gentleman makes a motion to recommit with instructions and the Chair rules his instructions out of order, then another Member can make another motion that will be in order; but if the first one is in order and disposed of that ends it, because there must be an end to all things some time or other. The Chair sustains the point of order. The Chair announces the following conferees.

The Clerk read as follows:

Mr. LAMB, Mr. LEVER, and Mr. HAUGEN.

DISTRICT APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. BURLESON. Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Texas [Mr. BURLESON] is recognized. [Loud applause.]

Mr. BURLESON. I move to suspend the rules and to discharge the Committee on Appropriations from further consideration of H. R. 28499, a bill making appropriations to provide for the expenses of the government of the District of Columbia for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1914, and for other purposes, to disagree to all of the Senate amendments, excepting Senate amendment No. 132, and to concur in Senate amendment No. 132 with an amendment as follows:

SEC. 9. PARAGRAPH 1. That hereafter it shall be unlawful in the District of Columbia to issue any license for a barroom in a new location until the number of barrooms licensed shall bear a relation to the number of inhabitants of 1 barroom to each 1,000 inhabitants, according to the last preceding annual census taken by the Metropolitan police, and then and thereafter the number of barrooms licensed may be increased from time to time as the excise board may determine, but not beyond the ratio aforesaid: Provided, That hotels established or hereafter to be established and found by the excise board to have not less than 50 rooms for guests shall always have the right to be licensed to sell intoxicating liquors, subject, however, to forfeiture of said license for violations as provided by existing law: And provided further, That no hotel found by the excise board to have less than 50 rooms for guests shall be entitled to a license to sell intoxicating liquor beyond the expiration of the present license year.

PAR. 2. That the fee for a wholesale liquor license is increased for the license year beginning November 1, 1913, $100, and $100 additional for each successive year on the beginning of each and every license year thereafter until the license year beginning November 1, 1916, for which year and every license year thereafter the said license fee shall be $600; and the fee for a barroom license is increased for the license year beginning November 1, 1913, $100, and $100 additional for each successive year on the beginning of each and every license year thereafter until the license year beginning November 1, 1919, for which year and every license year thereafter the said license fee shall be $1,500.

PAR. 3. That no saloon shall be located within 600 feet of any public school, or private school now in existence, or within 500 feet of any established church, or within 1,000 feet of the Marine Barracks, the navy yard, or War College: Provided, That this paragraph shall not apply to hotels with 50 rooms or more or to social clubs now in existence.

PAR. 4. That no license shall be granted for the establishment or maintenance of a barroom or other place for the sale of intoxicating liquors, otherwise than in sealed packages and not to be drunk on the premises, in any residence portion of the District of Columbia; and it shall be the duty of the excise board to determine in the case of each application for license whether the location where the barroom is to be located is or is not within the business portion of the District, and if not the license shall be denied; and the excise board is authorized and required to determine in each case what is so far devoted to business as to constitute it a business street or section.

PAR. 5. That it shall not be necessary in order to convict any person, company, association, club, or corporation, his, its, or their agents, officers, clerks, or servants of manufacturing or selling intoxicating liquors without license, or in any section of the District of Columbia where the manufacture and sale is prohibited, to prove the actual sale, delivery of, or payment for any intoxicating liquors, but the evidence of having or keeping them on hand and offering to sell or barter, exchanging for goods or merchandise, shall be sufficient to convict; nor shall it be necessary in a warrant or information to specify the particular kind of liquor manufactured, sold, offered for sale, kept for sale, trafficked in, bartered or exchanged for goods or merchandise, or mentioned in orders solicited or taken for the purchase of intoxicating liquor, but it shall be sufficient to allege in the warrant or information that the accused manufactured, sold, offered for sale, kept for sale, trafficked in, bartered or exchanged for goods or merchandise, or kept it deposited to sell or barter.

PAR. 6. That the issuance of an internal-revenue special-tax receipt or certificate by the United States to any person as a wholesale or retail dealer in distilled liquors or in malt liquors at any place within the District of Columbia shall be prima facie evidence of the sale of intoxicating liquors by such person at such place or at any other place of business of such person in the District where such special-tax receipt is posted and at the time charged in any prosecution under this section, but such time must be within the life of such receipt or certificate.

PAR. 7. That nothing in this act contained shall be deemed to repeal any of the provisions of existing laws regulating the sale of intoxicating liquors in the District of Columbia, except in so far as they are necessarily repealed by the provisions of this act.

That the House insist upon its amendment to Senate amendment No. 132 and ask for a conference, and that the Speaker shall, upon the adoption of this motion, appoint the conferees without intervening motion.

The SPEAKER. Is a second demanded?

Mr. WEBB. Mr. Speaker, I demand a second.

Mr. BURLESON. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that a second may be considered as ordered.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. WEBB] demands a second, and the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BURLESON] asks unanimous consent that a second may be considered as ordered. Is there objection?

Mr. BARTHOLDT. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. BARTHOLDT. If this motion to suspend the rules should be voted down by chance, will any Member of the House still have the right to make a point of order on the several amendments in the bill, or must the point of order be raised now?

The SPEAKER. The bill would be where it is now, in the hands of the Committee on Appropriations. A Member would have no right to make such a motion.

Mr. WEBB. A parliamentary inquiry, Mr. Speaker. Would it be in order to move as a substitute that the House concur in Senate amendment No. 132?

The SPEAKER. It has got to be taken as a whole or rejected, one or the other. It is not amendable.

Is there objection to considering a second as ordered?

Mr. HAMLIN. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I wish to make a parliamentary inquiry. Would it be in order to offer an amendment to the amendment offered by the committee?

The SPEAKER. It would not. You have to take this thing as it is offered as a whole or reject it as a whole.

Mr. HAMLIN. Perhaps the Speaker does not quite understand me. I understand the motion made by the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BURLESON] is to disagree to the Senate amendment with an amendment.

The SPEAKER. That is his motion.

Mr. HAMLIN. Yes, sir. Now, my parliamentary inquiry is: Is it in order to offer an amendment to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BURLESON]?

The SPEAKER. It is not.

Mr. GREGG of Pennsylvania. Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. GREGG] is recognized.

Mr. GREGG of Pennsylvania. I could not hear the question that was asked by the gentleman from Missouri. I understood, however, that his inquiry was as to a question of reserving a point of order.

The SPEAKER. To which gentleman from Missouri does the gentleman refer? Two of them have addressed the Chair.

Mr. GREGG of Pennsylvania. I refer to the gentleman from Missouri, Mr. BARTHOLDT. Is it proper to reserve a point of order upon the motion that has been made by the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BURLESON]?

The SPEAKER. It is not. Is there objection to the ordering of a second? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none. The gentleman from Texas [Mr. BURLESON] is entitled to 20 minutes and the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. WEBB] to 20 minutes.

Mr. BURLESON. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to modify my motion by changing the word "barroom" to "saloon" wherever it may appear in the motion.

The SPEAKER. The word "barroom" is changed to the word "saloon" wherever the word "barroom" occurs.

Mr. RUCKER of Missouri. Mr. Speaker, I understood the gentleman to ask unanimous consent.

Mr. BURLESON. To modify the motion; that is all.

Mr. RUCKER of Missouri. Reserving the right to object——

Mr. BURLESON. The purpose is to make the verbiage of the bill uniform.

Mr. RUCKER of Missouri. I want to ask the gentleman a question, and this may be all the chance that I may get. I want to ask if the motion the gentleman offers here prevents the selling of whisky in the Union Station in this city?

Mr. BURLESON. I do not think it does.

Mr. RUCKER of Missouri. Do you not think it ought to do so?

Mr. BURLESON. There are many things which I think the amendment ought to bring about which I think it will be utterly impossible to secure at this time.

Mr. RUCKER of Missouri. We may be able to secure that one.

Mr. BURLESON. I do not think so; not now.

Mr. MANN. What became of the request of the gentleman from Texas?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Texas asks unanimous consent to modify his motion by inserting the word "saloon" in place of the word "barroom" wherever it occurs. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. BURLESON. Mr. Speaker, every Member of the House realizes the necessity and the importance of speedily sending the District of Columbia appropriation bill to conference. After to-day, eliminating Sunday, we have only 48 or 60 hours remaining within which it is possible for the conferees to reach an agreement upon this bill, which carries 134 Senate amendments.

There is only one amendment that is giving us any trouble, which presents a serious difficulty, and that is amendment No. 132, known as the Jones-Works excise amendment. It is the only Senate amendment to the District bill that has delayed this bill going to conference. I feel sure that there would be no difficulty, so far as the membership of this body is concerned, in reaching an understanding with reference to this particular amendment but for certain extraneous influences, but unfortunately there are two opposing elements outside of this Chamber that it is impossible to bring together, and, so far as I am concerned, I do not intend to attempt to bring them together.

We have attempted in this amendment, which I propose in lieu of the Jones-Works excise amendment, to give the District of Columbia a sane regulatory measure affecting the licensing of saloons. By its terms we very materially reduce the number of saloons. We fix the number of saloons under the provisions of the amendment as one for every 1,000 inhabitants of the District. To this all may not assent, but no one will deny that it is an improvement on existing conditions and that it is reasonable. We provide that the license fee shall be gradually increased from $800 per annum until it reaches, at a future period of time fixed by the amendment, $1,500. In addition thereto the substitute amendment provides that no saloon shall be located within 600 feet of a school or 500 feet of a church or within 1,000 feet of the navy yard or the War College. It also prohibits saloons in the residence sections of the District.

In addition it provides that an internal-revenue license in the possession of a citizen of the District of Columbia under the law shall be prima facie evidence that that party is engaged in the sale and barter of intoxicating liquors.

Mr. HAMLIN. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Texas yield to the gentleman from Missouri?

Mr. BURLESON. I do.

Mr. HAMLIN. What is the provision with reference to these clubs? I tried to read it when the gentleman let me look at it, but the gentleman wanted it back again and took it back when I tried to find out. What is the provision in regard to these social clubs? Does it not permit the organization of clubs whenever they choose to organize them?

Mr. BURLESON. It does not. On the contrary, it provides that saloons shall not be located within a given distance of a public school or——

Mr. HAMLIN. I understand that.

Mr. BURLESON. Or an established church.

Mr. HAMLIN. What is provided in regard to clubs? Does it limit it to existing clubs, or may clubs be organized hereafter?

Mr. BURLESON. The only place where social clubs are referred to in this motion is here. I will read it:

Provided, That this paragraph shall not apply to hotels with 50 rooms or more, or to social clubs now in existence.

Mr. HAMLIN. That is the point I wanted to get clear.

Mr. BURLESON. Every precaution has been taken to hedge the traffic around so that there can be no evasion of the law. We provide against clubs formed to evade the law. We think that is all that can be accomplished at this time.

I am free to say that the amendment does not suit me in many particulars. It is not as liberal as it should be in some particulars, from my viewpoint, and it is too drastic in others; but in order to meet what is considered the demands of the situation we have drawn the amendment as it is proposed here. I mean what I say when I make the statement that the amendment is not as liberal in some particulars as I would like to have it. If I had my way, I would leave the law as it now is in the matter of prescribing the distance a saloon should be removed from a school or a church. But the sentiment of this House is in favor of the greater distance.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman yield?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. For a question.

Mr. BURLESON. Yes; for a question.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. How does the amendment treat those established business places and restaurants which may now be within 500 feet or 600 feet of a schoolhouse or a church? Must they go out of business?

Mr. BURLESON. The proposition will not affect those now in existence until the expiration of their licenses.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. It affects only those to come hereafter?

Mr. BURLESON. Only those to be licensed hereafter.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman yield?

Mr. BURLESON. Just one moment, and then I will yield to the gentleman.

Then there is an additional proposition embodied in the amendment to which I desire to direct attention and then I will yield. The amendment provides that in order to convict any person, company, association, club, or corporation, his, its, or their agents, officers, clerks, or servants, of the manufacture or sale of intoxicating liquors without a license, or in any section of the District of Columbia where it is prohibited, it shall not be necessary to prove the actual delivery, sale, or payment for the intoxicating liquors, but the fact of having or keeping them in hand or offering them for sale shall be sufficient to convict. Now, I have briefly outlined just what the amendment provides and all that it will accomplish.

Mr. NORRIS. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. BURLESON. I yield to the gentleman from Nebraska.

Mr. NORRIS. This amendment strikes out the entire Senate amendment with reference to the sale of liquor?

Mr. BURLESON. It does, and substitutes what I have outlined.

Mr. NORRIS. Is there anything left in this amendment that was in the Senate amendment in regard to the sale of liquor to habitual drunkards?

Mr. BURLESON. There is not. That is covered by existing law.

Mr. NORRIS. Is there anything that was in the other bill, providing for notice on the part of the wife?

Mr. BURLESON. There is not; but it is utterly impossible for us to accomplish all that the gentleman from Nebraska desired in that connection.

Mr. NORRIS. I could not hear it all read, and I wanted to know what the facts are.

Mr. BURLESON. There is no provision in the amendment relating to what the gentleman asks about.

Mr. NORRIS. Is there any prohibition against the sale on holidays?

Mr. BURLESON. There is not. The law with reference to selling on holidays and Sundays continues just as it is at this time, and it is a very drastic law, as the gentleman from Nebraska knows.

Mr. NORRIS. Is there any provision in this committee amendment providing for the closing of saloons at any hour of the night or day?

Mr. BURLESON. The law now regulates that.

Mr. NORRIS. In the Senate amendment there were some provisions, and I wanted to know whether this committee has included them or not.

Mr. BURLESON. It has not; but the existing law does.

Mr. SABATH. The existing law regulates that.

Mr. LANGLEY. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BURLESON. Yes.

Mr. LANGLEY. How many saloons will have to go out of business as the result of this amendment if it is adopted?

Mr. BURLESON. As I understand it there are now approximately 560 or 580 saloons, including those in hotels and clubs, in the District at this time. If this amendment becomes law there will be one saloon for every 1,000 inhabitants.

Mr. LANGLEY. What is the total population of the District?

Mr. BURLESON. The population of the District is about 325,000.

Mr. GALLAGHER. How many saloons now in existence will be wiped out of existence if the 600-foot limit applies?

Mr. BURLESON. I am unable to give the gentleman that information. Some say that there will be 150 wiped out. Some contend that there will be only about 45 or 50 wiped out.

Mr. GALLAGHER. There have been no measurements made?

Mr. BURLESON. There were measurements made to ascertain the effect of the Jones-Works excise bill, if it should become law, and I have in my hand statistics prepared by some one and furnished from the District Commissioners' office, showing that under the operation of the Jones-Works excise bill there would be only seven saloons left within the limits of the District of Columbia, and that it would be possible, by the establishment of a very small and very temporary shorthand or typewriting school at certain designated points, to eliminate those seven saloons within a very brief period of time.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Apparently my question was not fully answered a moment ago, unintentionally of course on the part of the gentleman. Take the case of the restaurant known as Harvey's, on Pennsylvania Avenue, which has been established for very many years. The Hotel Raleigh is just across the way. Both of them are long established. Within 600 feet of them is the headquarters of the Salvation Army. Now, when the present licenses of those two places expire, will they, by reason of the proximity of the Salvation Army headquarters, be compelled to go out of business?

Mr. BURLESON. The Raleigh Hotel will not. I am not prepared to say with reference to the other. I do not think it would. That is a matter to be passed upon by the excise board.

I reserve the remainder of my time.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Texas reserves nine minutes.

Mr. LANGLEY. Will the gentleman yield to me?

Mr. BURLESON. I yield to the gentleman from Kentucky.

Mr. LANGLEY. Will there be 1 saloon for each 1,000 inhabitants and in addition a bar in each hotel?

Mr. BURLESON. One saloon for every 1,000 inhabitants in the District of Columbia. That is what was in mind by those who drew the amendment.

Mr. ADAIR. Is that exclusive of hotels?

Mr. LANGLEY. Exclusive of hotels?

Mr. BURLESON. That excludes hotels and clubs. Mr. Speaker, I reserve the balance of my time.

Mr. MILLER. Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask the gentleman one question.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman has taken his seat, and reserves the remainder of his time—nine minutes.

[Mr. WEBB addressed the House. See Appendix.]

Mr. BURLESON. I yield four minutes to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON].

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Speaker, I crave the attention of the House for four minutes. Gentlemen are very anxious to have a chance to consider this Senate amendment, known as the Jones-Works amendment. This amendment is placed upon the District of Columbia appropriation bill, a bill to carry on the District government for the coming fiscal year, and it ought to be considered on its own merits and no other way. Now, what is the parliamentary situation? The Senate put this amendment upon the District of Columbia appropriation bill. It has come to the House; it goes under the rules to the Committee on Appropriations, where it now is. When it comes back to the House it is subject to the point of order. That sends it to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for consideration. Not only this amendment, but a dozen other amendments are subject to the point of order. General debate is first in order, and then if it is the sense of a majority of the House after debate to close it, consideration under the five-minute rule and under the rules of the House. There are hundreds of amendments that can be made and can be discussed under the five-minute rule, requiring days of time, and it means that the District of Columbia appropriation bill has to fail or other bills are to fail.

So much for the parliamentary situation. This motion is to suspend the rules, requiring a two-thirds vote, and disagree to all of the Senate amendments except this particular amendment, and send the bill to the Senate asking for a conference. If this action is had, the House and Senate conferees will meet with full power and authority to settle all differences between the two bodies—and as to the Jones-Works amendment, they can agree to the House amendment or the Senate amendment, or can make an entirely new bill touching the regulation of the liquor traffic in the District of Columbia and report the same to their respective bodies, and if the agreement is ratified by the two bodies the bill would become a law on the approval of the President.

Mr. HENRY of Texas. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CANNON. I can not yield in four minutes. So much for the parliamentary situation. Now, touching the merits of the bill, I am not in harmony with some of the provisions in the Jones-Works measure. I do not believe that there are 50 men in this House who are. I am not in harmony with the proposed House amendment in some respects.

I would make it, as the gentleman from Texas says, more liberal in some features and more stringent in some features. It is a marked improvement upon the present law. In the end, and in the speedy end, it will cut saloons down in this District from 586 to about 325. I say, again, this is the practical way to legislate settling the differences between the House and Senate. If the agreement does not suit a majority of the House when presented, it will go for nothing. I am anxious to have legislation in the premises, and I know of no way to get it in the remaining days of this session except through a full and free conference between the Senate and House.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman has expired. The gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. WEBB] has four minutes and the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BURLESON] five minutes.

Mr. WEBB. Mr. Speaker, I yield two minutes to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. WILLIS.]

Mr. WILLIS. Mr. Speaker, when unanimous consent was sought in the House the other day to disagree to the Senate amendments I objected, and I do not propose that this motion shall be allowed to go to vote without filing my protest against it. I objected then, Mr. Speaker, because I did not propose that any committee or any number of gentlemen less than the whole membership of this House should have the right to strangle this bill in the dark. [Applause.] I do not propose that it shall be suffocated even in the daylight by the gentlemen who have reported this amendment, if I know of any way to prevent it. The gentleman from Texas [Mr. BURLESON] said in response to the inquiry of the gentleman from Nebraska [Mr. NORRIS] that there is in his proposed amendment no regulation touching the sale of liquor to minors; that there is no regulation concerning the sale of liquor on holidays.

Mr. BURLESON. There are drastic regulations in the law now on that subject.

Mr. WILLIS. Mr. Speaker, I understood the gentleman to say, in response to the query of the gentleman from Nebraska [Mr. NORRIS], that it was not possible to get all these desirable changes in the law now. If the statement he now makes is true, we already have them. The fact is, Mr. Speaker, if these things are desirable, there was an easy way whereby the gentleman from Texas could have permitted this House to vote on them. It has just been said that there are not 50 men on this floor who are in favor of the Jones-Works bill. Then, if that statement, which I do not believe, is correct, in God's name, why not give the membership of the House a chance to vote on it instead of strangling it by this proposition? Ah, the gentlemen who are opposed to the Jones-Works bill are afraid to let the House vote on it. That is why. [Applause.]

Mr. SHARP rose.

Mr. WILLIS. I will yield to my colleague for a brief question.

Mr. SHARP. Is it not true, in answer to the charge of the gentleman from Illinois that we come here at the eleventh hour to pass such legislation, that these reforms were presented time and time again for consideration before the District of Columbia Committee, and that its enemies defeated all such efforts by preventing the attendance of a quorum?

Mr. WILLIS. I understand from the papers that that statement is absolutely true. I hope this motion and the amendment offered by the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BURLESON] will be voted down.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Ohio has expired.

Mr. WEBB. Mr. Speaker, I yield two minutes to the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. HOBSON].

Mr. HOBSON. Mr. Speaker, I request not to be interrupted. For several years I have been making a disinterested and cold-blooded scientific investigation of this question [laughter], and I have come to the final conclusive proposition that reform rests with the youth of the land absolutely and that reform propositions, to get better results, must start with the youth. Investigations at Bellevue Hospital and elsewhere as to the antecedents of drunkards show that 68 per cent of all the drunkards contracted the habit before they were 21 years old. I repeat it, and I hope every Member here will listen. While laws are supposed to prevent the sale of intoxicating liquor to minors, investigations show that 68 per cent of all the drunkards—not temperate drinkers, but drunkards—more than two-thirds of all the drunkards, contracted the habit before they were 21 years old and 30 per cent before they were 16 years old. And, fathers, listen—7 per cent before they were 12. The investigation showed if you bring up a boy until he is 21 and he has never begun to drink, only 2 per cent begin after that age, and the chances are 50 to 1 that he will never begin.

Therefore, I say, the true heart of regulation is to cut off the continued sale of liquor to minors, and no substitute to the Jones-Works bill ought to be acceptable unless it has some provision for improving the law relating to the sale of liquor to minors. The Jones-Works bill itself ought to be amended. It is shameful to provide that clubs may sell liquor to minors. At present the law against the sale of liquor to minors is grossly inadequate and is being nullified in our great cities. Reform in regulation should begin with strengthening the effectiveness of this law. The proposed amendment neglects this and should be voted down.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. BURLESON. Mr. Speaker, I yield the remainder of my time to the gentleman from New York [Mr. FITZGERALD].

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York [Mr. FITZGERALD] is recognized for five minutes.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Speaker, I have not had the opportunity to spend the last two or three years of my life in making "a disinterested, cold-blooded, scientific investigation" [laughter] as to the causes of the evils resulting from drink. I do know something, however, about the situation in this House as to this bill.

This bill was referred to the Committee on Appropriations and printed on the 20th day of this month. The Committee on Appropriations met to consider it on the 21st. It was interrupted in its consideration by the Members being required to come on the floor of the House for the consideration of the sundry civil appropriation bill—on the 19th, the 20th, and the 21st of February when the committee sat 12 hours a day in this House with the sundry civil bill. On the 22d of February the committee took up the preparation of the general deficiency bill and reported that bill, with a Sunday intervening, on the 26th day of February. This is the 28th day of February, and the general deficiency bill was finished in the House yesterday.

When the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. WEBB] speaks about this bill being strangled in the Committee on Appropriations he is speaking about matters as to which he has as little information as he seems to have in regard to the Jones-Works bill and the excise law of the District of Columbia.

Mr. WEBB. I said the District Committee. I did not say the gentleman's committee.

Mr. FITZGERALD. The gentleman spoke about this bill being strangled in committee.

Here is the District of Columbia appropriation bill, carrying in round numbers $12,000,000 to maintain the District government. It comes to the House with 134 amendments. This so-called Jones-Works amendment fills 27 pages of the bill. The so-called utilities amendment fills 62 pages of the bill. Another amendment, longer than the others not mentioned, fills 3 pages of the bill.

How much consideration has the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. WEBB] given to any one of these amendments? How does he expect this House intelligently to take up at this time all of these important amendments and give three hours' general debate to one of them and then have these 27 pages read for amendment and consideration in committee?

Mr. Speaker, I have no sympathy with those who contract evil habits from drink or anything else or who do things to make others contract evil habits. I am not in sympathy with extreme drinking, but I do not believe that the experience of mankind has demonstrated that by rigid, drastic prohibitory laws the cause of temperance is advanced. I believe that reasonable legislation that will eliminate as far as possible the abuses connected with the sale of liquor will tend more to correct evils than the attempts of the narrow-minded to control and regulate entirely the habits of the individual. [Applause.]

This amendment has been prepared with some care during the week in which the bill has been awaiting action. Men who have antagonistic views on the liquor question have conferred together. An attempt has been made to get such a provision as will materially reduce the number of saloons in the District, as will substantially increase the license tax to be paid, and as will give that ample and adequate control over the sale of liquor in the District of Columbia that is proper; and that having been done, and this provision added to the existing liquor legislation, the situation should, in my judgment, be satisfactory to those extremists on both sides, none of whom can have their own way, but must meet on a common ground when legislation is to be accomplished. [Applause.]

I hope the motion of the gentleman will prevail. Otherwise I fear that the cause of temperance will not be benefited.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman has expired. All time has expired.

Mr. HAMLIN. Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER. For what purpose does the gentleman rise?

Mr. HAMLIN. I rise to submit a request for unanimous consent. I am not going to ask the House to grant me time to submit remarks upon this proposition, but I should like permission to extend my remarks in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Missouri asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the motion of the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BURLESON] to suspend the rules——

Mr. HEFLIN. I should like to have the amendment of the gentleman from Texas again reported.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Alabama asks unanimous consent that the motion of the gentleman from Texas be again reported. Is there objection?

SEVERAL MEMBERS. Regular order!

The SPEAKER. The regular order is demanded, which is equivalent to an objection. The question is on the motion of the gentleman to suspend the rules, discharge the Committee on Appropriations from further consideration of this bill, concur in the Senate amendment with the amendment which has been read, disagree to all the other amendments, and send the bill to conference.

The question was taken, and the Speaker announced that in his opinion two-thirds had voted in the affirmative.

Mr. HOBSON. Mr. Speaker, I ask for the yeas and nays.

Mr. WEBB. I demand a division.

Mr. HENRY of Texas. The yeas and nays, Mr. Speaker.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. WEBB. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. WEBB. Did the Speaker state that we are now about to vote on the Burleson amendment also?

The SPEAKER. To vote on the whole thing as one proposition.

Mr. WEBB. I did not understand the Speaker to state——

Mr. SHERLEY. Mr. Speaker, I demand the regular order.

The SPEAKER. The regular order is demanded, which is to vote on the motion to suspend the rules and send this bill to conference.

Mr. WEBB. With the amendment.

Mr. ALEXANDER. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. ALEXANDER. As I understand it, the motion is to suspend the rules and agree to the committee amendment to the Jones-Works amendment, and disagree to all the other amendments, and send the bill to conference.

The SPEAKER. Yes.

Mr. WEBB. That is what I thought.

The SPEAKER. That is the way the Chair tried to state it.

Mr. TAGGART. Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER. For what purpose does the gentleman rise?

Mr. TAGGART. A parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. TAGGART. What is the exact proposition before the House?

The SPEAKER. The exact proposition is——

Mr. SHERLEY. Mr. Speaker, I insist that that has already been stated, and this is not in order.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Kentucky objects.

Mr. MANN. I ask unanimous consent that the motion of the gentleman from Texas be again reported.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman asks unanimous consent that the Clerk again report the motion of the gentleman from Texas. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The motion of Mr. BURLESON was again read.

Mr. DYER. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. DYER. I should like to know, if this motion prevails and this bill, with the amendments, is sent to conference, would that prevent the conferees from deciding upon some other proposition with reference to this excise matter?

The SPEAKER. That is not a parliamentary inquiry, and the Chair does not know. The question is on suspending the rules and agreeing to the motion of the gentleman from Texas

[Mr. BURLESON]. On this question the yeas and nays have been ordered, and the Clerk will call the roll.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 129, nays 171, answered "present" 5, not voting 76, as follows:

Mr. FORNES. I was in the anteroom.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman does not qualify.

The result of the vote was then announced as above recorded.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. SHERLEY] is recognized for 40 minutes under a special order.

Mr. WEBB. Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER. For what purpose does the gentleman from North Carolina rise?

Mr. WEBB. At this time am I not entitled to be recognized, the gentleman from Texas having lost his motion? If I am, I would like to make a motion that would dispose of this appropriation bill.

The SPEAKER. The bill is now where it has been for four or five days.

Mr. WEBB. I understand that, but I thought it was now before the House.

The SPEAKER. It is not before the House; it is in the Committee on Appropriations, and was brought before the House for a specific purpose.

Mr. WEBB. I have a motion, Mr. Speaker, that I wish to submit.

The SPEAKER. But there is no motion the gentleman can make in reference to it.

Mr. WEBB. Then I ask unanimous consent, Mr. Speaker——

Mr. FITZGERALD. The regular order.

The SPEAKER. The regular order is demanded, and that is to recognize the gentleman from Kentucky.

A BUDGET PROPOSAL.

Mr. SHERLEY. Mr. Speaker, I desire to express to the Members of the House my appreciation of the opportunity afforded me to speak to them in these closing hours, when there is so much of legislation to be enacted, and my only excuse is that the subject of my speech I believe to be of great importance to the House and to the country, and I desire the intelligent criticism of my colleagues touching the proposals that I shall make relative to the procedure of the House. Two days ago the President of the United States sent a message to the House on the subject of a national budget. I shall not undertake in the limited time at my disposal to deal with the many phases of so vast a subject as that or to consider the message itself, but beyond some incidental remarks touching the general subject of a budget I desire to address myself to the proposition of creating a budget committee for this House in order that there may be a more comprehensive and effective consideration of revenue and annual supply bills.

The United States is peculiar among all of the great nations of the earth in that it has never developed what might be called a budget system of government. At the time of our independence, England had not developed that system of responsible government that has since been the model for so many other nations, and a budget as a method of fixing responsibility was, in its modern sense, practically unknown. And yet the elements of a budget system are found in the Constitution itself. Article I, section 8, provides that "the Congress shall have power to levy and collect taxes, duties, imposts, and excises"; and section 9, paragraph 7, provides that "no money shall be drawn from the Treasury but in consequence of appropriations made by law, and a regular statement and account of the receipts and expenditures of all public money shall be furnished from time to time." By these provisions the legislative body, the only logical representative of a free people, is given primary and theoretically complete control over taxation and expenditure, but by virtue of other provisions in the Constitution giving to the President the power and duty to administer the law, with the right to appoint the chief administrative officers, such actual control over expenditures as is exercised by Parliament under the English system is impossible here.

I shall not undertake now any discussion of the English system. It is sufficient to point out that its cardinal virtue lies in the fact that those who administer the laws are chosen from and are a part of the legislative body and hold their ministerial posts at the will of that legislative body.

Yet constant reference is made to this system, and by some all proposals are to be measured by it. In so doing they seem to forget that government is a matter of evolution. Probably the cause of more failures to reform methods of doing government business—city, State, or National—is the fact that the man proposing the reform faces it from the outside rather than from the inside. Governments, like men, are always narrowed and restricted by habits—personal habits, if I may be pardoned for such a use of the word—habits that restrict their activity and their initiative just as they do every individual. Having in mind some of the habits of our Government, and particularly of this body, I have a proposal that, while not representing an ideal reform, is sufficiently simple, I trust, to enable it to be adopted and yet of sufficient importance to produce some real relief from our present intolerable system and in time lead the way to other reforms. But, before I read the proposal, let me very briefly outline our present practice, familiar though it is to most of you.

The theory of the makers of the Constitution was a separation of the executive, legislative, and judicial departments, a separation that has continued and must continue in the absence of a radical fundamental change in our Constitution. And as I have indicated, that makes unnecessary of consideration the many propositions that are presented that are predicated on the idea of a ministry that is the Government and comes out of and is answerable only to the legislative body; where they prepare and present a budget and on its legislative success or failure depend their ministerial lives. Here the President, chosen by all the people and absolutely free from accountability to Congress, save only through impeachment for malfeasance in office, selects his Cabinet officers, who by express constitutional prohibition may not be Members of Congress. These Cabinet officers are responsible to Congress in no true sense of the term, their tenure rests with the President, and while Congress may and does impose duties upon them, the proper performance of such duties can in no effective way be compelled by it. Among the duties so imposed is one requiring them to submit detailed estimates of needed appropriations for an ensuing year.

The estimates must be submitted to the Secretary of the Treasury by the 15th of October each year and by him submitted to Congress upon its opening in December of each year. It is made his duty to assemble them and to present them to the Congress in the form that has been usual in presentation of the estimates of the various departments; and if they are submitted to him in a form other than that in which they have heretofore been submitted, it is his duty to put them in the proper form, leaving to a footnote any suggested change in form. Recently it has been made also his duty to estimate the revenues of the ensuing year and the appropriations probably necessary for the maintenance of the Government; and if it is found that the appropriations will exceed the estimated revenues, then he shall certify that fact to the President of the United States, that the President in communicating to Congress may inform it how the appropriations can be curtailed or the revenues increased. Many other provisions of law exist touching the preparation of particular estimates, concerning which you are doubtless familiar. All of these various laws are ones limiting the discretion of the administrative officers. These limitations are frequently the cause of useless trouble and expense in particular cases, but Congress, having, as I have indicated, no real direct control over the departments and constantly finding abuses, is forced into continual limitations upon the discretion of all these officers. Congress, in brief, distrusts them, and they in return frequently assume an attitude of hostility toward its will.

And this is a condition that is not simply the result of an improper presentation of estimates and expenditures, as stated by the Economy Commission in its budget report, but grows directly out of the facts I have just stated of Cabinet officers having a fixed tenure and a responsibility, not to the body granting the funds but to the executive who is to see to their expenditure. Now, in the preparation of the estimates of the departments each Cabinet officer acts on his own responsibility, and while they are all transmitted to Congress by the Secretary of the Treasury, he is simply the messenger for the various departments.

John Sherman, one of the very greatest of the Secretaries of the Treasury that this country ever had, undertook to get the power to supervise the estimates of the other members of the Cabinet. But naturally every one of the other Secretaries objected to having a veto power given to anyone else over the budget that he presented. And so the matter failed. But Congress could well afford to give to one member of the Cabinet not only the power but to make it his duty to revise these estimates. And the reason of that would be this: You would then compel a certain consideration by the executive department of the budget as a whole. There is a tendency for each Secretary to consider the needs of his department only; and not unusually the sum total of the estimates to be submitted is found not by any consideration of the Government's power to raise revenue, not by any consideration of the relative merits of this department's demands as against that department's demands, but simply by the opinion that the head of each department has of its needs and then a sum in addition. And so I believe that one of the reforms that should be had and that could be had without in any way changing the present form of government would be to empower and direct the Secretary of the Treasury to revise the estimates. Of course we can not require the President. We can simply do as we did in this instance that I speak of, require the Secretary to communicate to the President that the President may, in turn, inform Congress. But the fatal mistake in the provision enacted was that it required the Secretary of the Treasury only to inform the President when he found the estimated revenues to be less than the estimated appropriations for the ensuing year. Now, the reason for it exists just as much in a case where the revenues of the country may be sufficient to meet the ordinary expenses as it does where we are likely to have a deficit in the revenues. And unless the duty is imposed upon him you will not have, other than through the initiative of some Executive desirous of bringing about reform, that supervision and consideration of the different items that go to make up a budget.

I quite agree with the Economy Commission that the form in which estimates are submitted is not one calculated to give to Congress the information it most needs or desires. A rearrangement should be made of the estimates, but here it is well to bear in mind what I have said of the habits of government. This Congress has adapted itself to certain classifications. Some should be abolished, but some, though scientifically not defendable, because of a fixed habit should be retained.

In some particulars we have a proper plan. The beginning of the fiscal year is near enough to the time when the estimates are submitted and near enough to the period at which those estimates are likely to have been enacted into law to bring about as much accuracy as possible in dealing with the future. In this regard I think the system is all that it should be. We have also passed stringent laws in regard to the creation of deficits, and have done much to require the keeping within the year of the expenses of the departments, and not to permit the borrowing from a future year for the expenses of a current year, with the idea of enabling the Government and the legislative branch of it to know without serious difficulty what the appropriations for a particular year happen to be. But much more can be done along this line.

But the great reform to be made is, as I have said, to compel consideration by the Executive and his Cabinet of the estimates as a whole. It may be that Congress will insist on having the original estimates of departmental chiefs, though I do not believe it need to, but certainly, if possible, the Executive should be required to assume the responsibility of a budget proposal, and Congress can then take the responsibility of granting, curtailing, or enlarging such proposal. As it is now, there is no true central Executive responsibility. Much of this reform could be had without change of law on the initiative of the President. It is his duty to advise Congress from time to time, and as a basis for such action he can require any information desired from administrative officers.

But it is not as to the administrative side of the budget that I desire to chiefly speak, but of its legislative aspect, though they are so dependent upon each other as to make it necessary to constantly consider both.

The estimates sent to Congress, as you know, are distributed to the various appropriating committees and these committees from time to time report bills appropriating such sums as are considered proper for the various governmental departments.

Up until the Civil War the Committee on Ways and Means had jurisdiction over both the levying of taxes and the appropriation of the revenues. It very properly, from the standpoint of theory, had charge of those two highest functions of government, the levying of taxes and the spending of money raised as a result of the levy. But in 1865, largely on account of the tremendous labors that were being imposed upon that committee, a division took place and there was created the Committee on Appropriations, and given to it exclusive power over the appropriation bills, leaving to the Ways and Means Committee the power it now has of exclusively considering the revenue bills. In this country it has been supposed by some people that there was not that same need for having a central authority over matters of raising revenue and matters of expenditure that existed in other countries. To my mind that is a mistake. It has been true, and probably will be true for many years, that Congress will levy taxes frequently for purposes and reasons other than the raising of revenue. But it ought to be true that somewhere in a legislative body there should be some central authority to consider the levying of taxes and the raising of revenue in connection with the appropriation of moneys for the maintenance of the Government. Nothing is stronger evidence of a bad system of government than the piling up either of huge surpluses, that are a constant invitation to extravagance, or the failure to provide sufficient revenues to meet the ordinary and necessary expenses of the Government. And to properly prevent that, there must be cooperation somewhere between that power that first formulates the bill to levy the taxes and that power that first formulates the bill disposing of the money so raised. But we have not only separated these two functions of raising revenue and of disbursing revenue, but in 1880 we took from the Committee on Appropriations control over the Agriculture appropriation bill; and that was followed in 1885 by taking from them control over the appropriation bills relative to the Army, the Navy, Indian affairs, foreign affairs, and rivers and harbors; so that to-day the Committee on Appropriations has control of 6 out of the 14 supply bills, and you have seven or eight different roads to the Treasury; and as Mr. Tawney, the former chairman of the Appropriations Committee, very happily said, "As many byways as there are members of these appropriating committees." The result of that has been that there is not now any consideration in Congress of the appropriations as a whole.

Only in these closing days of Congress has any consideration been given to the total of expenditure that is to be made for the ensuing fiscal year. In other words, after the act has been done and is in large measure beyond recall, there then comes a summing up to determine whether or not it has been a wise or a foolish act.

Now, a more indefensible system can hardly be imagined, and all will unite in condemning it. But what of the remedy? And that brings me to my proposal. I have undertaken to provide in the resolution that I will read in a moment a means to compel a consideration by this House, and through that consideration by the country at large, of the broad fundamental question of how much shall be raised and how much shall be expended during a fiscal year; and that having that, we will then be able to consider not simply the details of particular supply bills, as we do now, but how far we want to pursue a given policy of government touching expenditures along one line or another. The resolution I have introduced is in language as follows:

Resolved, That the following rule be added to the rules of the House, and to be known as section 6 to Rule X:

6. There shall be a committee on estimates and expenditures, whose personnel shall consist of the following members: The chairmen and three ranking majority members and the ranking minority member of the Committees on Ways and Means and Appropriations, and the chairman and the ranking minority member of the Committees on Rules, Agriculture, Foreign Affairs, Military Affairs, Naval Affairs, the Post Office and Post Roads, Rivers and Harbors, and Indian Affairs. The chairman of said committee shall be selected by the members thereof. Said committee shall, as soon after the convening of each regular session of Congress as may be, report to the House the amount of revenue probably available for appropriation for the next fiscal year, and apportion the amount to the several appropriation bills within the jurisdiction of the committees empowered by the rules and practice of the House to report appropriations from the Treasury. This report, or supplementary reports to meet exigencies of the public service, may be made on any legislative day after the reading of the Journal, and when agreed to by the House shall limit the totals of the appropriations reported by the several committees.

The proposal is substantially this: That instead of undertaking what I believe to be the impossible task of bringing back to the Committee on Appropriations jurisdiction of all the supply bills, to create a committee composed in its personnel of the heads of the various appropriating committees. I gave to the Committee on Ways and Means representation greater than any other committee except Appropriations. I did that because the Committee on Ways and Means is properly charged with the great function of determining the amonut of revenues that shall be available. I gave to the Committee on Appropriations a preponderance over other appropriation committees, not out of partiality for that committee, but because it has under its charge six of the great supply bills, whereas the other great appropriating committees have only one, except in the instance of the Committee on Military Affairs, which reports two supply bills. I also made as a part of that committee the chairman and the minority member of the Committee on Rules, because that is necessarily the great political committee of the House and should have a voice in a matter so fundamental as the arrangement of a budget.

This committee would consist of 16 majority Members and 10 minority Members. It is urged that that is too large a number, but I desire to suggest to the House that it is really two committees, because the majority members would necessarily come to their conclusions in private, just as the majority members of the Committee on Ways and Means now do, and they would then present to the minority members their proposal.

A counter proposal of the minority would be made, and those two proposals would come to the House for adoption or modification. These reports would bring to the attention of this House and require the consideration by it of the real purposes of government and of legislation, for in the final analysis nearly every proposition that comes before a deliberative body is one either of taxation or expenditure.

Now, I insist that one of the most vicious things that has occurred in America has been the constant raising of revenue without any consideration of the needs of revenue for the purposes of government, and, as a result of that—having a country whose tax limit has never been even approached, let alone reached—we have at various times piled up great surpluses in the Treasury, a constant invitation to extravagance in expenditures.

This report when adopted should be made a limitation upon the power of any committee to report. As an illustration, the committee on the budget estimates that the revenues will amount to a thousand million in the ensuing year and that that sum should be the amount proper to be expended. Having determined that general amount, it then allots it, and it says to the Army, "You will have $90,000,000." It says to the Navy, you shall have a hundred and thirty million dollars—of course, I am speaking just in loose figures—and to the various other appropriating committees, you can appropriate such sums. The problem, then, that will confront the departments will not be simply how much can we expend—that has been determined—but how best can we expend that sum in the interest of the people of America? [Applause.] And instead of having the ingenuity of the department expended in trying to arrive at reasons for increased appropriations you will compel every department which comes with a particularly new or pet proposal of theirs to show something that can be eliminated or economized in in order to make room for the new proposal.

Mr. HUMPHREYS of Mississippi. I would like to ask the gentleman a question there.

Mr. SHERLEY. I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. HUMPHREYS of Mississippi. Suppose the Congress should think it desirable to engage upon some enterprise; for instance, if we should undertake to take the Mississippi River out of the rivers and harbors bill and undertake to prevent the floods in the lower river just as we undertake to dig the Panama Canal, would not the fact that the budget at the opening of the sessions had limited the expenses to a given sum for that year preclude the Congress from undertaking that work?

Mr. SHERLEY. It would not necessarily, because the committee on the budget is given power to bring in supplemental estimates from time to time.

Mr. HUMPHREYS of Mississippi. It would not prevent any committee from bringing in such a bill without the consent of the budget committee previously obtained?

Mr. SHERLEY. It would as to any appropriation not provided for in the original report or some subsequent report of the budget committee. Now, the resolution I read I do not think is complete, nor do I think it is entirely in the proper form. I am sure that it should be supplemented by a rule which would make subject to the point of order any bill reported by any committee appropriating a sum that was in excess of the amount allotted for such purpose; so it would be within the individual power of any single Member to recommit to the committee reporting it a bill which violates the rule that the House had adopted. In addition to that I am inclined to believe we are going to be forced to the position now occupied in the English Parliament, where it is no longer in the right of a single member to make a motion to increase any item in any of the supply bills.

Mr. FOWLER. The gentleman says you make subject to a point of order an appropriation in amount in excess of the budget allowance. Now, would the gentleman also make it subject to the point of order to appropriate a sum less than the amount of the budget allowance?

Mr. SHERLEY. By no means. I would not undertake to say these committees in working out their details should not make economies beyond that suggested by the budget committee. The whole function of the budget committee is not to usurp the work now being done by the various appropriating committees, because, in my judgment, there is no limited number of men, such as would comprise a committee of working size, sufficiently industrious and sufficiently intelligent to do the work of preparing the detail of all the supply bills that are to be appropriated by this Congress, and that is one of my answers to the proposal frequently made that you should give back to the Appropriations Committee entire charge. I say, if we do that, it will result in dividing that committee simply into subcommittees, and that those subcommittees would be as distinct for all practical purposes as the various appropriating committees are now.

Mr. HAMLIN. I am in entire sympathy with the gentleman, I think, and I believe he is along the right line; but it has been suggested—I have heard it suggested—that it might place too much power in the hands of a few men, and, as I understand the general scheme, this budget committee must report to the House, and the House must adopt its report before it is binding.

Mr. SHERLEY. The gentleman is right. The budget committee's report would be binding only when approved by the House.

Now, the criticism suggested by some and just mentioned by the gentleman really applies to the proposal urged in lieu of mine, of giving back to the Appropriation Committee exclusive jurisdiction of supply bills. That is what destroyed it before. That committee would determine what is the real function of the House alone to determine—the relative size of the various bills. Now, I believe in power and with it responsibility, but what I particularly want is the power of a party and not a committee of a party, and then, as a true sequence, party responsibility.

In my judgment, a lot of the trouble in American public life now is not so much that a combination of men have too much power, but that many individual men have so much hidden power that no party can be held responsible by the American people. I am a believer in party government. I believe the present condition of affairs we are passing through in America is altogether a temporary one. You can not agree to the idea, that we of Anglo-Saxon stock have been bred to believe in, of a true representative government unless you have party responsibility, and one of the curious features of evolution in America is that everywhere else than upon the floor of this House the tendency has been more and more toward the centralization of power, and with it responsibility. What is the meaning of the commission form of government in cities? What is the meaning of the constant tendency to lessen the number of officials? It is to give to a limited number of people power, and then give to the great body of the people the right to make those men who have been given this power answerable and responsible.

Now, we have developed in America a peculiar system, a system of committee government largely brought about by the tremendous detail of legislation that comes in a great country like this. The result is that every old Member realizes that in committee is done most of the great creative work touching legislation. That is a condition that we could not change now if we would. But it ought to result not in taking away from committees power in the first instance, but in bringing their work before Congress, so that the whole body can pass judgment upon it and so as to create party responsibility. We had a debate in this House just a few days ago touching the size of the American Navy. That debate should not have happened on the naval bill. It ought to have happened in the consideration of a budget. This House ought to determine, the Congress ought to determine, in the first instance, how much it can and how much it is willing to expend for military purposes, whether for the Army or for the Navy, how much for peace, how much for the ordinary upkeep of the Government, and that determination should be made before we get into the details of bills.

If that had been had, the question that would have been before this House for determination when the naval bill was up would not have been the size of the bill, but whether the particular items were proper items and whether that amount of money could better be expended in building a particular type of ship or another type or doing this particular work or that particular work. Instead of that you had a debate here that undertook, in a way, to review the general appropriations and whether we were runing away beyond what Congress ought to appropriate during a single session.

Mr. TILSON. Mr. Speaker, may I interrupt the gentleman?

Mr. SHERLEY. Certainly.

Mr. TILSON. I would like to ask just what part the gentleman has assigned here to the Senate? What would he do with the amendments brought in by the Senate?

Mr. SHERLEY. That raises a question I expected to come to later, but will discuss now. It has been suggested that this plan would be of no avail because we fail to take into consideration the Senate, which is a body of equal power with this. I grant you that is a weakness, and it may be that the remedy for that is to have this committee on the budget to report a concurrent resolution, which shall be adopted by the House and sent to the Senate, and there considered by the Senate and if modified go through the ordinary course of conference, and finally be agreed to, and, when agreed to, shall mark the absolute limitations of the Congress.

Some have suggested the idea of a joint committee made up of the House and the Senate, but knowing, as I said in the beginning, the habits of Governments, the habits of these legislative bodies, I did not believe it was practicable, at least at this time, to bring about such a joint committee of the House and the Senate. But this I do think would happen, even if we had no cooperation with the Senate: The very moment you focused public attention upon such a consideration as I have outlined would be the result of this budget committee's report, that moment you would stop most of the abuses that we all now recognize.

Why is it the American people are so indifferent to expenditure? Is it that they are an extravagant people? Is it that they accept in a loose way the constantly repeated statement made here of a former Speaker, that this was a billion-dollar country, and therefore we should have a billion-dollar Congress? No. The reason the American people have heretofore not been interested in questions of expenditure is because they have never had brought to their attention in its broad aspect this question of expenditure. The only time the American people know anything about what we are going to spend is after we have appropriated it, just as this House only knows after it has ended its labors. If this House had known in advance it was liable to find itself with the total it now finds itself with, in my judgment you would have had a very different attitude touching these various supply bills, and when the people have learned of the expenditures, there is no party upon whom can be rightfully placed the responsibility.

While as to the personnel of this budget committee I am not indifferent, I am in no sense wedded to the proposal here made. It has been suggested by some that it would be well simply to have two majority members and one minority member of each of the appropriating committees. My own idea was that the Ways and Means Committee and the Committee on Appropriations were entitled to a larger representation, because they represented in their subsequent work larger interests than those of any other single committee.

Mr. ALEXANDER. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. FLOYD of Arkansas). Does the gentleman yield?

Mr. SHERLEY. Certainly.

Mr. ALEXANDER. If the resolution were agreed to and this budget committee created, would it not devolve upon this budget committee the duty of hearing all the claims made for appropriations, and would they not duplicate the work of the several committees or else take over to themselves that entire work? How would you manage that?

Mr. SHERLEY. I think not, although I want to say that the clerk of the Committee on Appropriations, for whose judgment I have a very great respect, and who has had an experience away beyond that of any man here, has thought that that would be the result. Here is what I think: I believe that it would be easily possible for such a committee, having as a part of its personnel men who by previous experience as chairmen of the various committees were familiar with details, to consider the broad questions without hearing all of the people that these various committees now hear or determining all the details. And I suggest a further thought that the trouble now is with all of our appropriations that they are not based upon what we ought to expend or upon what the country ought to be willing to stand for in the way of taxation, but they are based upon what men who have the expenditures to make say they need or desire.

I believe the time is coming in America when Federal taxation plus that already made by State and county and city is going to be sufficiently burdensome for the membership of this House to consider how far it is warranted in levying a tax; and whenever you reach that point, then you have got to consider—truly consider—a budget. Heretofore, with the idea of doing welfare work by virtue of taxation, we have gathered together such huge revenues that we have never had to consider the question of retrenchment, except occasionally in times of depression.

Mr. ALEXANDER. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Does the gentleman yield?

Mr. SHERLEY. Certainly.

Mr. ALEXANDER. I simply want the gentleman from Kentucky to understand that I am in entire accord with the purpose that he hopes to accomplish.

Mr. SHERLEY. I am obliged to the gentleman for his interest and inquiry.

Mr. HARDWICK. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Does the gentleman yield?

Mr. SHERLEY. Yes.

Mr. HARDWICK. As I understand the gentleman's plan, it is that, with the exception of some Members from the Committee on Ways and Means and some from the Committee on Rules, the balance of the budget committee would be taken from the appropriating committees of the House. Of course, that is necessary to some extent; but does the gentleman consider that on this budget committee some balance or equilibrium ought to be maintained between the appropriating and the nonappropriating committees; or, in other words, between the fellows who want to hold things down and the fellows who want to increase appropriations? I ask the gentleman whether it would not be a good thing to hold a balance between the economists and the others who might not be economists?

Mr. FITZGERALD. Where are they? [Laughter.]

Mr. HARDWICK. I do not know. My private opinion is that they are not anywhere. [Laughter.]

Mr. SHERLEY. The safety lies in the fact that you have to have the approval of the House of the budget committee's recommendation before it becomes effective. What I believe would happen is this, that the recommendations of the majority members of the budget committee would come before a caucus of that party and would be perfected and adopted in caucus, and that the minority proposals would come before the minority caucus and be approved there.

Now, I know that there are men on this floor who absolutely differ with that idea, men who do not want what they say is caucus government. I answer by saying that what you need in America more than anything else is party responsibility. Who is answerable for large expenditures? We on this side load the blame on you, and you in return lay it on us. Each of us points to various and sundry votes that have been cast touching appropriations to support our position. But whenever a party comes in with a proposal touching the expenditures for the entire ensuing year, that moment it will make an issue, and an intelligent issue, on which the electorate of the country will determine who shall be given the reins of power.

Mr. HAMLIN. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield to me for an interruption?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Does the gentleman yield?

Mr. SHERLEY. Certainly.

Mr. HAMLIN. I recognize that this is one of the most important propositions that has come before the House lately, and I am very much interested in it. I want to ask the gentleman this question: The country is growing from year to year, and of course appropriations and expenditures must keep pace with the growth of the country. Now, this budget committee, in parceling out the amounts of money that shall be permitted to be appropriated this year by the Naval Committee or the Military Committee or the Committee on Agriculture or any other committee, will have to take into consideration, will it not, the estimates of the different departments?

Mr. SHERLEY. Yes; of course.

Mr. HAMLIN. Would they not have to hear evidence?

Mr. SHERLEY. They ought to take up the estimates in one sense. I believe, as I said in the beginning, that this is only a step toward a full reform. What you must have finally is to have the administrative end of the Government present its budget to the legislative end, a statement of what it is willing to stand sponsor for and what it considers to be needed, and then let the legislative body, as it alone can do, determine the policy of how far it will warrant the proposals of the administrative end.

Now, as to the hearing of evidence. The gentleman has in mind that that would require a consideration of details, just as suggested by the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. ALEXANDER]. I answer no. I believe it is possible to bring before the committee the broad, general question of expenditures. They would not have to go into the details. For instance, take the Committee on Fortifications. I speak of that because as chairman of that subcommittee I am peculiarly familiar with it. That bill carries, as a rule, somewhere from four to seven or eight million dollars a year, dependent somewhat upon the amount of new work that is to be undertaken, the maintenance funds, and so forth. The budget committee would not be required to do the detailed work of examining that my subcommittee does in determining whether a particular amount of money is necessary to buy searchlights or range finders in order to decide whether this Government, as a matter of policy, should spend $5,000,000 or $7,000,000 or $10,000,000 or $15,000,000 on seacoast defenses.

The trouble is that we have all gotten a reverse idea of the functions here. We have gotten the idea that the policy of Congress is to be determined by estimates. I insist that it is the duty of Congress to determine how much it can afford to tax the people of America; and, having determined that, then to apportion the amounts to be used for the various purposes that they consider requisite and necessary.

Mr. HAMLIN. In that I agree with the gentleman from Kentucky absolutely; but it occurs to me that in the evolution of this thing finally it might result in the budget committee of necessity going into details, and I want to say that I do not believe I would be averse to that idea. I do not know but what all of these appropriation bills ought to be reported from one committee.

Mr. SHERLEY. My own judgment is that it is absolutely impossible for one committee to do it.

Mr. HAMLIN. With a large committee you could subdivide it.

Mr. SHERLEY. If you subdivide it, you have all the ills you now have, of a divided control over the matter; and what I am after is not simply the consideration by the same individuals of each individual bill, but I am after forcing the consideration by the Congress, and through it by the country, of totals. That is the important thing that must be brought about if you are to have a reform.

Mr. HARDY. I understand the gentleman's whole theory is that the Government, as a wise business concern, should start off by saying how much money it may be able to raise and spend during the year, and then say to the departments, "Make your estimates within that total range."

Mr. SHERLEY. Unquestionably. As I have said, this theory found expression when the Ways and Means Committee had not only charge of the revenue-raising bills, but it had charge of all appropriating bills; and it was only at the time of the Civil War that that power was taken away from the Ways and Means Committee. It is interesting to remember why. It was because the work became so heavy that they could not do it. Then what happened? The Committee on Appropriations had the entire jurisdiction of supply bills, and there came a great fight on a great leader who was chairman of that committee, and it was believed that Samuel J. Randall had gathered to himself so much power as chairman of the Committee on Appropriations that in order to give to the membership their proper share in the Government the Committee on Appropriations should be stripped of some of its power; and gradually, one by one, the appropriating powers that now find lodgment in these various other committees were taken from the Committee on Appropriations.

Mr. HAMLIN. I understand that perfectly, I think; but here is the idea: How could this committee properly and fairly determine how much money the Rivers and Harbors Committee, for instance, could expend this year unless they went into the details of the work?

Mr. SHERLEY. The thing to determine first is how much the Rivers and Harbors Committee shall spend; not how much they could spend.

Mr. HAMLIN. I did not mean how much they could spend. I meant how much they needed and ought properly to have.

Mr. SHERLEY. The Rivers and Harbors Committee is a very good illustration. River and harbor work, so far as it relates to contract obligations, ought to be determined by a settled policy that should bear a relationship to the necessary expenditures made along other lines of governmental activity. In other words, every question of expenditure is not simply a question of whether a particular thing is well to do, but whether that thing is well to do, having in mind the need or the desirability of doing some other particular thing. Therefore it would be perfectly easy for a budget committee to determine as a matter of policy that, say, $50,000,000 should be expended for river and harbor work. And it would not need, in order to determine that question, to go into the subject of how much money was needed for the particular work on Red River or how much was needed on the Missouri or the Ohio, but it would determine that, considering the revenues, we can afford to spend only so much, and then it would properly leave it to the Rivers and Harbors Committee to work out the details.

Mr. EDWARDS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SHERLEY. Yes.

Mr. EDWARDS. Does not the gentleman think that perhaps we would be up against this proposition: The budget committee would say that it might expend, say, $50,000,000 for the purpose of improving rivers and harbors, and there would be an incentive or inclination on the part of the committee to go up to it, when, in point of fact, the necessities might not require that amount?

Mr. SHERLEY. That might be so; but they go up to that point and beyond it now. There would be this: If you carried along with this proposal the other proposal that it should not be in order, in the consideration of any supply bills, for a man to offer an amendment increasing the amount, the activity of the Committee of the Whole would be engaged in holding down the appropriation, whereas every man knows now that every chairman of a committee with a supply bill who comes out here does not have to fight to keep his bill from being reduced, but he has to fight to keep the Committee of the Whole from running away with it and increasing it. Why? Because the selfishness of individual men will always compel, whenever the House permits it, these men to increase expenditures.

So you have to-day by the rules to protect the Committee of the Whole against the selfish opportunity of individuals. We are all alike; we live in an atmosphere where a man's success here is essential if he is to live. He does not have the opportunity a member of Parliament has, where he lives or falls with his party. Here every man has to show an individual activity under our present system, and as the result of a spur from behind he is constantly seeking to get something for his particular locality, and until you prevent that by the rules or cultivate a public opinion that will not judge Members by the amount of money they bring home to their districts, you will have the same tendency continued.

Mr. EDWARDS. How many Members does the gentleman say the budget committee ought to consist of?

Mr. SHERLEY. I have stated, 26 Members.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Kentucky has expired.

Mr. AUSTIN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the time of the gentleman from Kentuck; be extended 15 minutes.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Tennessee asks unanimous consent that the time of the gentleman from Kentucky be extended 15 minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. MURDOCK. Will the gentleman from Kentucky yield to me for a question?

Mr. SHERLEY. Certainly.

Mr. MURDOCK. Under our party government ordinarily the executive department is of the same party as the legislative department, or the majority in the legislature, and the executive department, by reason of patronage and other things, dominates more or less the legislative branch, and the origin to-day of appropriations is not generally on the floor but is in the departmental offices. They do make extravagant demands upon the legislative committees. As I understand the gentleman's proposition, it is—and I think it has virtue—that the initiative of the amounts to be expended will be, in fact, in the legislative body and not in the executive body?

Mr. SHERLEY. Not entirely. It is true that no legislative body can, by virtue of its very numbers, by virtue of the multiplicity of its duties, know as the administrative officers can know the particular needs of a particular service. They only know in the first instance, and there must of necessity be given to the Congress through the administrative offices this information, and that is the true function of the budget from the administrative end. But this is a legislative function; having obtained that information, to determine how far, considering that every expenditure represents a tax, the resources of the country warrant the levying of taxes to raise given amounts, and how far a particular bit of governmental activity, though it may be worth while as an abstract thing, is warranted, having in mind the burdens of taxation and the need of certain other things.

Mr. MURDOCK. Will it not actually follow under that proposition that the executive department, having in mind certain necessities and referring that to Congress as the needs of the department, will determine the budget and the amount of money to be expended, and will you not be traveling in a circle?

Mr. SHERLEY. Not entirely. In the first place, the time has never been when Congress absolutely accepted the recommendation of the department, and it never will be and it never should be; Congress should always exercise a supervision over it. The trouble now is that you get nothing from the departments that approaches a budget.

The Executive has absolutely neglected one of the chief functions of an administrative officer, and that is not simply to see that moneys appropriated are properly and economically expended, but to determine the needs of the Government as a whole. As I stated in the beginning, estimates are now made by district and local officers. They go on up through the heads of the departments and finally to the Cabinet officers, and then are by them sent through the Secretary of the Treasury to Congress. You have no real premier of the Cabinet, and you have never had practically a consideration by the Executive of a budget as such.

Mr. MURDOCK. But you do have a maximum demand from all departments.

Mr. SHERLEY. Yes; but it largely represents an appetite rather than a theory of government.

Mr. MURDOCK. Yes; and Congress largely follows it.

Mr. SHERLEY. No; I do not think so; but it follows it somewhat, because its consideration of the estimates is just as faulty in method as the consideration by the President is faulty in the first instance. We, just as much as he, have failed to consider totals.

Mr. AUSTIN. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SHERLEY. Certainly.

Mr. AUSTIN. When the budget committee makes its report to the House will the House have any right to increase the amount carried in the budget?

Mr. SHERLEY. Unquestionably; and that is the debate that ought to take place on the floor at the beginning of Congress, as to whether the party charged with responsibility has made a sufficient allowance for agriculture, a sufficient allowance for the Navy and the Army, or for pensions or for any other subject of appropriation.

Mr. AUSTIN. Suppose the budget committee should decide in favor of an expenditure of $25,000,000 for public buildings and grounds, who would determine the items to make up that $25,000,000?

Mr. SHERLEY. The Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds.

Mr. OLMSTED. Mr. Speaker, if a question as to what amount of money should be expended for agriculture or for the Navy or for the Army were to be debated at the beginning of Congress, how would you determine how much is required, unless you first have hearings such as the Committee on Appropriations or the Committee on Agriculture has, where the heads of the departments appear?

Mr. SHERLEY. I do not think that you could have the debate that is properly had in the consideration of the details of a bill, but I think that you could have a pretty general debate as to how well you are following out a policy touching any one question. Let us take the Navy, for instance. I use that because that is in the minds of us all. Suppose the administration determines as a governmental policy that the Navy should be increased each year by the addition of two battleships, and we called that a naval program.

The majority in control of the House brings in a proposal carrying so many millions of dollars for the Navy. Some gentlemen will ask those in charge of the bill if that contemplates the expenditure for one battleship or two battleships. The reply is made that the total is based on an expenditure for one battleship, and the question is asked why, and he is answered, then, because it is found that we have to expend so much for the Army and so much for agriculture and so much for the judiciary and so much for the ordinary upkeep, and so forth, that the probable revenues that the Government will have amount to so many millions, and that if we give to the Navy enough money to build two battleships we will have to cut some of these other items or increase taxation or have a deficit. That raises the question, then, not simply as to the desirability of two battleships, but as to the desirability of two battleships as against an Army of a certain size, as against certain expenditures for agriculture, and so forth.

In other words, it brings a discussion of comparative merit rather than a discussion of particular items segregated from everything else.

Mr. AUSTIN. Would it not reduce also the time consumed in this House in the consideration of appropriation bills?

Mr. SHERLEY. I think it would; and that brings to mind another thought. I believe we have to get away from the plan that I have advocated and that a great many others have advocted heretofore of detailed specifications and limitation upon every appropriation. If the gentleman heard the first of my speech, he will recall that I said in substance that we treat every executive officer as if he were a suspicious character, and he treats us as if we were a lot of numskulls who knew nothing about the needs of the service, and out of that mutual suspicion comes half the trouble. Aside from the fundamental reason of absence of responsibility to us, one reason we have had to treat him as a suspicious character is because the form of making estimates and the form of reports of work done did not give us information as to whether it was well done or not, and so, for fear it might not be well done, we have taken away discretion and tied his hands, whereas the real system ought to be to give to an administrative officer some discretion and then require accountability.

I do not wish to further delay the House, but I want to make this suggestion while it is in my mind. I do not suggest this plan as the ultima thule of government, and I do not suggest it as the best that can be had, but I submit to this House that we do need a change, as the present condition is intolerable [applause], and I ask my critics to suggest something better if they are not pleased with this and I shall be perfectly willing to modify it; but the time has come for action on the part of Congress. Let us look to some system better than the antiquated method we now have.

Mr. AUSTIN. I desire to ask the gentleman if the Committee on Appropriations have thoroughly discussed this plan and approved of it?

Mr. SHERLEY. No; there are nearly as many opinions in the Committee on Appropriations as there are members of that committee. The other one most frequently urged and which is held by the chairman of the committee [Mr. FITZGERALD] and by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON] is to return to the old condition where the Appropriations Committee had exclusive jurisdiction of all supply bills.

I have already referred several times to that proposal and its fatal defect. To my mind, no plan is effective that does not provide for the consideration of the total sum to be appropriated prior to a consideration of individual supply bills. This is true, even though one committee have exclusive jurisdiction of supply bills.

Now, if the advocates of the Appropriation Committee propose a submission by it to the House of a budget, then every argument they advance against my plan applies equally to theirs with the added difficulty of taking from other Members powers they now have, and giving to the already overburdened members of the Appropriations Committee such additional powers.

I do not for a moment believe that the members of these other committees will ever consent to give up their power over the details of these supply bills, but I do believe that without unduly disturbing existing conditions a budget committee as outlined can be formed.

I am very much obliged to the House for its patience. [Loud applause.]

INVESTIGATION OF FINANCIAL CONDITIONS.

Mr. PUJO. Mr. Speaker, I desire to submit a privileged report (H. Rept. 1593) to the House in reference to the monetary investigation.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Louisiana submits a privileged report to the House.

Mr. PUJO. Mr. Speaker, I would request——

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry. Is it a privileged report?

Mr. PUJO. Yes.

Mr. MANN. By what authority?

The SPEAKER. The Chair has not examined it; the gentleman from Louisiana said it was privileged.

Mr. PUJO. Mr. Speaker, I ask also that the views of the minority may be likewise presented with the majority report.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, reserving the point of order, by what authority does the gentleman offer this as a privileged report?

Mr. PUJO. By authority of legislation.

Mr. MANN. Well, I know; but that is not an answer to the question.

Mr. PUJO. That is a most perfect answer to the question. This House authorized and instructed the Committee on Banking and Currency to make an investigation of certain conditions in this country. They have done so, and desire to submit their report to the House. I hope the gentleman from Illinois does not object to the report being submitted.

Mr. MANN. I have no objection to the gentleman making the report that is to be dropped in the basket. What I am asking is by what authority does he announce on the floor that it is a privileged report. The gentleman can put his report in the basket.

Mr. PUJO. Why, by the authority of the dignity of this House.

Mr. MANN. Lots of reports are made in the House——

The SPEAKER. Every report that is made in the House has a certain dignity but there is not anything that makes this report privileged.

Mr. PUJO. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to make this report to the House.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, if the report is put in the basket it is made to the House.

Mr. PUJO. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to make the report to the House upon the investigation of financial and monetary conditions.

Mr. MANN. Reserving the right to object, I have no objection to the gentleman presenting his report if it does not give it a privileged status. I do not know what the gentleman's intentions may be.

The SPEAKER. The usual way is, except certain things that are specified in the rule as privileged, the report goes through the basket, or the box, as it is called. The gentleman has a perfect right to file it.

Mr. PUJO. I have asked unanimous consent to submit it to the House and bring it to their attention. Of course, if they do not want to——

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman be permitted to hand in his report and hand it to the Clerk so the Clerk can read the title.

Mr. GARDNER of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I wish to ask the gentleman whether it is true that he made an agreement with Mr. Untermyer that no question should be asked of witnesses except with Mr. Untermyer's approval?

Mr. PUJO. Mr. Speaker, if the House will permit me to take a little of its time, I will say that no such agreement was made. The rules of the House provide, with reference to the examinations of witnesses, that no question can be submitted except by permission of the chairman. That is the rule. If the gentleman from Massachusetts, who is quite a parliamentarian, will look up Jefferson's Manual, he will find that no one has the right to ask a question except through the chairman of the committee. There was no such agreement made with Mr. Untermyer or anybody else, and every member of the committee had the right to submit his questions through the chairman and the attorney.

Mr. GARDNER of Massachusetts. Were any questions asked that Mr. Untermyer did not O. K.?

Mr. PUJO. Many of them, very many of them.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Louisiana asks unanimous consent to present this report to the House.

Mr. MANN. As the gentleman has the right, under the rules of the House, to make his report in the usual manner, and as the request might carry with it the giving of the report a privileged status, and thereupon authorize the reading of the report in full at this stage of the proceeding. I shall object.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Louisiana [Mr. PUJO] asks unanimous consent that the minority have the right to file its views.

Mr. PUJO. Two separate views.

Mr. BYRNES of South Carolina. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I wish to say in reply to the gentleman from Massachusetts that no such agreement was ever made by the subcommittee, as that no question should be asked except with the approval of Mr. Untermyer, but, on the contrary, he was directed to ask any question that was asked or suggested by any member of that committee. And I know that I have asked questions of one witness without ever asking anything of Mr. Untermyer or anybody else.

Mr. GARDNER of Massachusetts. Then, why was a question submitted to him in writing?

Mr. BYRNES of South Carolina. Questions were submitted to the chairman in writing whenever a member of the committee desired to have a question asked, but it is also true that a great many questions were asked by counsel upon the suggestions of members of the committee without being written or submitted to the chairman.

Mr. GARDNER of Massachusetts. Were they not submitted to Mr. Untermyer? Yes or no.

Mr. BYRNES of South Carolina. They were not. Sometimes they were, but never for his approval or disapproval, and I am satisfied no member of the committee will say he ever refused to ask any question suggested to him.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the request of the gentleman from Louisiana [Mr. PUJO] that the minority shall have the right to file its views. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. McMORRAN. Mr. Speaker, I ask that they be allowed to file two separate minority views.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. SHERLEY. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. Crockett, one of its clerks, announced that the Senate had passed with amendments bill of the following title, in which the concurrence of the House of Representatives was requested:

H. R. 28775. An act making appropriations for sundry civil expenses of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1914, and for other purposes.

The message also announced that the Senate had passed without amendment the following resolution:

House concurrent resolution 72.

Resolved by the House of Representatives (the Senate concurring), That the President is requested to return to the House of Representatives the bill (H. R. 18787) relating to the limitations of the hours of daily service of laborers and mechanics employed upon a public work of the United States and the District of Columbia, and of all persons employed in constructing, maintaining, or improving a river or harbor of the United States and of the District of Columbia, and that the action of the Speaker of the House of Representatives and the President of the Senate in signing the said enrolled bill be rescinded.

DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. BURLESON. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the Committee on Appropriations be discharged from further consideration of the bill (H. R. 28499) making appropriations to provide for the expenses of the Government of the District of Columbia for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1914, and for other purposes, nonconcur in all the amendments save amendment numbered 132, the amendment known as the "Jones-Works excise bill," that that amendment be considered in the House as in the Committee of the Whole under the five-minute rule, and that after consideration a conference be requested.

Mr. CARY. I object.

Mr. HARDWICK. Mr. Speaker, I raise the point of order that there is no quorum present.

Mr. CARY. I object, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. HARDWICK. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of order that there is no quorum present.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will count. [After counting.] One hundred and seventy-five Members are present—not a quorum.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Speaker, I move a call of the House.

The motion was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The Doorkeeper will close the doors, the Sergeant at Arms will notify absentees, and the Clerk will call the roll.

The roll was called, and the following Members failed to answer to their names:

The SPEAKER. On this roll call 293 Members have responded—a quorum.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Speaker, I move to dispense with further proceedings under the call.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York [Mr. FITZGERALD] moves to dispense with further proceedings under the call. The question is on agreeing to that motion.

The motion was agreed to.

SUNDRY CIVIL APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's table the bill (H. R. 28775) making appropriations for sundry civil expenses of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1914, and for other purposes, to disagree to the Senate amendments, and ask for a conference.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York [Mr. FITZGERALD] asks unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's table the bill H. R. 28775, the sundry civil appropriation bill, disagree to the Senate amendments, and ask for a conference. The Clerk will report the bill.

The Clerk reported the title of the bill, as follows:

An act (H. R. 28775) making appropriations for sundry civil expenses of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1914, and for other purposes.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. RODDENBERY. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I wish to inquire of the gentleman from New York. How much is the bill increased as it comes from the Senate over what it was as it passed the House?

Mr. FITZGERALD. I am not quite certain. My recollection is that when it was reported from the Senate committee it carried in the neighborhood of $6,000,000 over the amount carried in the House bill. A hasty examination of the RECORD discloses the fact that very late last night the Senate adopted some amendments which will add something like $8,000,000, or possibly more; I should say, at least, altogether, $7,000,000.

Mr. RODDENBERY. Can the gentleman state in round numbers the amount of appropriations in the bill as it passed the House?

Mr. FITZGERALD. My recollection is that the bill as it passed the House carried about $113,000,000.

Mr. RODDENBERY. And as it came back from the Senate it is about $120,000,000?

Mr. FITZGERALD. That is my opinion.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection; and the Speaker announced as the conferees on the part of the House Mr. FITZGERALD, Mr. SHERLEY, and Mr. CANNON.

BRIDGE ACROSS THE LUMBER RIVER, N. C.

Mr. SIMS rose.

The SPEAKER. For what purpose does the gentleman rise?

Mr. SIMS. I rise to make a privileged motion, as I understand it. There is a House bill reported (H. R. 28810) to authorize the Virginia & Carolina Southern Railroad Co. to construct a bridge across the Lumber River at or near the town of Lumberton, N. C. The Senate has passed a bill that is the same or identical, as I understand it. It is now on the Speaker's table.

The SPEAKER. What is the number of the Senate bill?

Mr. SIMS. Senate bill is numbered 8565.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, if the gentleman desires unanimous consent to take that bill from the Speaker's table, I have no objection.

Mr. SIMS. It will take only three minutes. I will ask unanimous consent to do that. I want to get it through in the way that will be speediest.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. SIMS] asks unanimous consent for the present consideration of the Senate bill 8565 in lieu of the House bill No. 28810. The Clerk will report the Senate bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

An act (S. 8565) to authorize the Virginia & Carolina Southern Railroad Co. to construct a bridge across the Lumber River at or near the town of Lumberton, N. C.

Be it enacted, etc., That the Virginia & Carolina Southern Railroad Co., a corporation organized under the laws of the State of North Carolina, is hereby authorized to construct, maintain, and operate a bridge and approaches across the Lumber River, at or near the town of Lumberton, or North Lumberton, State of North Carolina, at a point suitable to the interests of navigation, in accordance with the provisions of the act entitled "An act to regulate the construction of bridges over navigable waters," approved March 23, 1906.

SEC. 2. That the right to alter, amend, or repeal this act is hereby expressly reserved.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the third reading of the Senate bill.

The Senate bill was ordered to be read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

The SPEAKER. The House bill of similar import will lie on the table.

On motion of Mr. SIMS, a motion to reconsider the vote whereby the Senate bill was passed was laid on the table.

OFFICERING AND MANNING OF VESSELS.

Mr. ALEXANDER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to call up the bill (H. R. 23676) to regulate the officering and manning of vessels subject to the inspection laws of the United States, with Senate amendments, and to concur in the Senate amendments. The amendments are satisfactory to the House Committee on the Merchant Marine and Fisheries.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Missouri [Mr. ALEXANDER] moves to take from the Speaker's table a House bill with Senate amendments. The Clerk will report the bill and amendments.

The Clerk read the title of the bill (H. R. 23676) to regulate the officering and manning of vessels subject to the inspection laws of the United States.

The Senate amendments were read.

Mr. ALEXANDER. I move to concur in the Senate amendments.

The motion was agreed to.

On motion of Mr. ALEXANDER, a motion to reconsider the last vote was laid on the table.

JUDICIAL DISTRICTS OF PENNSYLVANIA.

Mr. OLMSTED. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (S. 7802) to amend section 103 of the act entitled "An act to codify, revise, and amend the laws relating to the judiciary," approved March 3, 1911.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Pennsylvania asks unanimous consent for the present consideration of a bill, which the Clerk will report.

Mr. HARDWICK. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. HARDWICK. Is it in order now, under the practice of the Speaker, to entertain a request for unanimous consent?

Mr. OLMSTED. I hope the gentleman will not make any objection.

Mr. HARDWICK. I simply desire to know whether, under the present practice of the House and of the present Speaker, it is in order to recognize a gentleman from the floor to make a request for unanimous consent.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will ascertain as soon as he can. What is the present parliamentary status of this bill?

Mr. OLMSTED. It is a Senate bill, which has passed the Senate and been unanimously reported to the House by the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. HARDWICK. Is it on the Unanimous Consent Calendar?

Mr. OLMSTED. It is on the Unanimous Consent Calendar, but it was put on too late. It has not been on that calendar three days.

Mr. HARDWICK. Other people have bills which are on the Unanimous Consent Calendar.

Mr. OLMSTED. This is the last request I shall make in this House.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Pennsylvania asks unanimous consent. If the gentleman from Georgia wishes to object, he can do so.

Mr. HARDWICK. I was simply asking if the Chair was prepared to entertain these requests.

The SPEAKER. The Chair does not raise points of order himself except on extraordinary occasions.

Mr. MANN. Let us have the bill read.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the bill.

The bill was read, as follows:

An act (S. 7802) to amend section 103 of the act entitled "An act to codify, revise, and amend the laws relating to the judiciary," approved March 3, 1911.

Be it enacted, etc., That section 103 of an act entitled "An act to codify, revise, and amend the laws relating to the judiciary," approved March 3, 1911, be, and the same is hereby, amended so as to read as follows:

"SEC. 103. That the State of Pennsylvania is divided into three judicial districts, to be known as the eastern, middle, and western districts of Pennsylvania. The eastern district shall include the territory embraced on the 1st day of July, 1910, in the counties of Berks, Bucks, Chester, Delaware, Lancaster, Lehigh, Montgomery, Northampton, Philadelphia, and Schuylkill. Terms of the district court shall be held at Philadelphia on the second Mondays in March and June, the third Monday in September, and the second Monday in December, each term to continue until the succeeding term begins. The middle district shall include the territory embraced on the 1st day of July, 1910, in the counties of Adams, Bradford, Cameron, Carbon, Center, Clinton, Columbia, Cumberland, Dauphin, Franklin, Fulton, Huntingdon, Juniata, Lackawanna, Lebanon, Luzerne, Lycoming, Mifflin, Monroe, Montour, Northumberland, Perry, Pike, Potter, Snyder, Sullivan, Susquehanna, Tioga, Union, Wayne, Wyoming, and York. Terms of the district court shall be held at Scranton on the second Monday in March and the third Monday in October, at Harrisburg on the first Mondays in May and December, at Sunbury on the second Monday in January, and at Williamsport on the first Monday in June. The clerk of the court for the middle district shall maintain an office, in charge of himself or a deputy, at Harrisburg, and civil suits instituted at that place shall be tried there, if either party resides nearest that place of holding court, unless by consent of parties they are removed to another place for trial. The western district shall include the territory embraced on the 1st day of July, 1910, in the counties of Allegheny, Armstrong, Beaver, Bedford, Blair, Butler, Cambria, Clarion, Clearfield, Crawford, Elk, Erie, Fayette, Forest, Greene, Indiana, Jefferson, Lawrence, McKean, Mercer, Somerset, Venango, Warren, Washington, and Westmoreland. Terms of the district court shall be held at Pittsburgh on the first Monday in May and the third Monday in October, and at Erie on the third Monday in July and the second Monday in January."

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The bill was ordered to a third reading, and was accordingly read the third time and passed.

On motion of Mr. OLMSTED, a motion to reconsider the last vote was laid on the table.

ROBERT ROSS.

Clause 3 of Rule XIII provides that on days—and, Mr. Speaker, as the Chair ruled this morning, that means all days—when it shall be in order to suspend the rules the Speaker shall immediately, and so forth, direct the Calendar for Unanimous Consent to be called. I raised this same question of order this morning and the Chair then ruled that these motions to suspend the rules, with a single exception——

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will call the Unanimous Consent Calendar.

Mr. RAKER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD.

Mr. HARDWICK. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. HARDWICK. Mr. Speaker, does a bill that has been passed by the Senate over the veto of the President occupy a privileged status on the calendar?

The SPEAKER. It occupies just the same privileged status that these other matters do, in the discretion of the Chair. It is privileged, of course, under the Constitution.

The Clerk will report the next bill.

The SPEAKER. On this roll call 226 Members, a quorum, responded to their names.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Speaker, I move to suspend further proceedings under the call.

The motion was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will open the doors——

Mr. HENRY of Texas. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House do now adjourn.

The question was taken and the Speaker announced the noes have it——

Mr. HENRY of Texas. Division, Mr. Speaker.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 41, noes 85.

Mr. HENRY of Texas. Yeas and nays, Mr. Speaker.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Texas demands the yeas and nays. Those in favor of ordering the yeas and nays will rise and stand until they are counted. [After counting.] Twenty-one gentlemen have arisen; not a sufficient number.

Mr. HENRY of Texas and Mr. HARDWICK. The other side, Mr. Speaker.

The SPEAKER. Those opposed will rise. [After counting.] Ninety-nine gentlemen in the negative. Twenty-one is not a sufficient number, and the yeas and nays are refused.

Mr. BURKE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of order that there is only one matter in order, and that is the consideration of the President's veto message.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman makes what point of order?

Mr. BURKE of Pennsylvania. I make the point of order that there is no business in order now except a consideration of the message of the President of the United States concerning the Webb-Kenyon bill to the Senate and the House.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Speaker, I think the matters in order are those called up from the Unanimous Consent Calendar now before the House, and until the message is brought before the House, why, it is not in order. I understand it is optional with the Speaker, of course, to recognize what order of business shall come before the House, but I understand that the gentleman in charge of this bill does not desire to bring it before the House until to-morrow morning, so the gentleman informs me, and if that is the case, why, I think it is optional with the Speaker not to recognize anyone else to call it up from the Speaker's table except when the gentleman in charge of the bill originally in the House is prepared to bring it before the House. I will say I do not desire to force that bill before the House to-night without notice to everyone to have an opportunity to be here, and I shall move to adjourn if the Speaker holds that it is in order to take it from the Speaker's table; but if not, I hope the House will proceed with business. The point I make is the question of whether it can be called from the Speaker's table or not is a question of recognition by the Speaker to exercise within reasonable limits, and I say to the Speaker it is the purpose of those who are in favor of passing the bill over the President's veto, as they inform me, to call up the bill to-morrow at half past 10 o'clock, and if the Speaker holds that the gentleman's position is in order, of course I shall move that the House adjourn.

Mr. HENRY of Texas. Will the gentleman yield for a question? The gentleman says it is the purpose of those friendly to the legislation to call it up at half past 10 o'clock. I desire to say that I am friendly to the legislation and hoped to take it up at once.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Not every Member of the House, of course, but I meant those in favor of the legislation who were in charge of it.

Mr. HENRY of Texas. I have been regarding myself in favor of the legislation, and I know nothing about any such agreement.

Mr. CLAYTON. Mr. Speaker, may I interrupt my colleague? My colleague has correctly stated the case. I told him and have told a number of other gentlemen that it was my purpose, as chairman of the committee that reported this bill and having had the management of the bill when it was acted on in the House before it was returned to the Senate, on the assembling of the House to-morrow morning at 10.30 o'clock to move to pass this Webb liquor bill over the President's veto, and that was the understanding of a great many gentlemen, and I believe on that account they have gone away from the House to-night with the expectation of being here to-morrow to vote on that matter when it was laid before the House.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, Rule XXIV provides the order of business in the House, and that the order of business shall be as follows: First, prayer by the Chaplain; second, reading and approval of the Journal; third, correction of reference of public bills; fourth, disposal of business on the Speaker's table; fifth, unfinished business, and so forth. As I understand, this bill is now on the Speaker's table to be laid before the House under the Order of Business No. 4—disposal of business on the Speaker's table. If I understand the matter correctly, the House has proceeded beyond that order of business. This morning the Speaker recognized the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. SMALL] to proceed with the unfinished business, which was a motion made by him on a prior day to suspend the rules and pass the bill which he had up this morning.

And I think we have proceeded beyond No. 4 on the calendar—the disposal of business on the Speaker's table—so it is not within the power of a Member of the House to call a matter off the Speaker's table until he lays it before House.

Mr. HARDWICK. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MANN. I will.

Mr. HARDWICK. Since the instance to which the gentleman refers—the matter of the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. SMALL]—have we not taken many matters from the Speaker's table?

Mr. MANN. Oh, yes; it is a very common practice in the House.

Mr. HARDWICK. That is all we are trying to do now.

Mr. MANN. You take business off the Speaker's table at any time, but when the gentleman invokes a technical ruling on one side he is subject to the application of a technical ruling on the other side. He, having invoked the proposition that he has a right to call the matter from the Speaker's table, I call attention to a rule which provides the time when the matter can be taken from the Speaker's table; that is, only under the Order of Business No. 4, except the suspension of rules and by unanimous consent.

Mr. HARDWICK. Suppose this were the last day of the session and there was no possibility that we could get back to this order; then would the rule of the House supersede the Constitution of the United States?

Mr. MANN. I doubt whether it would on the last day.

Mr. BURKE of Pennsylvania. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] is correct, so far as he goes, but he misinterprets the purport of the motion of "the gentleman from Pennsylvania." I am not calling this message from the Speaker's table. I am not exercising my right as a Member. My belief is that it is the duty of the Speaker immediately, under the Constitution, to lay that message before this House for action, not necessarily that we shall take a vote on it to-night, but that we shall at least "proceed to consider it" by taking some action with reference to it. I am perfectly agreeable to the proposition that we shall vote on it some time to-morrow, or the day after, if the House wishes.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will decide that proposition without any argument. It is not the business of the Speaker to do anything of the sort. [Applause.]

Mr. HARDWICK. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

Mr. BURKE of Pennsylvania. A case similar to this, precisely in point, arose in this House twice before. On July 8, 1856, one of the Representatives from New York, as a question of privilege, asked the House to proceed to the reconsideration of Senate bill No. 1.

The SPEAKER. I know, but that is not such a case as the gentleman stated. The gentleman said it was the duty of the Speaker to do it.

Mr. BURKE of Pennsylvania. I still believe, Mr. Speaker, that as the Constitution provides a method for the disposal of a President's message, that the Speaker temporarily being the custodian of that document, it is his duty to do that which the Constitution says must be done by the House. The Speaker is only the agent of the House for the time being, and as the custodian of that document he must put it before the House, because otherwise the Speaker could thwart the will of this House by refusing to lay it before the House for consideration.

The SPEAKER. He could not do anything of the sort. There is a great deal of difference in its being privileged and the Speaker laying it before the House of his own motion.

Mr. BURKE of Pennsylvania. I call it up in my own right as a Member, then, and I say in that connection that I have no desire to force a vote on it to-night. I am perfectly willing to have the matter disposed of——

The SPEAKER. What is the gentleman trying to do, then?

Mr. BURKE of Pennsylvania. To have the message placed before the House and to "proceed to dispose of it" in some manner, either by fixing the time in the future on which a vote shall be taken, or to vote on it now.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will take the liberty of making a very short statement. There has been a tentative agreement as to the time when this veto message shall be taken up. Gentlemen came to the Speaker and reported that it had been agreed they would take it up in the morning at 10.30 o'clock, and divers Members came to the Chair and asked him about it, and he gave them that information. Of course, that does not affect this question of privilege at all, but it affects the question of a fair deal.

Mr. MANN. A parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. MANN. If this matter should be laid before the House in any way at the present time, would it be in order to raise the question of consideration?

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks not.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I will state if the Speaker holds it is in order to call this message from the table, I shall move that the House do adjourn.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will be compelled to overrule the point of order.

ADJOURNMENT.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I make the motion that the House do now adjourn.

Mr. GARDNER of Massachusetts. It is in order to postpone to a fixed time the consideration of a bill. I merely make that suggestion.

Mr. DYER. A point of order, Mr. Speaker. A motion to adjourn is not debatable.

The SPEAKER. Nobody is trying to debate it.

Mr. DYER. The gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. GARDNER] is.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD] moves that the House adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; accordingly (at 7 o'clock and 6 minutes p. m.) the House adjourned until to-morrow, Saturday, March 1, 1913, at 10.30 o'clock a. m.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATIONS.

Under clause 2 of Rule XXIV, executive communications were taken from the Speaker's table and referred as follows:

SENATE.

SATURDAY, March 1, 1913.

The Senate met at 10 o'clock a. m.

The Chaplain, Rev. Ulysses G. B. Pierce, D. D., offered the following prayer:

Almighty God, our heavenly Father, we thank Thee for the gracious Providence which brings us to this day of solemn and reverent memory. As we recall the life and public service of him whom we this day commemorate, we pray Thee to inspire our minds and to give utterance to our lips that we may fitly honor the life which Thou hast called to Thy nearer presence and to Thy higher service.

We pray Thee, our Father, to comfort those that mourn. Uphold them by Thy heavenly grace and grant that neither the height of remembered joys nor the depth of sorrows that can not be forgotten, nor the present with its burdens nor the future with its loneliness may be able to separate them from the love of God which is in Christ Jesus our Lord.

In the name of Him who abolished death and brought life and immortality to light, hear Thou our prayer. Amen.

Mr. GALLINGER took the chair as President pro tempore under the previous order of the Senate.

The Secretary proceeded to read the Journal of yesterday's proceedings, when, on request of Mr. SMOOT and my unanimous consent, the further reading was dispensed with and the Journal was approved.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

Mr. CULLOM presented a petition of Bohemian-American Camp, No. 30, United Spanish War Veterans, of Chicago, Ill., praying for the enactment of legislation granting pensions to widows and orphans of soldiers of the Spanish-American War, which was referred to the Committee on Pensions.

He also presented a petition of the Tri-City Central Trades Council, of Granite City, Ill., praying for the enactment of legislation providing for the construction of one of the proposed new battleships in a Government navy yard, which was ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. POINDEXTER presented a memorial of sundry citizens of College Place, Dunlap, Spokane, and Snohomish, all in the State of Washington, remonstrating against the enactment of legislation compelling the observance of Sunday as a day of rest in the District of Columbia, which was ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. JONES presented sundry telegrams in the nature of petitions from the Marine Firemen, Oilers, and Water Tenders' Union of the Pacific; the Masters, Mates, and Pilots' Association; the Marine Engineers' Association; and from L. Norkgauer, all of Seattle, in the State of Washington, praying for the enactment of legislation to better the condition of American seamen, which were ordered to lie on the table.

THE DISTRICT GOVERNMENT (S. DOC. NO. 1126).

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I present the memorial of W. O. Owen and other citizens of the District of Columbia, praying for the appointment of a joint committee of the Senate and House of Representatives to consider and report to Congress upon the existing form of government in the District with a view to perfecting its municipal government and making it a model for all the self-governing cities of the United States. I ask that the memorial be printed as a document.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, it is so ordered.

BATTLE MONUMENTS AT BULL RUN, VA.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. For the Senator from Delaware [Mr. DU PONT] I bring before the Senate from the Committee on Military Affairs the bill (S. 1142) to protect the monuments already erected on the battle fields of Bull Run, Va., and other monuments that may be there erected. It is reported with an amendment in the nature of a substitute. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill, and I wish to put in the RECORD a letter and paper in relation to it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be read for the information of the Senate.

The SECRETARY. The Committee on Military Affairs report to strike out all after the enacting clause and insert:

That the Secretary of War is hereby directed to inquire into the practicability of purchasing the land upon which the aforesaid monuments stand, the advisability of making the purchase thereof, and the price which will have to be paid therefor.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

There being no objection, the bill was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I will state for the information of the Senate and the RECORD that the bill was introduced in the Senate nearly two years ago by the Senator from Virginia [Mr. SWANSON]. It is a duplicate of House bill 1330, introduced in the House by Mr. CARLIN and reported favorably by the House Committee on Military Affairs. The Senate committee amendment corresponds exactly with the report of the House committee. I polled the members of the Senate Committee on Military Affairs and obtained the signatures of all but two members of the committee who were absent.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the committee.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended and the amendment concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair would suggest striking out the preamble.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. A parliamentary inquiry, Mr. President. Would that at all affect the substitution of this provision for the House bill, if it should get consideration in the House at the present session?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It might possibly interfere with it.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I prefer that the preamble should remain.

The preamble was agreed to.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I ask the privilege of inserting in the RECORD the House report on the bill and a letter from the commander in chief of the Grand Army of the Republic.

There being no objection, the matter was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

PROTECTION OF MONUMENTS ON BATTLE FIELDS OF BULL RUN, VA.

Mr. HAY, from the Committee on Military Affairs, submitted the following report, to accompany H. R. 1330:

The Committee on Military Affairs, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 1330) to protect the monuments already erected on the battle fields of Bull Run, Va., and other monuments that may be there erected, having considered the same, report thereon with a recommendation that it do pass with the following amendment:

Strike out all of the bill after the enacting clause, and insert the following:

"That the Secretary of War is hereby directed to inquire into the practicability of purchasing the land upon which the aforesaid monuments stand, the advisability of making the purchase thereof, and the price which will have to be paid therefor."

Your committee, after extensive hearings on this bill, was not satisfied as to the price asked for the land; and while it is thought that some steps should be taken to protect the monuments which have been erected thereon, yet it is deemed advisable that full information should be had before any appropriation is made for the purpose of acquiring the property.

EBBITT HOUSE,
Washington, D. C., February 26, 1913.

Hon. FRANK BRANDEGEE,
United States Senate.

DEAR SIR: The Grand Army of the Republic much desire the passage of House bill No. 1330, relating to purchase of land at Bull Run, on which a Union monument now stands, and adjacent land, being part of the battle field.

This bill has been favorably reported to the House. I understand Senator SWANSON favors its passage. It does not carry an appropriation.

Gen. Whitaker (Gen. Whitaker is acting as chairman of the Grand Army of the Republic committee appointed by the national encampment), late of First Connecticut Cavalry, and Lieut. Round, late of First Connecticut Heavy Artillery, are interested in the matter. I trust you will give your help to the project, and help to have it passed this session.

Very truly, yours,

ALFRED B. BEERS,
Commander in Chief G. A. R.

WOMAN'S SUFFRAGE PROCESSION.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. I introduce a joint resolution, for which I ask immediate consideration. It is a matter that is important in character.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The joint resolution will be read.

The joint resolution (S. J. Res. 164) stopping traffic and preventing interference with the suffrage procession was read the first time by its title and the second time at length, as follows:

Resolved, etc., That the superintendent of police of the District of Columbia be, and he is hereby, directed to stop all the ordinary traffic and travel, including the operation of street railroads, along Pennsylvania Avenue from the Peace Monument to Seventeenth Street, between the hours of 3 and 5 p. m., on Monday, the 3d day of March, 1913, and to prevent any interference with the suffrage procession on that date.

Mr. OVERMAN. I ask that the joint resolution may be again read.

The Secretary again read the joint resolution.

Mr. OVERMAN. I suggest an amendment providing that the joint resolution also include the 4th day of March.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. The 4th of March has been provided for.

Mr. SMOOT. Yes; that has been provided for.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. This joint resolution is simply to cover the one day.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the joint resolution.

The joint resolution was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

THE ROCKEFELLER FOUNDATION.

Mr. LEA submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by him to the bill (H. R. 21532) to incorporate the Rockefeller Foundation, which was ordered to lie on the table and be printed.

STATISTICS OF COMMERCIAL FERTILIZERS.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina submitted the following resolution (S. Res. 487), which was read, considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Secretary of Commerce and Labor, through the Bureau of Corporations, be, and is hereby, directed to investigate the causes of the advance in price of ammoniates and nitrates used in the manufacture of commercial fertilizers, and report the findings to the Senate at the earliest practicable time.

COMMITTEES OF THE SENATE.

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia submitted the following resolution (S. Res. 488), which was read, considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the standing and select committees of the Senate as constituted at the end of this session be, and they are hereby, continued until further order of the Senate.

OKANOGAN RIVER BRIDGE IN WASHINGTON.

Mr. JONES. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (S. 8575) to authorize the town of Okanogan, Wash., to construct and maintain a footbridge across the Okanogan River. I will say that a similar bill has been reported favorably by the House committee, and I think I can get this bill through that body if we will pass it here with the amendments which I shall suggest.

Mr. SMOOT. Is this a House bill?

Mr. JONES. No, this is a Senate bill; but, I repeat, a similar bill has been reported in the other House, and if we pass this bill I think we can get it through the House.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill.

Mr. JONES. I offer the amendments which I send to the desk.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendments will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 1, line 5, after the words "operate a," it is proposed to strike out "footbridge" and to insert "bridge"; in line 7, after the word "River," to insert "at a point suitable to the interests of navigation"; in line 9, after the word "Reservation," to strike out the period; in line 10, to strike out "SEC. 2. That the" and to insert "said"; and in the same line, after the word "bridge," to strike out "authorized by this act"; so as to make the bill read:

Be it enacted, etc., That the town of Okanogan, a municipal corporation of the State of Washington, its successors and assigns, be, and is hereby, authorized to construct, maintain, and operate a bridge, with approaches thereto, across the Okanogan River, at a point suitable to the interests of navigation, from the lower or easterly end of Pine Street, in said town, to a point directly opposite on the Colville Indian Reservation, said bridge shall be constructed in accordance with the provisions of the act entitled "An act to regulate the construction of bridges over navigable waters," approved March 23, 1906.

SEC. 2. That the right to alter, amend, or repeal this act is hereby expressly reserved.

The amendments were agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments were concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

The title was amended so as to read: "A bill to authorize the town of Okanogan, Wash., to construct and maintain a bridge across the Okanogan River."

WILLIAM H. SEWARD.

Mr. LEA. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (H. R. 8921) for the relief of William H.

Seward. The bill has passed the other House and is for the relief of a very old soldier. Unless he gets the relief at this Congress, it is doubtful if he will live long enough to get any benefit from the passage of the bill. The bill is unanimously reported from the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. SMOOT. I am not going to object to this bill, but I shall object to the consideration of any other bill until after the conference report on the river and harbor bill shall be taken up and proceeded with.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill. It proposes that in the administration of the pension laws William H. Seward, who was a second lieutenant of Company I, Second Regiment Michigan Infantry Volunteers, shall hereafter be held and considered to have been honorably discharged from the military service of the United States as a member of that company and regiment on the 30th day of August, 1862, but no pension, bounty, or allowances shall accrue prior to the passage of this act.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

PNEUMATIC-TUBE COMMISSION.

Mr. GUGGENHEIM. Mr. President, I have announced to the Senator from Oregon [Mr. BOURNE], the chairman of the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads, my resignation as chairman and member of the Joint Commission on Government Purchase of Pneumatic Tubes, the resignation to take effect to-day.

EMBEZZLEMENT OF EVIDENCE OF DEBT.

Mr. GALLINGER (Mr. BRANDEGEE in the chair). When the calendar was considered a couple of days ago one District of Columbia bill, which will not give rise to any discussion, was inadvertently omitted. It is the bill (H. R. 21714) to amend subchapter 2 of chapter 19 of the Code of Law of the District of Columbia. It was prepared and introduced at the request of the United States attorney for the District of Columbia to cure a defect in the District laws. I ask for its present consideration.

There being no objection, the bill was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

RIVER AND HARBOR BILL.

Mr. NELSON. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the conference report on House bill 28180—the river and harbor bill.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate proceeded to consider the report of the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 28180) making appropriations for the construction, repair, and preservation of certain public works on rivers and harbors, and for other purposes.

Mr. NEWLANDS. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Nevada suggests the absence of a quorum. The roll will be called.

The Secretary called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Bankhead	Fall	Newlands	Simmons
Bourne	Gallinger	Oliver	Smith, Ariz.
Bristow	Gardner	Overman	Smith, Ga.
Bryan	Gronna	Owen	Smith, S. C.
Burton	Johnston, Ala.	Page	Smoot
Catron	Jones	Percy	Sutherland
Chamberlain	Lodge	Perkins	Webb
Clapp	McCumber	Pittman	Wetmore
Crawford	Martin, Va.	Pomerene	Works
Culberson	Martine, N. J.	Root
Cullom	Nelson	Sheppard

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Forty-two Senators have answered to their names—not a quorum. The roll of absentees will be called.

The Secretary called the names of the absent Senators, and Mr. KAVANAUGH and Mr. SMITH of Maryland answered to their names when called.

Mr. LEA, Mr. BRANDEGEE, Mr. POINDEXTER, Mr. ASHURST, and Mr. THORNTON entered the Chamber and answered to their names.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Forty-nine Senators have answered to their names. A quorum of the Senate is present. The question is on agreeing to the conference report on the river and harbor bill.

Mr. NELSON. Mr. President, before the question is put on agreeing to the report, I desire briefly to make an explanation of what the conference committee has done.

When it was sought to put the river and harbor bill into conference in the House of Representatives this transpired—I read from the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD as to the proceedings there:

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I realize that at this time in the session, if a river and harbor bill is to be enacted at all, it will need to be sent to conference at an early hour. There are a number of Senate amendments to this bill which I think the House ought to have an opportunity to vote upon before they are agreed to. There is amendment No. 11, carrying what is called the Connecticut River Dam; amendment No. 64, carrying a provision for the erection of a dam by the Municipal Electric Light Co., of Minnesota; amendment No. 77, providing a report relating to the contract system; amendment No. 78, providing for the appointment of a river regulation commission; amendment No. 126, providing for the renting of Government dredges to private parties; amendment No. 133, authorizing the Secretary of Commerce and Labor to define and establish anchorage grounds throughout the United States. These amendments are of great importance. The first one, No. 11, intending to establish practically the policy of the United States or of Congress in regard to the construction of dams for power purposes by themselves, in the main, has no relation to a river and harbor bill. They are not river and harbor items. May I ask my distinguished friend from Florida if he is willing to say to the House that these amendments will not be agreed to by the House conferees in conference without the House hereafter having an opportunity to express its opinion upon each of them?

Mr. SPARKMAN. I can say in answer to that, most emphatically, yes. Personally I am opposed to each one of the items to which the gentleman has referred being in this bill, whatever their individual merits may be, and I certainly should not agree to any of those amendments without referring them back to the House and taking the sense and the instructions of the House upon them.

Further on, this transpired in reference to another amendment:

Mr. GARDNER of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of order that the House is in such disorder that we can not hear the gentleman.

The SPEAKER. The House will be in order.

Mr. SPARKMAN. I say in reference to the question propounded by the gentleman from Illinois as to whether the House would have an opportunity to vote upon the items to which he refers before a final agreement is reached by the conference committee unless they are eliminated in conference. Whatever their individual merits, I do not believe they should appear in this bill.

Mr. MANN. With that statement, so far as I am concerned, I am quite content, and if anyone else desires time in opposition to the motion I am perfectly willing to yield it.

Mr. GALLAGHER. Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask the gentleman from Illinois a question. I want to ask him if he will not include amendment 57 in that request? If he does not, I wish to try to include it.

Mr. MANN. The gentleman can make the request himself. I have not read amendment No. 57.

Mr. GALLAGHER. I ask that amendment No. 57 be included in that request.

Mr. SPARKMAN. I can make the same answer in reference to that item. Of course, I understand that while some Members here may favor the item, there are others who object to it, and though I might favor it I should not in view of the known hostility to record it here concur without resubmitting the question to this House and obtaining the instructions of the House in the premises.

From this it appears, Mr. President, that the House of Representatives itself when it agreed to send the bill to conference quarantined, as it were, seven different amendments, and said in effect to the conference, "These amendments you must not agree to; and, if insisted upon by the Senate, you must bring the matter back to the House." These amendments are No. 11, relating to the Connecticut River dam; No. 57, relating to the Grand Calumet River in Indiana; No. 64, the provision relating to surplus water power of the dam located between the cities of Minneapolis and St. Paul—the Twin Cities—in which the State University of Minnesota is deeply interested; No. 77, requiring a report by the Secretary of War as to the advisability of continuing the contract system; No. 78, relating to the creation of a river-regulation commission; No. 126, relating to the renting of Government dredges to private parties; and No. 133, relative to the establishment of anchorage grounds in harbors and bays of the United States.

We were advised by the House conferees that if they were compelled to go back to the House with the river and harbor bill upon those amendments, it would lead to the defeat of the bill, that prolonged debate would be occasioned in the other House on those amendments, and that it would be doubtful whether the bill could be brought to a vote at this session. So the river and harbor bill would in all human probability have utterly failed. In view of this situation, in order to secure the passage of the river and harbor bill—a bill in its main features as equitable and as just as any river and harbor bill I have known in recent years—and in order that this beneficent legislation might not entirely fail, the Senate conferees thought it advisable to recede on the seven amendments referred to, and we accordingly did so.

Mr. President, we were advised as to some of these amendments that it would be utterly impossible under any circumstances to get the House to agree to them. As I have read from the RECORD, there was great objection to the Connecticut River dam item, because it involved the establishment of a policy in reference to water powers or dams built by private capital, a matter over which there has been a great controversy pending in the House for two or more years.

In reference to amendment No. 77, incorporated on the river and harbor bill at the instance of the very able Senator from Nevada [Mr. NEWLANDS], I desire to say that that same amendment was in the river and harbor bill a year ago, and the House conferees, not then restrained by the action of the House, as they were this year, utterly refused to agree to that amendment. That is one of the amendments quarantined.

Amendment No. 78 is an amendment that was introduced on the floor, also on motion of the Senator from Nevada, of far-reaching character relating to conservation, river regulation, and so forth. Senators are familiar with it.

Senators, I am sure, can not say that I have acted at all selfishly in this matter. One of the most important of the Senate amendments was the one relating to the dam between Minneapolis and St. Paul. I think, as a matter of fact, the House conferees individually were not opposed to that amendment, but it being quarantined as were the other amendments, it had to go into the same class, and, so far as I was concerned, I did not feel that it was just and proper for me to act like the dog in the manger, and because I could not secure the adoption of my amendment have the river and harbor bill fail. Therefore, in that respect I have acted in reference to my own particular amendment concerning the State of Minnesota as I have in reference to the other six amendments.

As to the result of the conference, from a pecuniary standpoint, the bill as it passed the House contained in cash appropriations $37,112,958 and in continuing contracts $3,760,000, or a total of cash and contracts of $40,872,958. The Senate added to the bill by amendment $4,921,987 in cash and $3,235,800 in continuing contracts, or a total of $8,157,787, so that, as the bill finally passed the Senate and went into conference, it contained a total cash appropriation of $42,034,945 and $6,995,800 in continuing contracts, or an aggregate of $49,030,745.

I want to say that in respect to practically all the other amendments except the seven quarantined amendments, as I call them, the House receded, and in conference the bill was reduced in dollars to the extent of $1,161,851; but in that reduction there was included $500,000 provided for in the quarantined amendment of the Senator from Nevada, and therefore leaving that amendment, No. 78, out of consideration, the total reduction effected in conference on the Senate amendments was not over $600,000 outside of the half million that was included in the amendment of the Senator from Nevada.

To the Senate conferees the question was presented whether we would let the bill fail. I am satisfied if we had sent the bill back and had not reached this final agreement there would have been no river and harbor bill at this session. In view of that fact the Senate conferees with one accord felt that, under the circumstances, it was just and right, in order to save the bill, to recede from those seven quarantined amendments.

As I have said before, Senators will remember that I myself was as much interested in one of those amendments relating to my own State as any Senator could well be interested in any amendment, but, notwithstanding that, I have treated that amendment exactly as I have treated the other amendments.

Mr. President, I desire to say that it is important that our river and harbor work should go on. There is great necessity for the work to be continued in the Mississippi Valley, on the lower Mississippi from Cape Girardeau down to the Head of Passes; there are a great many other improvements, such as those on the Ohio River and in some of our great harbors, which it is important and necessary should proceed, but I think that, for the good of the country, it is necessary that this bill should pass. Unless it passes now, work will be delayed on a great many valuable improvements, especially those along the South Atlantic coast and on the Mississippi River.

Another thing: There has never been a river and harbor bill since I have been in the Senate, for a period covering 18 years, that could not in some respects, perhaps, be made the subject of criticism. Our country is great; we have harbors and rivers all over the country that need more or less improvement. Senators and Representatives come here and are zealous to have these improvements made in their respective districts and States. We listen to all of them and we do the best we can under the circumstances of each case. We must all admit that occasionally mistakes are made, but I think, on the whole, that this bill is as free from mistakes as almost any river and harbor bill which has been passed in recent years.

Up until about three years ago—I speak of the time during which I have been in the Senate—we were in the habit of having a river and harbor bill once in two or three years. Three years ago we started on the idea of having a moderate-sized annual bill. We have followed that policy for two years; this is the third annual bill; and I think those who are familiar with the subject and who have had experience under both systems will concur with me that, all other questions aside, an annual bill is much preferable and more economical.

There is another reason why an annual bill is proper, and that is, there are a great many instances where new improvements are desired, and before such improvements can be made either in rivers or in harbors, it is necessary that there should be a preliminary examination and survey.

If you have an annual bill, you can have that examination and survey ordered in one year, and if the survey demonstrates the necessity and value of the improvement you can have an appropriation for it the next year; while, under the old system, with two or three years intervening between the bills, it sometimes took four or five years before you could inaugurate a new improvement.

I do not know that I care to say anything further on this subject. I think my colleagues on the conference committee, who were with me and labored on this bill, will concur with me in all I have said.

Mr. NEWLANDS addressed the Senate. After having spoken for some time,

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Nevada will suspend. The hour of 12 o'clock having arrived, it is the duty of the Chair to lay before the Senate the unfinished business, which will be stated.

The SECRETARY. A bill (H. R. 23673) to abolish the involuntary servitude imposed upon seamen in the merchant marine of the United States while in foreign ports and the involuntary servitude imposed upon the seamen of the merchant marine of foreign countries while in ports of the United States, to prevent unskilled manning of American vessels, to encourage the training of boys in the American merchant marine, for the further protection of life at sea, and to amend the laws relative to seamen.

Mr. BURTON. I ask unanimous consent that the unfinished business be temporarily laid aside.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Ohio asks unanimous consent that the unfinished business be temporarily laid aside. Is there objection? The Chair hears none. The Senator from Nevada will proceed.

Mr. NEWLANDS resumed and concluded his speech, which is as follows:

Mr. President, I am very thankful to the Senator from Minnesota for relieving me of the duty of reading from the House proceedings the remarks of various prominent Members of the House at the time the conference was agreed upon.

In the House one of the leading Members, referring to six or seven prominent items in the river and harbor bill, asked the assurance of the chairman of the committee, Mr. SPARKMAN of Florida, that as to those amendments no action would be taken by the conferees without submitting the matter to the vote of the House. Among the amendments referred to were two amendments offered by myself—amendments 77 and 78, the former of which was inserted by the Senate in the river and harbor bill last year and went out upon the insistence of the House conferees, while the other was unanimously put upon this bill by the Senate after a protracted discussion and is now, with five or six other amendments, quarantined—to use the expression of the Senator from Minnesota—by the action of the House.

The term "quarantined" would imply that there is something noxious in these amendments; that they contain the germ of some loathsome disease, prejudicial to the interests of the United States. My contention is that these amendments are not noxious, not destructive, but are beneficial and constructive; that they have their proper place in the river and harbor bill, and that they should be considered by both Houses. They have received consideration in the Senate. They have not received consideration in the House. All I now contend for is that the report should be disagreed to, not with a view to defeating the bill, but with a view to giving the House the opportunity which it desires of considering these amendments without their being quarantined on their way to full consideration by three conferees, the servants of the House.

I insist that the House has the right to debate, consider, and vote upon these amendments; that the action of the House indicates that that was their desire, and that that desire has been thwarted by the action of the servants of the House.

What are these amendments, Mr. President? I shall ask to have them both inserted in the RECORD here, with the consent of the Senate, and if there is no objection will content myself with a short statement of their nature.

The Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. OWEN] tells me, however, that he desires to have them read; so I shall ask the Secretary to read amendments 77 and 78, being sections 2 and 3 of the river and harbor bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, the Secretary will read as requested.

The Secretary read as follows:

Amendment numbered 77, being section 2 of the bill:

"That the Secretary of War shall cause the Chief of Engineers of the Army and the Board of Engineers for Rivers and Harbors to report to Congress, in which shall be included a preliminary report, not later than December 1, 1913, upon the saving, as well as other advantages, which can be accomplished by the adoption of the continuing-contract system, the rapidity with which projects should be completed, upon methods of standardization by which the waterways of the country may be improved uniformly in proportion to their capacities and to the existing or probable demands of general commerce, and also report upon one or more systematized schemes of such improvement, involving all waterways heretofore examined, together with any natural or artificial channels essential for the utilization thereof, whether heretofore examined or not; also upon all projects heretofore adopted the further improvement of which is not desirable or the expenditure upon which is out of proportion to the benefit derived therefrom. Such report may include other related information pertaining to the uses or control of the waters of the country, and the sum of $100,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary, is hereby appropriated for such examination and report."

Amendment numbered 78, being section 3 of the bill:

"A commission, to be known as the River Regulation Commission, consisting of the Secretary of War, the Secretary of the Interior, the Secretary of Agriculture, the Secretary of Commerce and Labor, two Members of the Senate, to be selected by the President of the Senate, and two Members of the House of Representatives, to be selected by the Speaker, is hereby created and authorized to bring into coordination and cooperation with the Corps of Engineers of the Army the other scientific or constructive services of the United States that relate to the study, development, and control of waterways and water resources and subjects related thereto, and to the development and regulation of interstate and foreign commerce, with a view to uniting such services through a board or boards in investigating questions relating to the development, improvement, regulation, and control of navigation as a part of interstate and foreign commerce, including therein the related questions of irrigation, forestry, swamp-land reclamation, clarification of streams, regulation of flow, control of floods, utilization of water power, prevention of soil waste, cooperation of railways and waterways, and promotion of transfer facilities and sites, and in forming comprehensive plans for the development of the waterways and water resources of the country for every useful purpose by cooperation between the United States and the several States, municipalities, communities, corporations, and individuals within the jurisdiction, powers, and rights of each, respectively, and with a view to assigning to the United States such portion of such development, promotion, regulation, and control as can be properly undertaken by the United States by virtue of its power to regulate interstate and foreign commerce and by reason of its proprietary interest in the public domain, and to the States, municipalities, communities, corporations, and individuals such portion as properly belongs to their jurisdiction, rights, and interests, and with a view to properly apportioning costs and benefits, and with a view to so uniting the plans and works of the United States within its jurisdiction, and of the States and municipalities, respectively, within their jurisdictions, and of corporations, communities, and individuals within their respective powers and rights, as to secure the highest development and utilization of the waterways and water resources of the United States; and such River Regulation Commission is authorized to appoint as members of such board or boards such engineers, transportation experts, experts in water development, and constructors of eminence as it may deem advisable to employ in connection with such plans. And for the expenses of such organization, investigation, and plans the sum of $500,000 is hereby appropriated."

Mr. OWEN. Mr. President, before the Senator from Nevada explains this matter I think we ought to have the Senate present. It will take only a few moments to get them here, and I think they ought to listen to this. I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Oklahoma suggests the absence of a quorum. The Secretary will call the roll.

The Secretary called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Ashurst	Culberson	Nelson	Smith, Ariz.
Bankhead	Cullom	Newlands	Smith, Ga.
Bourne	Cummins	O'Gorman	Smith, Md.
Brady	Fall	Oliver	Smith, Mich.
Brandegee	Foster	Overman	Smith, S. C.
Bristow	Gallinger	Owen	Smoot
Brown	Gardner	Page	Stone
Bryan	Jones	Percy	Sutherland
Burton	Kenyon	Perkins	Swanson
Catron	La Follette	Pittman	Thomas
Chamberlain	Lea	Poindexter	Thornton
Crane	McCumber	Pomerene	Tillman
Crawford	Martin	Sheppard	Townsend

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. On the call of the roll 52 Senators have answered to their names. A quorum of the Senate is present. The Senator from Nevada is recognized.

Mr. NEWLANDS. Mr. President, the reading of these amendments to the river and harbor bill must convince every listener of their national and beneficial character. Amendment 77 simply calls for a report from the Secretary of War regarding the saving and other advantages of the continuing contract system, regarding the rapidity with which projects can be completed, regarding methods of standardization by which the waterways of the country may be improved uniformly in proportion to their capacities to the existing or probable demands of general commerce. It also calls for a report as to one or more systematized schemes of improvement, and also for other matters of related information pertaining to the uses or control of the waters of the country, and makes an appropriation of $100,000.

Now, can the Senator from Minnesota give me any reason why such an amendment should be quarantined? Does that amendment contain the germs of a loathsome disease prejudicial to the interests of the country? I would ask a reply from the Senator from Minnesota. The Senator does not answer, and I assume therefore that he has nothing to say against the amendment. On the contrary, he believes in the amendment.

Mr. NELSON. Mr. President——

Mr. NEWLANDS. The Senator supported the amendment in the committee and on the floor.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Nevada yield to the Senator from Minnesota?

Mr. NEWLANDS. Certainly.

Mr. NELSON. I do not care about answering the Senator more than to say that he is mistaken about my views. I never believed in the amendment that he introduced. It was subject to a point of order when it was before the Senate, but I felt like a good many other Senators, that having had six hours' debate in favor of the amendment probably the easiest way was to let it go on the bill. But I never believed in it.

Mr. NEWLANDS. Does the Senator mean to say that he is opposed to the principle of the amendment or opposed to it simply on the ground that it is not in order? I ask the Senator whether he means that he is opposed to the principle of the amendment or if he is simply opposed to it on the ground that it is not in order?

Mr. NELSON. I have been unable to discover the real principle of that amendment as yet, and therefore I am not prepared to answer.

Mr. NEWLANDS. I regard that as the misfortune of the Senator. I trust that he will soon be able to come to a favorable conclusion regarding it.

But, Mr. President, this section simply calls for information regarding a matter that has been under discussion for many years, regarding a matter concerning which the parties have been declaring themselves for the last eight years, as to a system of developing our rivers by cooperation with the States and other interested parties in such a way as to develop every use of our rivers in addition to navigation, and in such a way as to vastly advance the prosperity and the wealth of the country.

Yet this amendment, which simply calls for information, is quarantined, according to the statement of the Senator from Minnesota, by the conferees of the House. That action is in line with the action of the Rivers and Harbors Committee of the House for over 20 years. They have sought to hamstring the Corps of Engineers of the Army in their endeavor to perfect plans for a related system of waterways, apparently content that large sums of public moneys should be spent upon the waterways, provided navigation, which constitutes the only constitutional basis of our action, is not promoted thereby.

I have alluded heretofore to the sinister influences, of which Congress itself may be unconscious, tending to a control of the action of the country with reference to waterways in such a way as to bring about large expenditures in different localities to the interests of those localities without endangering in any way the monopoly now enjoyed by the railway systems of the country. The railways have been content that we should be liberal in our appropriations and even wasteful in our appropriations. They have not stood on guard in the interests of economy. Every expenditure made, provided it did not promote navigation, furnished them custom in the way of passengers and freight. They were only solicitous that we should not have a continuous and related system of waterways, perfect in all their equipments, just as railways are, with transfer facilities, terminal facilities, freight houses, warehouses, and all the paraphernalia that belong to transportation, including such conveniences as would bring ship and car, and boat and car, into absolute cooperation in the people's service.

True to the traditions of the Rivers and Harbors Committee of the House, we have the conferees of the House even refusing to permit a section in the bill which simply calls for information from the experts in the employ of the Government to be voted upon by the Members of the House itself. The plea may be made that we are in the closing hours of legislation, but we all know that the House has an expeditious way of bringing a debate to a conclusion. There will be no difficulty there, if a conference report is made submitting these two amendments to the Members of the House, in fixing a rule limiting the debate to two or three hours, and limiting the time of the speakers in such a way as that no delay will be accomplished, and yet free opportunity for discussion be given.

My purpose is not to defeat this bill. My purpose is to perfect this bill and to perfect it by consulting the House itself, to whom participation in debate upon this subject has thus far been denied by the quarantine which has been accomplished through the action of the House conferees.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Nevada yield to the Senator from Connecticut?

Mr. NEWLANDS. Certainly.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I wanted to ask the Senator if he had ever introduced this amendment in the form of a bill and had it presented to the committees of each House.

Mr. NEWLANDS. This particular amendment, may I say, was offered to the rivers and harbors bill last years in the Senate, and was passed by the Senate and stricken out in conference. It has never been, according to my recollection, the subject of a separate bill, but its substance was included in the general bill which I have been offering now for the last six or seven years entitled "A bill for river regulation." That bill has been before the Commerce Committee of the Senate for six or seven years in varying forms, and was offered in the House by Mr. BARTHOLDT, a Representative from Missouri, some years ago. There has been opportunity for consideration of these bills in both Houses.

Now, as to the Senate, let me say that in the Senate committee the bill has been considered at various times, but I have never been able to get it out of the committee in a satisfactory form. For some time it has been referred to a subcommittee of the Committee on Commerce, and recently while we were considering the rivers and harbors bill the committee took that bill out of the hands of the subcommittee and ordered a report of it to the Senate without recommendation. So that bill is on the calendar, but without recommendation. Then, later on, its substance was put upon this bill by the Senate in these amendments.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Inasmuch as the Senate has already passed the proposition in the form of an amendment, I wished to find out whether the Committee on Rivers and Harbors of the House, where the present impasse seems to exist, had ever considered the question, or whether the Senator had ever been before the committee and tried to get the Rivers and Harbors Committee of the House to adopt his proposition.

Mr. NEWLANDS. I do not know what progress has been made regarding my bill as introduced by Mr. BARTHOLDT in the House, and I am not familiar with it, but what I claim is that this is a legitimate part of a river and harbor bill. I think the Senator from Ohio [Mr. BURTON] will bear me out in that assertion. The river and harbor bill, and I ask the attention of the Senator from Ohio, has been the vehicle of just such legislation as this for years. The river and harbor bill has been regarded as a bill of general legislation relating to rivers and harbors. I appeal to the Senator from Ohio, whose long experience upon these matters we all recognize, whether that is not so.

Mr. BURTON. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Nevada yield to the Senator from Ohio?

Mr. NEWLANDS. Certainly.

Mr. BURTON. It is impossible to frame a river and harbor bill without certain administrative features. Otherwise the public works could not be properly managed; new projects would not be undertaken and finished in proper form. It is not merely an appropriation bill; it is a bill providing for the cost and management of improvements in rivers and harbors.

I wish to say further, Mr. President, that I very strongly approve these two amendments of the Senator from Nevada. The great difficulty in past years has been that in a measure the ostensible object of which is to improve rivers and harbors numerous projects relating to bank protection and prevention of floods have been brought forward under the guise of river and harbor improvement. I do not believe there is any solution of this great question of the control of waters except by a commission taking up all the related uses of water.

I have strongly opposed the bill of the Senator from Nevada, which would place this whole subject under the control of a commission and give them a certain amount of money to expend, authorizing them to select projects for improvement, but this provides for investigation only, with a view to bringing under the control of the different bureaus or departments of the Government the whole subject of the use of waters, including navigation, water-power regulation, the prevention of soil erosion, and other related subjects. We can not much longer bring in river and harbor bills without the information obtained by such an investigation as is provided in this measure. Otherwise, if we take them up and consider them superficially and ingraft various propositions relating to waters on a river and harbor bill we in that way make appropriations on subjects with which we are not in a position to deal.

Mr. NEWLANDS. I felt sure that the Senator, with his familiarity with the subject and with his long-held views, would indicate his indorsement of these two amendments. There has been a difference between the Senator and myself regarding another matter.

Mr. PERCY. As I understood the statement of the Senator from Ohio, it was that he indorses the first amendment, but strongly dissented from the second.

Mr. BURTON. No, Mr. President, I indorse both the first and second. The second amendment is a modified form of a bill which has been pending for a long while. That bill as originally framed provided that this commission should have a certain amount of money, $50,000,000 is proposed, and should expend it as they pleased. I am not ready to approve such a proposition. But amendment No. 78 does not go that far; it provides only for investigation, and investigation by the different departments and bureaus of the Government.

Mr. PERCY. The amendment No. 78 has never, so far as the personnel of the commission is concerned, been embodied in any bill on any amendment, I think, heretofore offered by the Senator from Nevada. As the Senator from Ohio has studied the personnel of the commission, does he prefer the personnel of the commission contained in the amendment as offered in this bill to that heretofore contained in the amendment offered by the Senator from Nevada? One provides for a commission of 8; the other, which is one that has been heretofore designated by the Senator from Nevada, provides for a commission of 12. No one of the commission of 8 is embraced in the commission of 12. In other words, the commission as contained in this amendment is one never heretofore offered nor heretofore discussed by the Senator from Nevada.

Mr. BURTON. I regard the question of the personnel of the commission as largely one of detail. I am inclined to think, however, the designation of the different Cabinet officers—the Secretaries of War, Interior, Agriculture, and Commerce and Labor—with two Members of the Senate and two Members of the House as an effective method, as good a selection as can be made. The fact that these Cabinet officers are named is significant; it means that we wish to have this work undertaken by those of very high authority.

Mr. NEWLANDS. Mr. President, there have been no differences between the Senator from Ohio and myself regarding the general policy which should be pursued with reference to these rivers. We were together on the Inland Waterways Commission, which made its report about six years ago, and we agreed in our views that there should be cooperation of the scientific services that relate to water; that there should be cooperation of the Nation with the States. We agreed regarding that report, and agreed that this work should be conducted in cooperation with the various scientific services, including the Engineer Corps of the Army, and in cooperation with the Nation and the States under a system involving a large fund and continuous work.

I differed with the Senator only in a supplemental statement which I made in the report of the Inland Waterways Commission, in which I insisted that we should provide specifically a large fund of at least $50,000,000 annually for 10 years, so that our engineers and constructors could plan their works with reference to a definite appropriation lasting over a long period of time and that they should be given a comparatively free hand, both in plans and works.

In shaping the pending amendment I have adapted myself to the limitations imposed by the judgment of the Senator from Ohio, as expressed in that report, and I expected nothing but his cordial indorsement of this amendment.

It is true that some of the bills which I have offered have proposed to create a commission out of the various chiefs of the services that relate to the use of water, with the Corps of Engineers at the head, but in this amendment I have sought to substitute for that commission of service chiefs a commission of department chiefs, including also two Senators and two Representatives. But, Mr. President, it will be perceived that the heads of departments whom I have enumerated are the superiors of the various service chiefs who were designated to serve in the former commission provided for in my bill. I thought it better that we should put the department chiefs in as the commission rather than these service chiefs, thus permitting the department chiefs to bring their service chiefs into coordination and cooperation.

I thought also that it was advisable to bring into active cooperation with these plans and investigations Members of the Senate and of the other House, who by their familiarity with all the proceedings would keep both the Senate and the House well informed regarding the progress of the work of the commission.

It will be observed that the amendment does something more than simply prepare for an investigation and plans. It actually accomplishes the coordination and cooperation of the services that relate to water, and thus takes an important step forward in the great policy of teamwork upon the part of the governmental agencies in this important constructive policy.

Mr. President, I have briefly outlined the first amendment; but we have drifted into a discussion of the second one contained in amendment No. 78. What does that provide? A commission consisting of four department chiefs, in whose departments exist all of the various services that relate in any way to the use of water or the development of water or the study of water—the Secretary of War, the Secretary of the Interior, the Secretary of Agriculture, and the Secretary of Commerce and Labor. Then there are added to the commission two Members of the Senate and two Members of the House of Representatives, to be selected by the President of the Senate and the Speaker of the House of Representatives, respectively.

The commission is authorized to bring into coordination and cooperation with the Engineer Corps of the Army the other scientific constructive services of the United States that relate to the study, control, and development of waterways, water resources, and subjects related thereto, and to the development and regulation of interstate and foreign commerce, with a view to uniting such services through a board or boards in investigating the questions relating to the improvement, development, regulation, and control of navigation as a part of interstate and foreign commerce, including therein all the related questions referred to in this amendment, and providing for plans that will involve the cooperation of the States, municipalities, and corporations with a proper adjustment of cost and benefit.

There is also a provision authorizing the commission to appoint and secure the assistance of engineers, transportation experts, experts in water development, and constructors of eminence in connection with such plans.

I ask what is there prejudicial to the interests of the United States in that amendment? Why should that amendment be quarantined as if it contained the germs of disease? Why should not that amendment go to the House for consideration in an orderly way as indicated in the action of the House itself? Why should it be quarantined by the servants of the House—the House conferees—as if they were fearful to trust the wisdom and judgment of the House itself?

I repeat, Mr. President, that I do not desire the defeat of this bill, although I regard the system under which this bill and other similar bills have been framed as an unwise and injudicious and unscientific system. All that I ask is that in this very bill we should consult the Engineer Corps of the Army and the scientific services of the Government through their consolidation and teamwork with reference to the development of waterways in the future with a view to making these unrelated projects not simply useful to existing communities, either in the way of the expenditure of money or in the way of benefiting private property, but for the purpose of making this great work useful to the Nation itself under the constitutional power granted to it by the States regarding the regulation of interstate commerce and navigation as a part of that interstate commerce. I wish to see this whole work founded impregnably upon the only basis upon which it can constitutionally stand; so that hereafter there can be no question concerning the legitimate exercise of our powers. I wish to see that work accomplished so liberally that every section of the country will derive benefit from it, and so liberally that, under the inspiration of the national policy, all the related uses of water under the jurisdiction of the various States will be developed in their highest degree.

This amendment presents nothing prejudicial to the interests of any section, though our friends who represent the lower Mississippi seem to think that it has in it the germ of evil to them. On the contrary, this policy will prove the salvation of the entire delta of the Mississippi, with its 25,000,000 acres, and it will found the vast works of the future upon such a constitutional basis that no one can object.

As it is, Mr. President, the States materially affected have entirely lost sight of that constitutional power under which alone the Nation can act, and the works in the lower Mississippi, commenced as a legitimate exercise of the interstate-commerce power, are now prosecuted without any regard to the exercise of that power and mainly for the protection and development of private property. I want to see that private property protected and developed; I want to see that vast domain reclaimed. I regret that it ever drifted out of the hands of the Nation, which, as the original proprietor, could have reclaimed it all, prepared it for settlement, and then turned it over under a gradual process of settlement to home seekers, and I will be glad to see the original error remedied, so far as the Nation can constitutionally remedy it; but it must be remembered that the Nation has now lost the power to reclaim that land as proprietor, and that it has no power to reclaim it as sovereign, unless the work which it prosecutes is done under the interstate-commerce power of the Constitution and presents a legitimate instance of the development of the Mississippi River for purposes of navigation. We can not pursue the sham system which we have hitherto pursued, looking out, by cooperation with the levee organizations of the South, for the protection of the lands without in any way developing navigation, facing all the time a diminishing navigation and permitting the one public servant, the railway carrier, to drive out of existence the water carrier, the other public servant. We must bring about, by a system of law and operations, not only the perfection of the waterways with all their incidents—wharves and terminals, stations, and transfer facilities for the conduct of transportation—just as a perfected railway is, but we must also bring one public servant, the water carrier, into cooperation with the other public servant, the rail carrier, through laws that will prevent the rail carrier from driving the waterway carrier, by disastrous competition, out of existence.

Unless we can promote navigation and transportation we have no constitutional basis for national action at all, and the purpose of my amendments and of my bills is to exercise to the full the national power of the development of transportation between the States.

Mr. President, I wish to say that these two amendments, covering simply an organization for effective work, covering simply investigation and plans, and not finally committing the National Government to any particular scheme of work, have their place, according to tradition, in a river and harbor bill, as a legitimate part of it. As the Senator from Ohio [Mr. BURTON] says, it is utterly impossible to frame a river and harbor bill without providing for the adminstrative machinery. That is all these amendments do; and all that I ask regarding this measure is, not its defeat, but that the Senate insist on its going back to conference, so that the House conferees can consult the House itself, the source of their power, as to these amendments, and not hang up these amendments in quarantine, as the Senator from Minnesota suggests they have done.

Mr. President, we have had of late many disastrous floods in the South; we had one last year; and so, under the sad lesson of that flood, we increased our appropriation for the lower Mississippi for bank protection and levee building from $3,000,000 to $6,000,000. I proposed, if my recollection is right, an amendment increasing that amount to $10,000,000. No representative of the lower Mississippi can contend that I have ever been unfriendly to the development of that river. On the contrary, in the face of that great disaster I insisted that the Nation should take more liberal action and should practically by a large expenditure now prevent or mitigate these annual losses. I proposed that without making any condition as to the adoption of the policy which I have been so long urging—for I felt the exigency of the moment, and I did not wish to make the exigency of the South the basis of a propaganda which might result in the loss of time in so important a work.

No Senator from that region can claim that for one moment my action has been prejudicial to its interests. On the contrary, I have always proclaimed that the very purpose of the national action which I sought was to enlist to the fullest extent the national powers in cooperation with the States affected, with a view to perfecting the economic system of that area of extraordinary richness and fertility, divided up by an imaginary line between the different States, existing at the same time under the several sovereignties of the States and under the sovereignty of the Nation, and my idea was to combine the powers and the functions of all these sovereigns in such a way as to reach every economic want of that region, not only in navigation and transportation, but in the development of water power, in the reclamation of swamp lands, and in the perfection of a canal system that would in time make it as perfect as Holland is in its distribution of the railway and waterway services.

I am glad to know, whilst on the one hand the levee commissioners and others organized under the laws of the States have developed into political organizations the perfection of whose administration is somewhat affected by politics, that the sentiment of the South itself, outside of the sentiment controlled by the levee commissioners, has been gradually drifting into the support of this great policy.

The New Orleans Item, a prominent paper of that city, is conspicuously for this policy in every detail. So, I am told, is the Picayune. The Progressive Union, a commercial organization of great power and influence in New Orleans, has declared itself for it. The State Legislature of Louisiana has declared itself for it. A reclamation association has been organized in that State, which has been taking up a propaganda for the development of this policy.

I wish, in support of this statement, to have the Secretary read from the New Orleans Item an article headed "Newlands bill versus the 'levees only' policy," and also an editorial in the same paper, entitled "Levees only a narrow policy."

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, the Secretary will read as requested.

The Secretary read as follows:

[From the New Orleans Item, Feb. 23, 1913.]

NEWLANDS BILL VERSUS THE "LEVEES ONLY" POLICY—THE PART THE RAILROADS TAKE—WALTER PARKER TAKES ISSUE WITH JOHN A. FOX—URGES BROAD POLICY THAT WOULD TREAT VALLEY PROBLEM AS A WHOLE FROM SOURCE TO MOUTH AND ENLIST NATIONAL SUPPORT.

That something is radically wrong with the levee system as a means of protecting the fertile lowland farms from floods and inundation is clearly evident, and the Nation can not do better than turn its attention to the solution of the problems involved in the interest of all the people of all the States. The slogan of the Nation should be "after Panama the Mississippi River."

During 200 years the dogma of levees only has reigned supreme. Levee advocates, engineers, and contractors have had the field all to themselves. An enormous system, made up of many levee boards and a huge aggregate tax income, has been built up. The Federal Government has contributed tens of millions, and the State of Louisiana alone has contributed some $50,000,000 for the building of levees alone.

Yet so imperfect is the protection against floods which the expenditure of all these millions produced that in the year 1912 fully $200,000,000 in damage was done as a result of broken levees and overflowed farms and towns, and the same disaster has, to a lesser extent, been repeated in the same way in the early part of 1913.

TWO SCHOOLS OF THOUGHT.

Two schools of thought and two sets of men are now engaged in an effort to induce the Federal Government to solve the problem.

One set—the old school thinkers—are domiciled at Memphis under an organization entitled "the Mississippi Valley Levee Association."

The other set—the new school thinkers—are domiciled at New Orleans under an organization entitled "the National Reclamation Association," which was formed as the National Irrigation Association in 1899.

According to Mr. John Fox, secretary-manager of the Mississippi Levee Association, which is advocating a continuation of the "levees only" policy, his organization has secured "the enthusiastic support of all the railroads interested in flood protection; in fact, the railroads, the telephone and telegraph companies, and the great corporations with property subject to flood have contributed heavily to the income of the association."

According to Mr. George H. Maxwell, executive director of the National Reclamation Association, which is advocating the nationalizing of the river by the Federal Government and the control of its floods by the Federal Government through the building of levees and the revetment of caving banks, supplemented by the control of the source streams in order that levee-breaking floods will no longer be permitted to form—business men, manufacturers, and taxpayers to the extent of more than 1,000 have been enlisted in the support of the National Reclamation Association's campaign, but no railroad is helping in any way.

CAUSE AND EFFECT.

In Egypt the British Government has harnessed the Nile by constructing the Assuan Dam, and the waters of that river no longer flood the farms when moisture is not needed, but instead, are conserved and used to irrigate them when moisture is needed.

In the Salt River Valley of Arizona, the Federal Government has constructed the great Roosevelt Dam, which gathers the freshet waters of the Salt River, conserves them, and uses them to irrigate the dry lands of a large territory. Below the dam the Salt River is now always peaceful and quiet.

THE NEWLANDS BILL.

The advocates of the Newlands bill say that the supplementing of well-built levees by such practical source stream control in the Mississippi River watershed as the building of dams similar to the Roosevelt and Assuan Dams, and the use of the impounded waters for the irrigation of arid lands, for the creation of power, and for the feeding of stream flow in the dry season, augmented by a practical national policy of reforestation will at one time put an end to levee-breaking floods and overflows in the low country, make the rivers navigable all the year round and create an enormous asset of power, of timber, and of soil.

These people wisely say that the problem of the rivers is national, not local, and that no practical solution can come except through treating the rivers as units from sources to mouths. And they explain the opposition to such a policy as due to the fact that under it the water-power sites would become a profit-paying asset of the taxpayers rather than the property of speculators and great private interests; that source stream control will mean plenty of water in the streams on which to float boats which will compete with the railroads in the transportation of commerce. They add that it will put an end to the political pork-barrel method of appropriating Federal money for river improvement; that it will coordinate the endeavors of the Government to promote the welfare of all the people in the interest of lasting national prosperity.

RAILROAD'S PART.

For these reasons, the managers of the National Reclamation Association's campaign of education say, the railroads and great vested interests of the country are opposing, not aiding them.

On the other hand, the "levees only" people, who have announced that their chief support is supplied by the railroads, in an interview with Mr. John A. Fox, published by the New Orleans Item, of February 21, "in effect" says: "The levees—levees, and nothing but the levees and revetment to protect them—for the Mississippi and for the Mississippi alone. Cut out the chimerical schemes. Don't get tangled up with navigation and reservoirs and conservation. Combine on something practical that can be put through now, when the country is aroused and ready to act."

The people of the Ohio Valley who suffer, according to the best authorities, from flood damage averaging $50,000,000 a year, will hardly back up the levees-only policy, advocated by Mr. Fox, which asks for protection for the Mississippi Valley alone.

Nor will the people of Nebraska, who were flooded last year, and the people of the entire Missouri River watershed, whose prosperity will be greatly promoted by a policy that provides a way to use the freshet waters at home for irrigation, power, and navigation, and at the same time aid in preventing destructive floods lower down, approve a levees-only policy.

In the North and East there are many manufacturers who will gladly urge their Senators and Congressmen to vote for a measure that will promote the general prosperity through river regulation, but will urge them not to vote for the appropriation under a political pork-barrel method of Federal money for the continuation of a levees-only policy.

There are the people of other great river valleys. They also have problems in their own sections. Their rivers often flood the lowlands, and an abundance of water, needed by the dry-land farmer, annually goes to waste. They also need navigable river all the year around, not floods at one season and dry beds at another. True, their problems are not nearly so acute as is that of the people of the Mississippi Valley, but will they view with pleasure any move that purports to solve Mississippi Valley problems, but which does not even establish a principle or hold out a hope of at some time in the future solving their own problems? And there are people in the valleys of the Colorado, the Sacramento, the San Joaquin, and other great rivers.

All these elements are interested in the broad policy, not in the narrow policy. All have influence; all have votes in Congress.

For these reasons the new-school thinkers advocate legislation that, while providing for a complete and adequate levee system, with revetted banks where needed, to be built and controlled by the Federal Government, will also provide for the prevention of flood formation in a way that will permit the people of the up-country to turn now wasted flood water, which menaces the low country, into an upcountry asset out of which the up-country people may make money while the low-country people enjoy immunity from floods and overflows and make their crops in peace.

WALTER PARKER.

[First editorial in the New Orleans Item, Feb. 23, 1913.]

"LEVEES ONLY" A NARROW POLICY.

Quite naturally, when John A. Fox, secretary-manager of the Mississippi Levee Association, belittles the Newlands bill and objects to "getting levees tangled up with chimerical schemes for reservoirs, or with any navigation program"—Walker Parker, proponent of the National Reclamation Association, which seeks to treat the "problem of the valley" as a whole, from the watersheds to the jetties, rises to object.

The dispute between the two associations, the division of sentiment among those most vitally interested, which that dispute has created, is an unhappy phase of the whole great situation involving the Mississippi Valley.

It has a precedent in recent history: The bitter quarrel between the advocates of the Nicaraguan route for an interoceanic canal and the friends of the Panama route. That quarrel postponed for 15 years the construction of the waterway between the Caribbean and the Pacific. And that quarrel was kept alive largely by the sinister activities of the transcontinental railroads. Only when Theodore Roosevelt smashed precedent and proprieties in grabbing the Canal Zone did the quarrel end and the Fabian fight of the railroads suffer final defeat.

It is not unfair in this connection to mention that the railroads of the valley are enlisted with the "levees only" association, and that most railroad men belittle and decry, as does Mr. Fox, any broader plan which includes insistence on headwater conservation and navigation maintenance with the plea for levees.

The construction of an interoceanic canal threatened the monopoly which the railroads held on commerce east and west across the United States. The railroads skillfully delayed when they could no longer openly fight the plan.

The "watersheds to jetties" program for handling the valley problem threatens the monopoly which the railroads now possess on the north and south commerce of the central United States—because it includes maintenance of year-round navigable water wherever possible on the Mississippi and its tributaries. And the railroads of the valley are identified with the rival movement which insists on "levees only."

In blunt truth, the railroads centering in New Orleans or running through the valley would seem to have many men powerful in their councils who would much prefer to see their roads stopped by water once or twice a decade than to see the rivers from Kansas City, Pittsburgh, Minneapolis, and St. Louis bearing traffic to the Gulf through 12 months of every year.

When such conditions rule, it is well and wise for those whose primary and immediate interests lies in quick betterment of the southern levees and a lightening of the levee border on southern-flood districts to watch with care how far they commit themselves to the "levees only" program.

True, in the lower valley, we want "levees first," because we have vital need, but if we say "levees only" we assume an attitude not to be best defended. Our people, our levee boards do well to help all that helps levees—but all is not helpful that avows friendly aid, and that is frequently to be doubted which protests too much of exclusive friendship.

The Newlands bill, as originally drawn, may not be perfect. Doubtless the urgency of the situation, disclosed by the flood of 1912, preaches the need for an amendment to it which will provide for immediate levee construction through the lower valley by Federal means.

But the Newlands bill, amended to that end, or legislation along kindred lines, which looks to one coherent, synthesized solution of the tremendous, interrelated, complex group of questions that have come to be known as the "Problem of the valley," offers the widest, the broadest, and the best program for those in the lower valley to support.

Such a program binds together in unity of interest every element—barring the railroads—of 31 States, from the watersheds to the Gulf. A lesser program—a "levees-only" program—must inevitably suffer the charge of sectionalism, no matter how strong the plea for justice based on the fact that the lower valley has to bear the brunt of waters from a vast and distant region.

Common sense teaches, if engineers disagree, that the problem is a unit problem, no matter how widely separate on the surface its various phases seem. And if it is a unit problem—the best solution is that one which treats it as such.

To seek to handle Mississippi River floods in this day, by restricting activity to levee building on the lower reaches, rather than by storing, guarding, using, regulating the waters from the sources to the mouths would seem in the light of world-wide history to be the apotheosis of narrowness and short sightedness.

It would be treating a loathsome disease by disinfecting its sores instead of by cleansing the blood.

Mr. NEWLANDS. It will be seen, Mr. President, from these newspaper extracts, right in the region represented by the Senators on this floor who have been most contentious against the amendment which I have offered, there is growing up a strong organization for the support of the bill. An organization has been effected in the region referred to in this newspaper article, strongly backed by public sentiment and inimical to the narrow policy which has been hitherto and which is now being pursued by the Levee Association of the South, represented by Mr. Fox, namely, that the southern representatives should confine themselves to the perfection of the levees alone and should not be diverted into dreams, so characterized, relating to the promotion of the only purpose which Congress can constitutionally serve, the promotion of transportation by a perfected navigation.

Reference is made in these articles to the sources of the opposition to the policy which I am now advocating, namely, that the railway systems of the valley are unwilling to see any part of their patronage turned over to the water carriers, and a historical reference is made in this article to the well-known fact that for 15 years or more the transcontinental railroads of the country, through a mistaken sense of their own interest, opposed the adjustment of the Isthmian Canal question. It is a matter well known as a part of our legislative history that the deterrent influence throughout that entire agitation was mainly that of the transcontinental railways, which complicated us in our purpose, not only by dividing the friends of an Isthmian canal, but by creating complications with Central American countries in such a way as to long deter the final solution of this important question.

We find ourselves confronted by the same difficulty with reference to our waterway development. We have now the long-sought-for link between the Pacific and the Atlantic and the Gulf coast, the Panama Canal, approaching completion. One of the great purposes of the perfection of that link was to tie together the water-transportation systems of the Pacific and the Atlantic coasts. It will never serve this high purpose until those waterway systems upon both coasts are perfected. The railway systems can deter as much the ultimate accomplishment of the purpose which we had in view when we started to construct the Panama Canal by delaying the development of the waterway systems of the Atlantic and Pacific and Gulf coasts as they could by delaying the construction of the canal itself.

Prominent railway men to-day already agree that in the end the Panama Canal will be a great blessing to them, that through it the great Pacific coast will become greatly populated and enriched, and that the local carriers there connected with the great transcontinental systems will reap a rich harvest out of the substituted and enlarged local traffic in the place of the transcontinental traffic they have hitherto enjoyed.

But the policy of a railway system is always present advantage rather than the long view that gives advantage in the future, and to-day the railway systems of the Mississippi Valley are opposed to the development of the waterway policy, unwisely, so I believe, because the waterways will simply be the carriers of the bulky and cheap products, and the costly products that will pay high rates of freight will be so vastly increased through the general production as to give those railways a larger increased profit by reason of the substituted traffic. But the vision is necessarily contracted. The managers of to-day wish to reap the harvest of the day. They are not content to pursue a policy by which other managers will reap the harvests of the future.

So we find this levee organization perfected in the South charged by this newspaper with being supported by the railways themselves, urging the narrow and contracted policy of levee building only and warning the people of the Mississippi Valley against the acceptance of so-called chimerical ideas that involve the treatment of the river as a unit and its perfection, among other things, as an instrumentality of transportation.

So we are to witness now right in the Mississippi Valley the distracting contentions regarding the development of this policy that prevailed so long with reference to the completion of the Panama Canal, a great national policy antagonized by special interests, not taking the long view of their interest in the future but taking only the contracted and narrow view of immediate advantage and profit.

There are some men engaged in the transportation system who have a sufficiently broad vision to realize the benefit that will come to the railroads themselves in that region from the development of the Mississippi delta, from the vast population that will flock there, and the great wealth that will be produced there. Some of these great transportation managers have spoken, and have spoken vigorously, upon the subject, and I shall seek to put some of their utterances in the RECORD. But as a rule they favor the development of the rivers that will protect the land; they oppose the development of the rivers that will accomplish the only constitutional purpose which a national government can carry out, their development as national instrumentalities for interstate transportation.

Mr. President, the best evidence of this hostility is the history of river development. Suppose the railroads had taken the long view, that population and wealth would be so developed as to give them a plethora of the higher and more costly traffic compensatory of the loss of the cheap and bulky traffic—suppose they had taken that view and given this great waterway movement the aid of their cooperation, with the intelligence of their engineers and constructors applied to the solution of this great problem, do you think the waterway development of the Mississippi would have been such as it has been during the last 40 years? Would you have seen the successful completion of the bank protection of the Missouri River for 35 miles under a Missouri River commission, and then the abandonment of it by the National Government? Would you have witnessed the expenditure of hundreds of millions of dollars upon the Mississippi River without the increase of transportation? Would you have seen a waterway system developed without transfer facilities, without terminal facilities, without cooperation with the rail and with the ocean carrier?

Oh, no; the great railway managers of the country, the great railway engineers and the great railway constructors of the country, had they been really in favor of the development of water carriers, would have acted in such a way as to produce the result that has been produced in Germany, where under the patronage of the Imperial Government itself all three classes of transportation, rail, water, and ocean transportation, have reached the highest development and cooperate with each other for the common good.

The very fact that this great enterprise of the development of the Mississippi River and its tributaries has not been successful in promoting transportation is an evidence of the deadly hostility of the railway carriers to the development of that transportation. It is unnecessary that anyone should smile at the suggestion that the railway carriers are strong in their opposition and effective in their antagonism to the development of the perfection of our water carriers.

Mr. President, these railway carriers are exceedingly potential in politics. They are not so potential now, I am glad to say, as they used to be. I do not mean to say that they control legislators, but a legislator will hesitate long before he arouses the deadly antagonism of the railway carrier in his vicinity. Let him make himself active in a propaganda which is either directed against their interest or inferentially affects it and he finds secret opposition springing up to him everywhere. He finds a candidate against him at the primaries; he finds strong candidates against him in the conventions, unconsciously moved by this great controlling force; and the man who really wishes to accomplish his aims and serve the public and to make his life a sacrifice to public duty feels that if he runs up against this powerful antagonism he will lose all opportunity for usefulness by being deprived of the position which alone makes him useful. So, many honorable and conscientious men feel unwilling to take upon themselves the burden of a propaganda, knowing that they will be opposed by a great and powerful interest which can raise antagonism to them personally by distracting the councils of the party, and which can direct against them popular candidates with a view to embarrassing their elections.

I have no hostility whatever to the railroads of the country. I believe in doing everything that is necessary to develop railway transportation. I have been opposed to their participation in politics, but I have realized that conditions were such oftentimes as to force them into politics. Between the power of taxation on the one hand and regulation on the other many of them have doubtless felt that they might be ground to destruction. They have doubtless thought it necessary to influence and direct and sometimes control public movements that threaten them with destruction.

So far as my public career is concerned, all my efforts in the way of regulation have been with a view to protecting the railroads themselves as much as the public, to protect them from public spoliation as well as the public from extortion and oppression. I believe that the time is now rapidly approaching, through the wise exercise of the taxing power and of the regulating power by the States and of the Nation, when the railroads will practically be out of politics, and they will be much more prosperous under those conditions than they have been under conditions of constant political antagonism. I do not blame them for pursuing policies that affect their interests; I do not blame them for opposing public policies which may be prejudicial to their interests; I simply point out the fact that their interest in the future is one thing and the interest of to-day is another, and that in pursuing the interests of to-day they may be antagonizing the interests of the future. The interests of to-day would lead them to destroy and hamstring the water carrier, but the interests of the future would lead them to the highest development of the water carrier, whether on the river or on the ocean.

I simply refer to the policies pursued by the railroads, not with a view to denunciation but simply with a view to calling their attention to what I would regard as a wise policy upon their part, and that is to take the long-distance view of this question and to unite with every community and with every State and with the Nation in the development of policies that will increase their population and their wealth, and thus contribute to the success of their activities, instead of antagonizing a great public policy with a view merely to present advantage and obstructing and impeding the progress of great policies intended for the development of the entire country.

Mr. President, I said that this policy of river regulation from source to mouth, including the tributaries and including the development of all the related uses of water, was a policy that received public approval, and I wish to have read some utterances upon this subject. First, I will refer to the utterances of the gentleman who on the 4th of March will take his seat in the presidential chair, Hon. Woodrow Wilson. In the following telegram he declared his views upon this important question:

SEA GIRT, N. J., September 30, 1912.

Hon. FRANCIS G. NEWLANDS,
President National Irrigation Congress, Salt Lake, Utah:

Please express to the National Irrigation Congress my hearty approval of the policy it is met to promote, and especially of the policy of supplementing bank and levee protection by storage of flood waters above for irrigation and water power, turning floods from a menace into a blessing and at the same time abundantly feeding navigable waters.

WOODROW WILSON.

How admirable this expression; in a few words condensing everything that can be said upon the subject, everything that has been said in the party declarations, in the resolutions of chambers of commerce and boards of trade and waterway associations. He refers to supplementing bank and levee protection. The President elect has no fear, as some of our Senators from the lower Mississippi seem to have, that bank and levee protection will be abandoned if this enlarged policy is entered upon. The President elect does not speak of diminishing bank and levee protection; he speaks of supplementing it, and supplementing it by holding back floods that vex its banks and threaten its levees with destruction above, and turning them, as he so aptly terms, from a menace into a blessing by application to the irrigation of the great arid area of the country and by the development of water power.

I ask the timid men of the South and of the Mississippi Valley, representing conscientiously as they do the interests of their constituency, to take courage from the utterances of the President-elect that there is a guarantee of the continuance of the present system of bank and levee protection. Nay, more, it is an assurance that it will be prosecuted, so that it will accomplish what they so much want, and the President elect will pursue this policy, backed by the declaration of his party and by the unanimous support of his party in both Houses. We are simply preparing the way now by such action as this on this bill in harmony with his words for the greater and larger fulfillment of the future.

Mr. President, what were those declarations of the Democratic Party? And what were the declarations of the other parties—the Republican Party and the Progressive Party—the feebiest utterance of all being that of the Republican Party, and yet a decisive utterance; the strongest utterance of all being that of the Progressive Party in the last campaign, or at all events equaling in strength the declaration of the Democratic Party; and those two parties represented almost the unanimous vote of the people of the United States. What were their declarations? What was the declaration of the Democratic Party in its platform of 1908?

Mr. President, I will ask the Secretary to read the declarations on this subject of the platforms of the Democratic Party, the Republican Party, and the Progressive Party in 1908.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, the Secretary will read as requested. Does the Senator desire the platform declarations read of 1908 or of 1912?

Mr. NEWLANDS. The declaration in 1908 is the specific one of the Democratic Party. I should like that read, and also the planks of the platform in 1912.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Of both parties?

Mr. NEWLANDS. Of the three parties.

Mr. SMOOT. Will the Senator be satisfied with having them printed in the RECORD, without reading, in connection with his remarks?

Mr. NEWLANDS. I prefer to have them read.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The reading will be proceeded with.

The Secretary read as follows from the Democratic platform of 1908:

WATERWAYS.

Water furnishes the cheaper means of transportations——

Mr. ASHURST. Is that the portion of the Democratic platform relative to waterways?

Mr. BORAH. That is the Prohibition platform. [Laughter.]

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It is the Democratic platform of 1908. The reading will proceed.

The SECRETARY. The extract is as follows:

DEMOCRATIC PLATFORM 1908—WATERWAYS.

Water furnishes the cheaper means of transportations, and the National Government, having the control of navigable waters, should improve them to their fullest capacity. We earnestly favor the immediate adoption of a liberal and comprehensive plan for improving every watercourse in the Union which is justified by the needs of commerce; and to secure that end we favor, when practicable, the connection of the Great Lakes with the navigable rivers and with the Gulf through the Mississippi River, and the navigable rivers with each other, by artificial canals, with a view of perfecting a system of inland waterways to be navigated by vessels of standard draft.

We favor the coordination of the various services of the Government connected with waterways in one service, for the purpose of aiding in the completion of such a system of inland waterways; and we favor the creation of a fund ample for continuous work, which shall be conducted under the direction of a commission of experts to be authorized by law.

The Democratic platform of 1912 reads:

DEMOCRATIC PLATFORM.

We renew the declaration of our last platform relating to the conservation of our national resources and the development of our waterways. The present devastation of the lower Mississippi Valley accentuates the movement for the regulation of river flow by additional levee and bank protection below, and the diversion, storage, and control of the flood waters above, and their utilization for beneficial purposes in the reclamation of arid and swamp lands and the development of water power, instead of permitting the floods to continue, as heretofore, agents of destruction. We hold that the control of the Mississippi River is a national problem. The preservation of the depth of its water for the purpose of navigation, the building of levees to maintain the integrity of its channel and the prevention of the overflow of the land, and its consequent devastation, resulting in the interruption of interstate commerce, the disorganization of the mail service, and the enormous loss of life and property, impose an obligation which alone can be discharged by the General Government.

To maintain an adequate depth of water the entire year and thereby encourage water transportation is a consummation worthy of legislative attention and presents an issue national in its character. It calls for prompt action on the part of Congress, and the Democratic Party pledges itself to the enactment of legislation leading to that end.

We favor the cooperation of the United States and the respective States in plans for the comprehensive treatment of all waterways with a view of coordinating plans for channel improvement with plans for drainage of swamp and overflowed lands, and to this end we favor the appropriation by the Federal Government of sufficient funds to make surveys of such lands, to develop plans for draining the same, and to supervise the work of construction.

We favor the adoption of a liberal and comprehensive plan for the development and improvement of our inland waterways with economy and efficiency, so as to permit their navigation by vessels of standard draft.

The Republican platform of 1912 reads:

REPUBLICAN PLATFORM.

The Mississippi River is the Nation's drainage ditch. Its flood waters, gathered from 31 States and the Dominion of Canada, constitute an overpowering force which breaks the levees and pours its torrents over many million acres of the richest land in the Union, stopping mails, impeding commerce, and causing great loss of life and property. These floods are national in scope, and the disasters they produce seriously affect the general welfare. The States unaided can not cope with this giant problem; hence we believe the Federal Government should assume a fair proportion of the burden of its control, so as to prevent the disasters from recurring floods.

* * * * * * *

We favor a liberal and systematic policy for the improvement of our rivers and harbors. Such improvement has been made upon expert information and after a careful comparison of cost and prospective benefits.

The Progressive Party platform of 1912 reads:

PROGRESSIVE PARTY PLATFORM.

The rivers of the United States are the natural arteries of this continent. We demand that they shall be opened to traffic as indispensable parts of a great nation-wide system of transportation in which the Panama Canal will be the central link, thus enabling the whole interior of the United States to share with the Atlantic and Pacific seaboards in the benefit derived from the canals. It is a national obligation to develop our rivers, and especially the Mississippi and its tributaries, without delay under a comprehensive general plan covering each river system from its source to its mouth, designed to secure its highest usefulness for navigation, irrigation, domestic supply, water power, and the prevention of floods. We pledge our party to the immediate preparation of such a plan, which should be made and carried out in close and friendly cooperation between the Nation, the States, and the cities affected. Under such a plan the destructive floods of the Mississippi and other streams which represent a vast and needless loss to the Nation would be controlled by forest conservation and water storage at the headwaters and by levees below, land sufficient to support millions of people will be reclaimed from the deserts and the swamps, water power enough to transform the industrial standings of whole States would be developed, adequate water terminals would be provided, transportation by river would revive, and the railroads would be compelled to cooperate as freely with the boat lines as with each other. The equipment, organization, and experience acquired in constructing the Panama Canal soon will be available for the Lakes-to-the-Gulf deep waterways and other portions of this great work, and should be utilized by the Nation in cooperation with the various States at the lowest net cost to the people.

Mr. NEWLANDS. Mr. President, this closes the action of the parties upon this subject. I wish to add that, in addition to party action upon this subject, the administration actively took up this question during Mr. Roosevelt's and Mr. Taft's incumbency. Mr. Roosevelt organized an Inland Waterway Commission. That commission, after a thorough investigation, made a report. That commission was composed of two Senators, two Representatives, the Chief of Engineers of the Army, the Chief of the Reclamation Service, the Chief of the Forestry Service, and the Chief of the Bureau of Corporations, which bureau had made a very extensive inquiry into all the conditions relating to waterway transportation, and the chief of which bureau was a valuable member of this commission.

On that commission served the now Senator, then the Representative from Ohio, Mr. BURTON; the then Representative and now Senator from Alabama, Mr. BANKHEAD; former Senator Warner, of Missouri, and myself.

The result of our long investigation and inquiry was a unanimous report, with some modifications suggested by the Chief of Engineers of the Army. That report called for the policy which I have endeavored to outline, of cooperation between the services, cooperation between the various sovereigns affected, cooperation with municipalities, corporations, and individuals, with a view to a broad and comprehensive plan that would involve all the waterways of the country. It involved a large fund and continuous work, with the aid of this fund, for a period of 10 years.

As I have already stated, the only difference between myself and the Senator from Ohio with reference to the conclusions arrived at by the commission was that I insisted that the whole policy had been so far developed as to have received practically popular indorsement, and that its successful execution involved the creation of a very large fund and giving practically a free hand, within the general range of the plans adopted, to the Engineer Corps and to the related services in their execution, with a view to preventing the exasperating halts that have thus far been made in waterway development through changes of view, through deficient appropriations, and other obstructions, my contention being that we should take hold of the matter vigorously, just as we took hold of the Panama Canal and just as we took hold of the reclamation work in the West, providing that the board charged with the execution should make no contract unless the money for payment was in the fund and within that limitation, giving them large freedom both in developing plans and in execution.

Whilst I think the view which I entertained was the correct one, and I still think so, and feel assured that ultimately Congress will come to a similar conclusion, yet the action which I now seek does not involve any such large powers to the River Regulation Board. Whilst the Waterways Commission was engaged in this inquiry and before it had concluded its labors I prepared a bill, which I presented simply as a tentative proposal, with a view to preparing the public mind for what I thought would be the final conclusion of the Waterways Commission. That bill was similar in its terms to bills which I have since introduced, though I think the bills introduced later are improvements upon the original. That bill was referred to the then Secretary of War, Mr. Taft, and was approved in all substantial details by Mr. Taft in a very comprehensive communication to the Committee on Commerce. I have not that communication available just now, but later on I shall ask to have it read.

Recently the Committee on Commerce called for the views of the chiefs of the various departments under which the services that relate in any way to water are organized—the Department of War, the Department of the Interior, the Department of Commerce and Labor, and the Department of Agriculture. I should like the Secretary to read the communications from the Secretary of Agriculture, the Secretary of the Interior, and the Secretary of War, which are upon the desk.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. BRANDEGEE in the chair). Without objection, the Secretary will read as requested.

Mr. PERCY. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Nevada yield to the Senator from Mississippi?

Mr. NEWLANDS. Yes.

Mr. PERCY. Mr. President, without desiring in any way to be discourteous to the Senator from Nevada, and without wishing to inconvenience or to incommode him in any way, I shall object to the reading by the Secretary. It is being painfully forced upon the judgment of the Senate that, notwithstanding the protestations of the Senator from Nevada that he does not wish to defeat this bill, he is engaged in pursuing, through what I may call a more or less organized filibuster, a course which must result, if successful, in the defeat of the bill. If the bill is sent back to conference, according to the opinion of those in the best position to judge, it means its defeat, just as surely as if the Senate should defeat it by a vote; and the course the Senator is pursuing would seem to be a little more than a desire fairly to explain his views to the Senate on this question, upon which he has so frequently addressed it. Therefore, as I have said, without desiring to inconvenience the Senator at all, I shall object to the reading by the Secretary.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Objection is made to the request.

Mr. NEWLANDS. Mr. President, what was the statement of the Chair?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Mississippi objected to the reading of the paper requested to be read by the Senator from Nevada.

Mr. NEWLANDS. May I ask the Chair, is that subject to objection?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator may read it himself or the question may be submitted to the Senate whether the Secretary shall read it. Is it the wish of the Senator that the Chair shall submit the question to the Senate?

Mr. NEWLANDS. No; I will read it myself. In reply, however——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair will call the attention of the Senator from Nevada to Rule XI, which provides:

RULE XI.

OBJECTION TO READING A PAPER.

When the reading of a paper is called for, and objected to, it shall be determined by a vote of the Senate, without debate.

It is mandatory that the question shall be determined by the Senate; but the Senator can withdraw his request or read the paper himself, if he prefers.

Mr. NEWLANDS. I do. I shall proceed to state the substance of the various reports; but before taking up the reports I wish, in reply to the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. PERCY], to repeat what I have already said, that I have no desire to defeat this bill. I do not regard it as a very perfect scheme of legislation, but I do not desire——

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Nevada yield to the Senator from North Carolina?

Mr. NEWLANDS. Certainly.

Mr. SIMMONS. I am very much delighted to hear the Senator say that he has no desire to defeat this bill, and, in view of that statement, I would inquire of the Senator if he would be willing to agree that at some hour this afternoon we shall vote upon the question of recommitting the bill to the conference committee?

Mr. NEWLANDS. I am not prepared to state a time now, but I will take the matter under consideration and will communicate with the Senator later on.

Mr. SIMMONS. Will the Senator indicate whether he would be willing to fix any time during this calendar day for a vote on the question of the recommittal of the bill to the conference committee?

Mr. NEWLANDS. I am not prepared to say now. I want to see the subject thoroughly discussed. I have reason to believe that there are a number of Senators who want to discuss it, who firmly believe in this policy, and who think that it is only fair that the House of Representatives should have a chance to vote upon it. According to the statement of the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. NELSON], the House conferees put these amendments in quarantine and prevented them from being considered by a separate vote addressed to them in the House of Representatives, although the expression in the House at the time the conference was ordered was that before any final action was taken upon these amendments the matter should be referred to a vote in the House. I am simply urging a course that will result in the fair consideration of these amendments by the House under a rule, which I presume will limit debate and which will secure final action before the adjournment of Congress.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President, I simply want to understand the position of the Senator. I understand the Senator to state that he wants this matter to go back to conference in order that it may be reopened and reconsidered with a view to sending it back to the House, so that there may be a vote upon his amendment. Is that the position of the Senator?

Mr. NEWLANDS. Yes; after a full discussion here.

Mr. SIMMONS. Then, Mr. President, that can not happen unless we do vote upon the question of sending it back to conference. If the Senator wants to accomplish that purpose, it seems to me that he ought to agree to a time certain for a vote, so that it may go back to conference and be submitted to the House if the conferees shall so decide.

Mr. NEWLANDS. I want to be assured, in the first place, that there is a full discussion in this body, so as to insure, if possible, a disagreement to this conference report. I do not want to have too early a vote upon this subject. A number of Senators have indicated to me that they wish to address the Senate upon it, and I do not want to foreclose them the opportunity.

Mr. SIMMONS. It must be manifest to the Senator that if he prolongs this discussion he will defeat the very object which he says he has in view.

Mr. NEWLANDS. I do not propose, Mr. President, to take any action that will prevent a consideration of these two amendments by the House after a reasonable debate there upon the merits; but I do not propose, at a time when the whole subject is of the highest importance as an educational matter, to lose the opportunity of impressing upon Congress and the American people that a policy which for years has been determined upon by the American people, as evidenced by the explicit declarations of party platforms, by public expressions of boards of trade and chambers of commerce, by the unanimous declaration of the congress of governors, and by the action of numerous waterway associations throughout the country, that that policy is to be put in quarantine by three conferees from the House of Representatives, and that the representatives of the people in the House are not to have the opportunity to consider or to discuss this question.

Mr. SHIVELY. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Nevada yield to the Senator from Indiana?

Mr. NEWLANDS. I do.

Mr. SHIVELY. I am very much impressed with what the Senator has just said; but it occurs to me that the conferees being the organ of the two Houses of Congress, it is our duty to leave to the House of Representatives the control over its own conferees. It seems to me it is within the function of the House to determine what its conferees shall do—to reject their reports or not to reject—and by its own affirmative action, if it desires to do so, to bring this matter back before the House. I never understood that it was the function of the Senate to determine by its procedure what the House shall or shall not consider.

Mr. NEWLANDS. Mr. President, it is the right of the Senate to insist upon legislation which it favors, and it is the right of the Senate to insist upon the consideration of legislation which it presents to the Congress of the United States, and it is the right of the Senate to insist upon it until that fair consideration is given. I am aware that this bill contains appropriations for a great number of projects in which Senators are interested—and when I say "interested" I mean, of course, a very proper interest—relating to the development of the regions they represent. But owing to the fact that so many Senators and so many Representatives have in this bill interests affecting their particular constituencies, interests evidenced by substantial appropriations to be expended within their States or districts, the whole tendency is to disregard all questions that relate to general policies and to urge the passage of the bill with a view to securing to each Senator or Representative that which he individually desires. In this way we have a composite bill that represents no continuous or scientific policy.

The country has been intent for years upon putting the river projects upon the merit basis and taking them out of the patronage system.

Mr. STONE. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Nevada yield to the Senator from Missouri?

Mr. NEWLANDS. Certainly.

Mr. STONE. I should like to ask my friend if he is still addressing himself in advocacy of his amendments?

Mr. NEWLANDS. Yes.

Mr. STONE. The Senator has presented the matter very exhaustively. I should like to know, because the Senator from Nevada is so entirely frank, whether he thinks he is about ready to submit it to a vote?

Mr. NEWLANDS. I have already stated, Mr. President—probably the Senator was not present at the time—my views with reference to that matter. There are a number of Senators who wish to speak upon this subject.

Mr. STONE. Then will the Senator answer me frankly whether this number of Senators, cooperating with him, have determined to prevent the passage of this bill? If so, perhaps we had as well put it to the test in some way and abandon it and go on with something else instead of wasting what is left of this session in a filibustering experiment. Is that what the Senator and his associates are engaged upon, to prevent the passage of this bill unless certain things are done—unless his amendments, and perhaps the amendments of some other Senators, are agreed to? That is a straight question to the Senator.

Mr. NEWLANDS. It is a very straight question.

Mr. STONE. The Senator is always so brave and fair that I think he, if any Senator, would make a direct answer to a direct question of that kind, so that the Senate may be informed as to the situation.

Mr. NEWLANDS. Mr. President, the question is a direct one, and perhaps goes a good deal further than the Senator should expect an answer for; but I have no hesitation in stating my position.

There is no concert of action, to my knowledge, of purpose, regarding the final disposition of this bill. I have heard several say that the bill ought to be killed. I have not shared in that view. I have hoped that as the result of the discussion on this floor the Senate will disagree, with a view to compelling the House conferees to take a vote in the House regarding these amendments, after a fair discussion. So far, that is the length of my purpose, and I state it without, however, committing myself at all as to the future.

Mr. STONE. If the Senator will allow me, I express no decided opinion as to whether this is a wise bill or an unwise bill, whether it is good or bad, whether it ought to be defeated or not.

Mr. NEWLANDS. I am trying to convince the Senator that it is a wise one.

Mr. STONE. But the Senator is too experienced in legislative procedure to doubt that the bill will pass substantially in the form in which it has been reported by the conferees or not pass at all.

There are on the calendar other things of a good deal of importance that we want to take up. Everyone recognizes that the Senator from Nevada, almost alone, and certainly with the cooperation of two or three others, can continue a debate indefinitely, and defeat the passage of the bill. I think it is due to us to know what the situation is and what the purpose of the Senator is, so that the Senate, being advised, may govern itself accordingly, recognizing the power of the Senator and his associates to defeat the passage of the bill.

It may be that they would be doing a wise public service. I am not entering upon that question. I am simply desirous to know whether or not that is the purpose. If it is the purpose, then announce it, so that the Senate may be advised; and it may be that the matter can be in some way disposed of more promptly and laid aside, or something done with it, so that the entire business of the Senate may not be arrested in a contest of this character, the ultimate result of which is known to all.

I think we ought to deal frankly with each other here. The Senator from Nevada has been reasonably frank. He says he is not engaged in a filibuster. He says there is no agreement for concert of action. But it has been whispered around that other Senators—I have no authority to give their names—are prepared to follow with prolonged orations, which may be pertinent or impertinent to the subject in hand, as soon as the Senator from Nevada has exhausted his energy—and that would require a good while. We know what the Senator from Nevada can do if he makes up his mind. He can continue here for a good, long while yet.

If this is to be followed by other like speeches, I think we ought to know it, so that we may lay aside the bill or do something else with reference to it, so that other important business of the Senate may be proceeded with.

I submit to the Senator if that is not fair.

Mr. NEWLANDS. Mr. President, the Senator uses the term "frankly" too often. I am always frank. I am frank now. My only purpose is to get consideration by the House of Representatives of these two amendments, and to take them out of the quarantine in which the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. NELSON] says the House conferees have put them.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President——

Mr. NEWLANDS. If the Senator will permit me, that is my purpose. I do not know what any other man's purpose is. I will state to the Senator that I do know of quite a lengthy speech that will be made in this connection, on this and related subjects, because the Senator wants frankness, and I give him my full knowledge.

There are some Senators on this floor who think it would be a good thing to have the bill beaten. The Democratic Party is coming into power on the 4th of March. It is fully committed to the policy for which I am contending, by party declarations and by the expressed convictions of its chief, which I have read. That is not my view. I would prefer to have this bill go through, as I do not want to embarrass Senators regarding appropriations in the bill in which their States and their districts are interested, and which, so far as I know, are unobjectionable. What I object to is the system. These two amendments look to the elaboration of a perfect system, and not at all to defeating the bill.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Nevada yield to the Senator from North Carolina?

Mr. NEWLANDS. Yes.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President, if the Senator from Nevada will pardon me, of course the Senator knows that it is necessary for the Senate to act first in sending this matter back to conference. After that is done, it is necessary for the House to act, in order that it may get back into conference.

I want to state to the Senator that I have been over to the House this morning and have held a conference with the conferees on the part of the House with reference to their ability to get this matter back into conference to-day, so as to have action by the two bodies upon the result of that conference. I will say to the Senator that they have advised me—all of them have stated the same thing—that in the present condition of the business of the House it would be a little difficult to get the matter up at all with a view to sending it back to conference, but that unless the matter goes back to the House during this afternoon it will be utterly impossible to secure any action on the part of the House in the way of sending it back to the conference.

So the Senator will see that if these gentlemen are advised correctly in the assurances and statements they have made to me, if the bill is to be gotten into conference again—and the Senator says that is his purpose—it is necessary that we shall act here in the Senate at some time during this afternoon. I appeal to the Senator, in view of that situation, to put some limitation upon this discussion, so that we may get a vote and the House may have an opportunity, at least, of letting the bill go back where the Senator says he wants it to go.

Mr. NEWLANDS. Mr. President, I will ask the Senator whether the conferees on the part of the Senate will consent to a disagreement and a reference of this matter again to the conferees?

Mr. SIMMONS. I suppose that is a matter for the Senate, Mr. President. The Senate would have to vote upon the question of whether or not they would send it back. We have no right to make an agreement in advance for the Senate. It is not a matter that will be submitted to the conferees but one that will have to be submitted to the Senate. All I was suggesting to the Senator was that he let the Senate vote, so that the matter may get before the House, because it must be acted upon by both bodies before it can get back into conference.

Mr. NEWLANDS. Mr. President, if the Senate conferees will give their consent to a disagreement, with a view to having this matter go back to the conferees, in order that they may submit these amendments to the House, that is one thing; but as long as they do not consent to that, and the matter has to be determined by the Senate, it is exceedingly material that there should be a discussion here, in order that we may be able to convince the Senate that it is wise that it should disagree.

Recollect that we are not endeavoring here by these amendments to interfere with a single appropriation, either to increase or to diminish it. All we are asking is that the policies of the Democratic, the Republican, and the Progressive Parties, as declared in their platforms, shall be carried out in the organization of a system through these amendments. That is all we are asking. So far as I am concerned, if a method can be devised by which these amendments will be submitted to the House I shall be content. If they should decide against them, the responsibility would rest upon them.

They are all members of the Democratic or the Republican or the Progressive Parties, and if they see fit to abandon the party declarations upon the subject and refuse their assent to these amendments which simply put in this bill the declared policies of all these three parties the responsibility will rest upon them and not upon me. But I think I am entitled, I think the Senate is entitled, and I think the American people are entitled to some expression of opinion on this subject from the House of Representatives; and they are above all things entitled to take this policy out of the quarantine that has been imposed upon it by the conferees of the House.

I stand for democratic government, for democratic expression, for the expression of the will of the people through their representatives, and I stand opposed to every system that proposes to impede and clog the efforts either of the people or of their representatives. The method here pursued smacks too much of the methods that have been pursued for a generation in Congress—methods which have been repudiated by the people; methods against which the people have raised their protest; methods which have created a storm of revolution throughout the entire country, so much so that every party organization is endangered.

A great policy, declared equally by the Democratic, the Republican, and the Progressive Parties, is outlined in the amendments which I have presented—the demands of the American people, indicated in every form of expression, from party declarations down to the declarations of legislatures, of boards of trade, of chambers of commerce, of waterway associations, of every form of organization that expresses public opinion; and yet we are told that three men, the servants of the House, can put this policy in quarantine, can put it in cold storage, and prevent it from being considered by the great House that they represent.

So long as that method is maintained I shall raise my protest against it, and I wish to continue my endeavor to convince the Senate of the United States that good government demands that this policy shall be taken out of cold storage and submitted to the judgment of the representatives of the people. Unless the Senate conferees agree to a disagreement and a reference back to the conferees, I am compelled, so long as I remain true to my convictions, to exhaust everything I have to say by way of argument and persuasion with the Senate itself.

I was endeavoring to point out that the individual interests of numerous Senators, like the individual interests of numerous Representatives, lead them, of course, to view with apprehension the defeat of this measure, which contains appropriations intended for the benefit of their States and their districts. It is, therefore, all the more necessary for the advocates of a great national policy, represented in these amendments, to bring to the attention of the Senate convincing reasons why they should not allow their individual interests and the individual interests of their States or districts to overpower them in the consideration of a great question of national policy, concerning which public sentiment is made up unanimously and only Congress remains unconvinced.

Mr. President, I quoted the utterance of Woodrow Wilson. I referred to the report of Mr. Taft as Secretary of War, indorsing in every way, in the fullest details, this policy. I now refer to the report of the Secretary of Agriculture, Mr. James Wilson. I shall not read his entire report. It is under date of April 4, 1912. He says:

> I believe it will be necessary, eventually, for the Federal Government, or the Federal Government and the States, or in some cases each State individually, to work out a comprehensive system of saving flood waters—the surplus waters that run away in spring and winter and during flood times in summer. This can be done, as it has been done in other countries, by arranging for a system of reservoirs beginning near the head of streams and continuing the reservoirs down the streams until all the advantage is secured that can be had from confining the waters for use on the land in dry times. I think the entry upon the subject is timely and wise, and any cooperation this department can extend will be cheerfully given.

What services in the Department of Agriculture relate to this question? First, there is the Weather Bureau, which is engaged all the time in the study of the question of precipitation. What is the origin of all these destructive floods in the lower Mississippi and the lower Sacramento and the San Joaquin? Why, the water that falls from the heavens. That is the source of all the difficulty. That water falls, so far as the Mississippi is concerned, over 30 States.

If it falls in immense volumes within a short period of time it creates a flood, and that flood makes its way to the small-source streams, to the tributaries, and through the tributaries to the main river, and through the main river to the Gulf, a cause of anxiety, a cause of destruction everywhere. The amount of water which would naturally fall in a period of six weeks may do no harm at all, and yet, if its fall is concentrated within one week, it may prove an agency of the largest destruction.

We can not control the clouds in their output, or at all events, science has not yet discovered the method. The waters fall at their will as the result of a mysterious control which as yet we do not understand, and which our scientific men are studying every day. We can not control the fall, but the question is whether we can not control or mitigate the run-off. If the entire area of the Mississippi Valley were put in concrete one can imagine the rapidity of the run-off, and one can imagine how destructive that run-off would be to the entire Mississippi delta and to every State upon the banks of the Mississippi River.

I can imagine what the effect would be if the rapid run-off of the falling waters in the entire Mississippi Valley were concreted. Yet we have been steadily for years pursuing a course that provides increasing rapidity of the run-off. Nature itself has slowed down the floods through numerous intervening obstacles, forests, with the forest protection of leaf and moss and trees and porous soil absorbing the rain as it falls from the heavens and holding it in suspense, letting it out gradually into the tributaries, so that there is no violent flood. We have been destroying our forests. The great swamp-land areas constitute natural reservoirs in which the accumulated flood waters rest, making their way gradually to the main stream. In the upper reaches of these rivers we have been reclaiming these swamp lands, and we have been reclaiming them by increasing the rapidity of the run-off from them, thus increasing the momentum of the floods below.

Now, what does science propose to do under this system which the various parties have declared for and which is represented in this bill? Science will look to the protection of the forests.

We have already done it in a detached and unrelated way. We have determined to hold off the forest areas of the Appalachian and Allegheny Mountains and of the White Mountains, and we created a commission for their acquisition, a commission that is working in an entirely detached way from the Corps of Engineers of the Army and all the other services that relate to water. We quarantine these lands, making no study of the other scientific services of the country as to how they can best be utilized, not only for the development of timber but also for the protection of the channels of navigable rivers. This measure provides that that National Forest Commission shall enter into coordination with the Board of River Regulation, and shall do team work with the other related services.

The Forestry Service is in the Agricultural Department just as the other bureau is. Then we have another service in that department called the Bureau of Soils. It has problems that relate to our navigable rivers. One of the great objects of the Bureau of Soils is to conserve the soils themselves and prevent them from being washed into the rivers and thence into the bays and gulfs and oceans. We all know what erosion of soil means. The richest part of the soil is always the most friable, the most easily disturbed, and the most easily moved. That is characteristic of alluvial soil. The least beneficial portions of the soil are the portions that are hard, that resist the impact of the water, stone, clay, and so forth. So the Bureau of Soils has been engaged in the study of the effect of rapid run-off upon soils and soil erosion and the destruction of cultivable areas.

One thing that the bureau has pursued which has been of vast benefit has been the introduction of topographical plowing. Instead of permitting fields to be plowed, as they used to be plowed, in furrows oftentimes stretching up and down the hill, each furrow in itself a conduit for the carriage of alluvial soil into the tributaries of great rivers or the rivers themselves, they have introduced a system of topographical plowing, so that each furrow, instead of running up and down the hill, runs upon the same level around the hill. Each furrow in this way becomes an obstruction to soil erosion instead of a facilitation of the soil erosion, and not only as an obstruction of soil erosion, but, as the Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. OWEN] says to me, an obstruction of the floods themselves, for each furrow in that case becomes not a conduit for the waters that fall from the heavens but a reservoir of the waters that fall from the heavens.

That bureau is engaged in a study of all the questions which relate to plants and the amount of water they require. There are some plants that absorb a little water; there are some plants that absorb vast quantities of water; but all plants that absorb water can be so developed in their cultivation as to absorb large quantities of these flood waters and carry them through their arteries and veins and yield them again to the influence of the sun, by which agency they are dissipated. Thus they constitute an obstructive force in this constant flow of the floods from the hills and the farms into these great navigable areas below, where they become agencies of destruction.

Is not the cooperation of the Agricultural Department of value, then, in this great work, when it has three bureaus devoted in varying degree to the conservation of water and the development of water?

The scientific services that are under the control of the Department of Agriculture, whose specialties relate to the use of water, we propose shall cooperate in this policy, which has received the approval of all the parties of the country and which has the indorsement of public sentiment almost without an expression to the contrary, Congress alone voluntarily remaining unconvinced, or rather that portion of Congress constituting the House of Representatives, for the Senate has expressed itself by a unanimous vote.

Now, what does the Department of the Interior say, headed by Secretary Fisher? I will not read his entire report to the Committee on Commerce, but, referring to a bill introduced by myself known as Senate bill 122, he says:

> This bill is based upon two principles which have not been hitherto generally recognized in the construction of public works for river improvement. These principles are, first, that a river from its source to mouth, with all of its tributaries, is a unit in all its most important physical and functional characteristics.

I continue reading from the report of Secretary Fisher upon this bill. Relating to the river, he says:

> It should therefore be dealt with as a whole and not piecemeal, and in dealing with it for any single use, such as navigation, we should not lose sight of the other uses to which it can be put, such as water supply, irrigation, power, drainage, etc. River improvement should harmonize these uses, treating the river system as a unit for this purpose, and should provide for the cooperation of the Nation, States, and individuals to that end. The same principle applies, only in less degree, to the unification of all river systems into one comprehensive whole.

That is what they do in Germany and France. They not only treat the river streams in the most comprehensive way, but they connect them with each other by artificial canals, so that you can, through a system of connected waterways, go from one part of the country to almost every other part of the country.

The second principle—

Secretary Fisher says—

> The second principle is that this work of waterway improvement in its details should be guided and determined as an administrative and not as a legislative matter, and therefore that a large fund should be provided and replenished from time to time as may be necessary, this fund to be expended at the discretion of a competent administrative commission of experts without specific appropriations or limitations, except of a broad general character, by Congress. The proposed commission is to consist of the chiefs of the Federal bureaus whose duties are now concerned with specific phases of the problem, together with specially qualified experts to be appointed by the President.

He says:

> I am heartily in accord with these principles and believe that legislation embodying them should be enacted. I have not attempted, however, to criticize the bill in detail.

It will be observed that Secretary Fisher takes up the cudgels for the contention which I originally made in my additional report as a principle of the Inland Waterway Commission. He says that, in order to carry out this system adequately, it will be necessary to regard it as an administrative and not a legislative matter.

Secretary Fisher, in reporting upon the river regulation bill which I introduced in the Senate, indorses most emphatically the prosecution of teamwork on the part of the scientific services and teamwork on the part of the sovereignties affected; and he insists that all the details should be guided and determined as an administrative and not as a legislative matter, except as to the general details and authorization. He takes the view which I originally took in my report as a member of the Inland Waterways Commission, that in order to make this great work effective it must be consecutive, that it must be prosecuted with energy for at least 10 years, that a large fund of at least $50,000,000 annually must be provided, and that large and extensive powers should be given to a board of experts, both in plans and in works; in other words, that we should pursue the methods which we have pursued in the only two successful public works that ever have been conducted by the Government—the Panama Canal and the work of the Reclamation Service.

The next indorsement comes from the Secretary of War, Mr. Stimson, who, in a letter of January 27, 1913, gives his views, practically indorsing in all its details the policy to which I have referred. I shall not attempt to read the entire report, for it runs at some length, but will simply quote detached portions.

He says:

> Our conception, therefore, of what constitutes a navigable river and our appreciation of the various elements which enter into its development have been greatly widening. We see now that the problem of developing and preserving its navigability is no longer necessarily confined to removing obstructions in that part of the river in which navigation exists, but may extend to countless remote branches and sources of supply. We also see how the improvement of the river may be intimately connected with and dependent upon another development—that of water power—which formerly we may have regarded as a thing quite separate and apart.

He takes up the various uses to which the river can be put and shows that the development of all will diminish the proportionate cost of each, and that it is only by uniting the development of these various uses that we can secure the cheapest and most efficient promotion of navigation.

Mr. President, what bureaus have these two departments, the Interior Department and the War Department, that relate to water? The War Department has a Corps of Engineers of the United States Army, whose work thus far has been confined to channel improvement, bank protection, and levee building. In the Interior Department we have the Reclamation Service, whose work has been confined to the upper parts of our navigable rivers and branch streams, their work being in connection with the reclamation of arid lands. Then we have the question of water-power development, which, in a measure, has fallen under the jurisdiction of both these departments—the Interior and the War Department—the jurisdiction over water-power development in connection with irrigation having fallen under the control of the Reclamation Service and the jurisdiction over water-power development in connection with channel regulation having come within the jurisdiction of the War Department. Then we have in the Interior Department the great Geological Survey, which for years has been making a study of the waters of the country with a view not only to their development but to their conservation. The Geological Survey was the source and the origin of the Reclamation Service. It is still, under large appropriations given by the Government, conducting these studies. Yet we find that these various services which relate to the use of water, either the navigable rivers or their tributaries, have never been brought into relations of cooperation with each other, but, on the contrary, they view each other askance and oftentimes with jealousy, each guarding its jurisdiction against the invasion of the other.

What possible objection can there be to the union of all these services under a river-regulation board, with a view to the effective regulation of the river?

Mr. President, the Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. OWEN] desires the floor for the purpose of considering one branch of this question, and I will yield the floor to him for the time being.

PUBLIC BUILDINGS BILL.

During the delivery of Mr. NEWLANDS's speech,

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Will the Senator from Nevada yield to me to submit a conference report?

Mr. NEWLANDS. Certainly.

Mr. SUTHERLAND submitted the following report:

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 28766) to increase the limit of cost of certain public buildings, to authorize the enlargement, extension, remodeling, or improvement of certain public buildings, to authorize the erection and completion of public buildings, to authorize the purchase of sites for public buildings, and for other purposes, having met and conferred, have been unable to agree.

J. G. ANDRUS,

Mr. SUTHERLAND. I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Fifty-five Senators have answered to their names. A quorum of the Senate is present.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. I should like to make a very brief statement with reference to the report of the conferees on the public buildings bill, which has just been read by the Secretary.

Mr. NEWLANDS. Does the Senator desire to bring up the report now?

Mr. SUTHERLAND. I wish to make a statement about it. The report does not explain itself.

Mr. NEWLANDS. I have no objection provided it does not disturb my status as having the floor.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. I will say to the Senator from Nevada that the matter which I presented to the Senate is a report from the conferees upon the public buildings bill; that they are unable to agree, and the whole matter is at a standstill until there shall be some further action on the part of the Senate and upon the part of the House. I desire to make a brief statement as to the condition. I shall be as brief as possible.

Mr. NEWLANDS. I have no objection, Mr. President, provided it does not disturb my status.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It does not interfere with the Senator's status at all.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. The conferees have been endeavoring to reach an agreement upon this bill since they were appointed yesterday morning. We have reached an agreement upon several of the items of the bill. A very large portion of the bill has not yet been considered, because we found that there were certain vital differences between the conferees on the part of the Senate and the House which it seemed to be impossible to reconcile.

After discussing the disputed items for the length of time I have indicated, the House conferees have practically served us with an ultimatum to the effect that under no circumstances will they agree to the five items in the bill which I will mention, and that, so far as those items are concerned, it is useless to attempt to confer further. I asked whether or not it would be possible to agree upon any one of them if the others were abandoned. The reply was that they would not agree to a single one of those five items. Those items are No. 217, which is the item for the building of the armory in the District of Columbia, making an authorization of $1,750,000; another is the memorial bridge, carrying an authorization of $1,500,000; another is the Rock Creek Park addition, carrying an authorization of $2,300,000. The fourth is the New York item carrying an authorization of $3,000,000 for a courthouse in the city of New York, and the remaining item is the provision for the erection of the Red Cross building. The proposition with reference to the Red Cross building is somewhat different from the other four. Upon the other four we are told emphatically that no modification of any one of those items can be agreed to. With reference to the Red Cross building, we are told that unless we agree to modify it substantially in accordance with the motion of the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. WILLIAMS] that that item will be considered out of question. If these five items should be abandoned, then there would be a probability of the conferees agreeing upon the remainder of the bill, although, as I said, it has not been agreed upon.

There are several other items in the bill which are in serious dispute. For example, there are two items for Oklahoma—Oklahoma City and Tulsa—quite large items, that are in rather serious dispute. An item for Newport, R. I., is in serious dispute; an item for Huntington, W. Va., is in dispute; an item for Brooklyn, N. Y., is in serious dispute, and there are some others. The item for the Portland post office is in dispute. The Senator from Kansas [Mr. BRISTOW] asks me about the Kern amendment. The Kern amendment has not been very seriously discussed as yet, but it is my impression that it will be insisted that the Kern amendment shall be modified—just to what extent I am not able at this moment to state, but that has not been discussed to any great extent.

Mr. NEWLANDS. Mr. President, I should like to ask the Senator from Utah about the amendment which I offered and which was placed upon the bill, providing for a commission to present to Congress a connected scheme of buildings with the aid of the Commission of Fine Arts and the Supervising Architect of the Treasury.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. That item has not been discussed, except very briefly; and I think that we may be able to agree upon it, or the substance of it, although I would not like to say positively, because there has been no definite expression of views upon it. As to the five items that I have described that are in serious dispute——

Mr. NEWLANDS. I say to the Senator from Utah that I hope the Senate conferees will press that amendment, for upon it, I think, will largely depend the perfection of our system of building in the future. It will not affect any pending appropriation, of course, but it simply looks to a proper systematizing of the building operations of the country in the future.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Mr. President, I am quite in sympathy with the amendment which was proposed by the Senator from Nevada, and, so far as I am concerned, I shall do whatever is possible to retain it in the bill, if the bill shall go back for further conference.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. Mr. President, will the Senator from Utah yield for a question?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Utah yield to the Senator from Arizona?

Mr. SUTHERLAND. I do.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. I want to know whether it is customary to put provisions for the construction of bridges and the location of parks in a public-buildings bill; whether or not the Senate conferees can not recede from such items as are entirely out of the contemplation of public buildings which the committee on that particular subject has usually under its consideration? It seems to me, in a word, inasmuch as these items are out of the purview of this bill, and they are the real bone of contention, that the remainder of the bill might be agreed upon by consenting to leave those items out. I presume the Senator from Utah is submitting the matter to the Senate so that the Senate may assume the responsibility. For myself, as one Senator, I should be very glad to eliminate from this bill items not clearly within the provisions of a public-buildings bill in order to secure an agreement by the conferees.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Mr. President, the committee to which the Senator refers is a Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds, and I think there is not the slightest doubt that these various matters are within the jurisdiction of that committee. They have heretofore been treated as being within its jurisdiction, and the various bills which were incorporated in the omnibus buildings bill were all referred to that committee. Therefore we are well within our jurisdiction in dealing with them.

Personally I regard some of the disputed items as the most important items in the bill. For example, the park item I think is of vital necessity. I think if we do not provide for the purchase of that land at this time it will finally cost us a vastly increased sum of money. I think it is the part of economy and wisdom to provide for the purchase of the necessary land for that park. I regard that as the most important of the five items. We can, of course, hereafter build a bridge or erect a building, but this ground can not be obtained somewhere else. It must be this particular ground, and it is going to continue to advance in value. It is false economy, in my judgment, to undertake to put that matter over until some future time.

I have, however, brought the matter up because the conferees on the part of the Senate did not want to take the responsibility of having the bill fail without an expression from the Senate. If the Senate desires that these five items shall be eliminated and the conference proceed, the Senate conferees will act in accordance with that desire. If the Senate, however, feels that we have done all that we can and that we ought to insist on these items or let the bill fail, then I should like to have an expression to that effect.

Mr. McCUMBER. Will the Senator repeat the five items? Some of us were not in when he made the statement in reference to them.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. The five items are the District armory, the memorial bridge, the Rock Creek Park, the New York customhouse site, $3,000,000, and the Red Cross item. With reference to the Red Cross item I stated that the conferees on the part of the House insist that that item shall be amended in accordance with the amendment proposed by the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. WILLIAMS], and that unless it is amended substantially in accordance with that amendment all conference upon that item is at an end, and they put to us emphatically, so that the Senate may act understandingly, that they will no longer confer about any one of those five items. So there is no use of sending those back to conference.

Mr. President, I should like, if possible, to have some expression from the Senate upon this situation as to what ought to be done.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the conference report, unless some motion shall be made.

Mr. LODGE. I was out when the report was submitted. What is the conference report?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The conferees report a disagreement.

Mr. LODGE. And we can accept the report and appoint new conferees?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That would be the orderly procedure.

Mr. KENYON. Mr. President, I want to ask the Senator from Utah—I came in just at the close of his remarks—in reference to the amendment offered by the Senator from Indiana [Mr. KERN].

Mr. SUTHERLAND. I stated that that amendment has not been very seriously discussed. It has been talked about, and, if I am able to judge of the situation, the House conferees will probably accept it with a modification; but I do not know. We might be able to keep it as it is; but I rather think that, if we go back to conference, we shall be obliged to agree to a modification of it.

Mr. KENYON. I understood that the Senator had stated a number of propositions. I did not understand whether or not that was included among them.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. That was not included; but I spoke about that in answer to a question of the Senator from Kansas [Mr. BRISTOW].

Mr. SHEPPARD. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Utah yield to the Senator from Texas?

Mr. SUTHERLAND. I do.

Mr. SHEPPARD. Would a motion be in order to recede from the position taken by the Senate?

Mr. SUTHERLAND. That is a parliamentary inquiry which I suppose should be addressed to the Chair.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The motion undoubtedly would be in order to recede from any items in the bill.

Mr. SHEPPARD. As I understood, the Senator from Utah has asked that some action be taken in this matter. To get the matter before the Senate, I move that the Senate recede from those five items. I think the Senate might well recede from those items, because it has never been customary heretofore for the Senate to add more than five or six million dollars to a public buildings bill as it came from the other House. This time, however, the Senate broke all precedents by adding $19,000,000 to the bill; and it would be in accord with the precedents of the Senate, and the practice adopted heretofore, if the Senate should recede from those large items and let the bill go through providing for the erection of public buildings throughout the country.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. The Senator from Texas is not quite accurate in his figures. The bill as reported by the Senate committee carried items amounting to more than $19,000,000—a little less than $20,000,000—but $3,500,000 was eliminated upon the floor of the Senate. So the bill as it passed carried an addition of about $16,500,000.

Mr. SHEPPARD. Admitting that only $16,000,000 was added, the amount is still far beyond what has heretofore been added by the Senate. It is not customary for the Senate almost to double the amounts carried by the other appropriation bills which come over from the House.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. It is customary for the Senate to do what it thinks is right to be done, whether or not it adds largely to the appropriations in a bill, and the Senate committee reported these items because it believed that appropriations in those cases were justified.

Mr. SHEPPARD. I understand that.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. And when the bill comes into the Senate it is as much within the province of the Senate to amend it materially as it is within the province of the House to originate it.

Mr. SHEPPARD. I understand that fully, and I do not mean to make any reflection upon the Senate committee for the action it took. I am merely referring to the practice that has been heretofore followed in such matters.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, I have no objection to the acceptance of the report and to the Senate insisting further upon its amendments and asking for a further conference; but I think perhaps it will save time if I say, for myself, that I think by all odds the most important item in that bill is the item for the park, which I consider of the utmost importance to the city of Washington, a great public matter, and if that is to be thrown from the bill we might as well understand now, as at any time, that the bill will not pass.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Mr. President, I was not on the floor when the Senator from Utah [Mr. SUTHERLAND] made the first part of his statement, and so I desire to inquire of him whether he has been informed, in substance, by the members of the conference committee on the part of the House that in no event will they agree to any one of the five items which he has enumerated?

Mr. SUTHERLAND. The House conferees informed us, with the utmost politeness, but with the utmost positiveness, that they would under no circumstances agree to either one of these five items—the Red Cross item in the way in which I have described it and the others under no possible modification of language.

Mr. O'GORMAN. Mr. President, when the public buildings bill was up for consideration in this body, I made some observations respecting its various objectionable features. One of its redeeming provisions was the authorization of an appropriation of $3,000,000 for procuring a site for a much-needed Federal court building in the city of New York. If that provision be eliminated from the present bill, I have not sufficient appreciation of any of the remaining provisions to justify me in giving it either countenance or support, and I think if it is the desire of the House to prevent the passage of a public buildings bill, the course most likely to lead to that result would be the one embodied in the motion just made by the Senator from Texas [Mr. SHEPPARD]. In other words, if the most commendable features of this bill are to be stricken out in conference, some other session of this body will be devoted to the consideration of a public buildings bill. I would not be very confident of any such bill passing during the remaining hours of this session.

Mr. SWANSON. Mr. President, it seems to me the wise course to pursue, in view of this difference between the Senate and the House, is to send this bill back to the conference committee. The five items referred to by the Senator from Utah need not be acted upon at this time, but let those items continue the subject of conference, and let the conferees agree to all the other items upon which they can agree. After they reach an agreement on everything except these four or five items, then they can report on what they have agreed to and the House and the Senate can very properly vote on the items that may remain in difference. It seems to me the proper thing to do would be to send the bill back to conference and request, not by any resolution, that the conferees agree on every item between the House and the Senate so far as they can, and then, if they can not agree on any of the five items with a modification, report back such partial agreement as they may have been able to reach.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. The Senator from Virginia may not have been in the Chamber when I made my statement.

Mr. SWANSON. I was not.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. I stated, and I repeat, that with reference to these five items we are notified emphatically by the House conferees that they will not confer further; that we must yield every one of those five items or the conference might as well be closed now. That is the situation.

Mr. SWANSON. My suggestion was——

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Let me say further that, in addition to that, we discussed with the House conferees the advisability of going over the bill with a view to finding what we could agree upon; but they thought it was a waste of time to do that, unless it were known that those five items were to be abandoned, and that if those five items were not to be abandoned, any effort to agree upon the other items would be useless, because a failure to agree upon those would put an end to the bill. I said that if those five items were eliminated from the bill there was a probability that we would agree upon the other items. I put it in that way because it is not certain that even then we would agree, but I think it is strongly probable that we would reach an agreement.

Mr. SWANSON. My suggestion was to let the conference continue and ascertain if the conferees can not agree on everything else but these five items. If they agree on everything but these five items, then a report could be made to the House, and the Senate and the House or the Senate, as the case might be, could recede from its action on these five items.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, will the Senator from Virginia yield to me?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Virginia yield to the Senator from North Dakota?

Mr. SWANSON. Certainly.

Mr. McCUMBER. If I understood the statement of the Senator from Utah correctly, the conferees on the part of the House have adopted a rather novel method of arriving at a determination of what to do with this bill, namely, that they will not consider any of the other items until these five items have first been stricken out. That seems to be the position. I do not know that the Senator from Utah put it quite so strong as that, but that seems to be the only conclusion I can reach from his words. I should like to have him explain if that is what he meant.

Mr. SWANSON. I understood the Senator from Utah to say it was useless to proceed to the other items unless the five items he named were abandoned.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. The House conferees thought it would be a waste of time to undertake to agree upon the remaining part of the bill so long as the Senate conferees would not agree to the elimination of those five items.

Mr. SWANSON. Mr. President, I believe we would facilitate an agreement and finally get a public buildings bill if we would send this matter back to conference and insist on our amendments, with the suggestion to the conferees to reach an agreement on every possible item of the bill upon which they can agree, and if it is found to be utterly impossible for these five items to be agreed upon, then, when everything else is agreed upon, to submit their partial report to the Senate and the House for action.

Mr. ROOT. Mr. President, I consider that some of the items which were put into the public buildings bill by the Senate constitute the chief reason for the passage of the bill. They are items in which all the people of the United States are interested, and I am not willing to have them jettisoned and the bill passed with nothing in it but items in which particular individuals are interested. It seems to me that the Senate should insist upon its amendments; and I think it is safe to say that, unless a sufficient number of the items included in the ultimatum remain in the bill to make it legislation of general public interest, there is no reasonable possibility of the bill becoming a law at this session of Congress. Upon that basis it will not become a law, if it is within my power, acting in accordance with the rules and proprieties of the Senate, to prevent it.

Mr. BRISTOW. Mr. President, I want to concur in what the Senator from New York [Mr. ROOT] has just said. I would feel it a duty to do everything that I could to prevent the passage of a public buildings bill that was simply a kind of a grab game on the part of a certain number of Representatives and Senators to get public buildings in their home towns or in towns scattered throughout their own States or districts, and, in many cases, buildings which are not needed and which we are not justified in expending the public money to erect. To divest this bill of all of the important national projects which are under consideration and make it purely a bill for lending provender would be putting it in such shape that I believe every Senator ought to do what he could to prevent its passage.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The pending question is on the motion of the Senator from Texas [Mr. SHEPPARD] to recede from certain amendments covering a number of items of the bill.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Mr. President, I suppose the motion of the Senator from Texas takes precedence of a motion to insist on the amendments and ask for a further conference, which I was about to make. I had forgotten that the Senator from Texas had made his motion. It seems to me, in a matter of this importance, inasmuch as the body of the bill has not been considered at all, apparently, but only the five items mentioned by the Senator from Utah, which are in dispute, that it would be well to have some further conference with the conferees on the part of the House before the Senate abandons everything that it has put on the bill.

Mr. SHEPPARD. Mr. President, I understand that the House conferees will not confer further unless we recede from those five items.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I hardly understood that. I should doubt if the House conferees would decline to confer with the members of the conference committee on the part of the Senate unless their condition precedent were complied with. I really think there may be some ground for a compromise in the matter. At least I think we ought to try to bring about some adjustment. I had intended to make the motion that the Senate insist upon its amendments, ask for a further conference, and that the Chair appoint the conferees; but, of course, I realize that the motion of the Senator from Texas will have to be put first.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator is wrong about that.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I am glad that I am.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. According to Jefferson's Manual the Senator's motion takes precedence over a motion to recede.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Very well; then I make that motion.

Mr. SHEPPARD. I withdraw my motion for the present.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Texas withdraws his motion. Before the motion of the Senator from Connecticut can be put the conference report will first have to be agreed to. The question is on agreeing to the conference report.

The report was agreed to.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I now renew my motion.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Connecticut moves that the Senate insist upon its amendments in disagreement, ask for a further conference with the House of Representatives, and that the Chair appoint the conferees on the part of the Senate.

The motion was agreed to; and Mr. SUTHERLAND, Mr. WARREN, and Mr. CULBERSON were appointed conferees on the part of the Senate.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 37, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the matter proposed to be inserted by said amendment, insert the following:

MILITARY ACADEMY APPROPRIATION BILL.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate the action of the House of Representatives disagreeing to the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 28690) making appropriation for the Military Academy for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1914, and requesting a conference with the Senate on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon.

Mr. DU PONT. I move that the Senate insist upon its amendments and agree to the conference asked for by the House, the conferees on the part of the Senate to be appointed by the Chair.

The motion was agreed to; and the President pro tempore appointed Mr. DU PONT, Mr. DIXON, and Mr. JOHNSTON of Alabama conferees on the part of the Senate.

HOUSE BILL REFERRED.

H. R. 28632. An act to authorize the construction of a bridge across Twelve Mile Bayou in Caddo Parish, La., was read twice by its title and referred to the Committee on Commerce.

RIVER AND HARBOR BILL.

After the conclusion of Mr. NEWLANDS's speech,

The Senate resumed the consideration of the conference report on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses upon the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 28180) making appropriations for the construction, repair, and preservation of certain public works on rivers and harbors, and for other purposes.

Mr. OWEN. Mr. President, this bill appropriates a very large sum, of which the citizens in Oklahoma will contribute nearly——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. On the call of the roll 53 Senators have answered to their names. A quorum of the Senate is present.

Mr. OWEN. Mr. President, for five or six years the Senator from Nevada [Mr. NEWLANDS] has been trying to have taken the preliminary steps by which expenditures for river and harbor improvements might be judiciously made, under some system of government that would have an intelligent direction to it. He has received a poor recognition for the work he has done in bringing this matter to the attention of the Senate. He has explained it time and again. The proposal has great merit. When these two items were presented they were placed upon this bill by a vote of the Senate that was unanimous, so far as the RECORD shows, and, I believe, were acceptable to a large majority of the Senate; but when the matter went into conference the conferees of the Senate do not appear to have been able to get even a partial recognition for the submission of these two proposals to the House of Representatives, where, if they had been presented, they ought to have received the majority vote of the House and have become a part of the law of the land.

I do not intend to be put in the attitude of consuming the time of the Senate unduly with regard to this matter. My remarks upon it will be very brief, so that the Senate, as far as I am concerned, may proceed, if it desires to do so, to vote upon this conference report. But I wish to put in the RECORD, without reading them, the declarations of the Democratic platform, of the Republican platform, and of the Progressive Party platform, showing that all three parties in this Nation have committed themselves to an orderly, systematic development of the waterways. Yet the conferees on the part of the Senate have not insisted on the only proposal in this bill by which the public pledges of the Republican Party, of the Progressive Party, and of the Democratic Party might be made effective.

I do not wonder that the Senator from Nevada feels that he has not been justly treated or fairly considered. He has a right to object, I think, to this method of brushing aside a serious proposal made by him in accordance with the Democratic platform, in accordance with the Progressive platform, and in accordance with the meaning of the Republican platform. Why is it that Senators apparently pay no attention to these pledges of party platforms?

Oklahoma contributes about a million dollars to this bill. The taxpayers of Oklahoma will pay about a million dollars of the money carried by it. The Committee on Commerce and the committees of the House have ignored the fact that Oklahoma has any navigable streams. That, of course, is a small matter. The real complaint which a representative from Oklahoma may properly make is not the local neglect; and I must not be understood as objecting to this bill on that ground, although the State has a stream that could easily provide 6 feet of water from Oklahoma into tidewater. That stream is not considered. It has not been considered, but has been ignored year after year, and will be ignored until a new policy prevails in the United States, by which the general welfare shall control these enormous expenditures carried by the rivers and harbors bill.

As it is, the general welfare is considered in some cases. In some cases it is the local welfare exclusively. The people who comprise the tax-paying masses of the United States have a right to complain when money is taken out of their hard labor and is diverted by this bill to local purposes, which have no national interest, no national concern.

I think the proposal made by the Senator from Nevada is one of great merit. I think it ought to be considered. I think it ought to be made a part of the law. I do not mean to pass upon the details of it with any precision, but I am talking of the spirit of it. I think we should have a system by which there would be an intelligent direction, for national purposes and for the general welfare, of the expenditure of the millions of dollars which are carried by this bill.

Mr. President, I know the time is very short, and I do not desire to be put in the attitude of attempting to defeat this bill by making any comments upon it. There were other observations I had intended to make; but I will undertake to postpone what I was going to say until a more convenient season, when it will not appear, at least, to be an obstruction to the consideration of the conference report by the Senate. Therefore I will yield the floor.

As previously stated, I ask to have printed as part of my remarks the declarations on this subject of the Republican platform, the Democratic platform, and the Progressive Party platform.

There being no objection, the matter was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[Declarations of the platforms of the Democratic, Republican, and Progressive Parties in 1912 relative to the improvement of the waterways.]

DEMOCRATIC PLATFORM.

We renew the declaration of our last platform relating to the conservation of our national resources and the development of our waterways. The present devastation of the lower Mississippi Valley accentuates the movement for the regulation of river flow by additional levee and bank protection below, and the diversion, storage, and control of the flood waters above, and their utilization for beneficial purposes in the reclamation of arid and swamp lands and the development of water power, instead of permitting the floods to continue, as heretofore, agents of destruction. We hold that the control of the Mississippi River is a national problem. The preservation of the depth of its water for the purpose of navigation, the building of levees to maintain the integrity of its channel and the prevention of the overflow of the land, and its consequent devastation, resulting in the interruption of interstate commerce, the disorganization of the mail service, and the enormous loss of life and property, impose an obligation which alone can be discharged by the General Government.

To maintain an adequate depth of water the entire year and thereby encourage water transportation is a consummation worthy of legislative attention and presents an issue national in its character. It calls for prompt action on the part of Congress, and the Democratic Party pledges itself to the enactment of legislation leading to that end.

We favor the cooperation of the United States and the respective States in plans for the comprehensive treatment of all waterways with a view of coordinating plans for channel improvement with plans for drainage of swamp and overflowed lands, and to this end we favor the appropriation by the Federal Government of sufficient funds to make surveys of such lands, to develop plans for draining the same, and to supervise the work of construction.

We favor the adoption of a liberal and comprehensive plan for the development and improvement of our inland waterways with economy and efficiency, so as to permit their navigation by vessels of standard draft.

REPUBLICAN PLATFORM.

The Mississippi River is the Nation's drainage ditch. Its flood waters, gathered from 31 States and the Dominion of Canada, constitute an overpowering force which breaks the levees and pours its torrents over many million acres of the richest land in the Union, stopping mails, impeding commerce, and causing great loss of life and property. These floods are national in scope, and the disasters they produce seriously affect the general welfare. The States unaided can not cope with this giant problem; hence we believe the Federal Government should assume a fair proportion of the burden of its control, so as to prevent the disasters from recurring floods.

* * * * * * *

We favor a liberal and systematic policy for the improvement of our rivers and harbors. Such improvement has been made upon expert information and after a careful comparison of cost and prospective benefits.

PROGRESSIVE PARTY PLATFORM.

The rivers of the United States are the natural arteries of this continent. We demand that they shall be opened to traffic as indispensable parts of a great nation-wide system of transportation in which the Panama Canal will be the central link, thus enabling the whole interior of the United States to share with the Atlantic and Pacific seaboards in the benefit derived from the canals. It is a national obligation to develop our rivers, and especially the Mississippi and its tributaries, without delay under a comprehensive general plan covering each river system from its source to its mouth, designed to secure its highest usefulness for navigation, irrigation, domestic supply, water power, and the prevention of floods. We pledge our party to the immediate preparation of such a plan, which should be made and carried out in close and friendly cooperation between the Nation, the States, and the cities affected. Under such a plan the destructive floods of the Mississippi and other streams which represent a vast and needless loss to the Nation would be controlled by forest conservation and water storage at the headwaters and by levees below, land sufficient to support millions of people will be reclaimed from the deserts and the swamps, water power enough to transform the industrial standings of whole States would be developed, adequate water terminals would be provided, transportation by river would revive, and the railroads would be compelled to cooperate as freely with the boat lines as with each other. The equipment, organization, and experience acquired in constructing the Panama Canal soon will be available for the Lakes-to-the-Gulf deep waterways and other portions of this great work, and should be utilized by the Nation in cooperation with the various States at the lowest net cost to the people.

Mr. BRISTOW. Mr. President, the river and harbor bill, as presented by the conferees, has had omitted from it the items in which I was most interested, and I do not think it should pass.

I do not think the item relating to the dam at St. Paul and Minneapolis should have been eliminated. I appreciate that the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. NELSON] made a personal sacrifice when he eliminated that item. I am very sorry he did it, because I believe it embodies a principle of legislation which the Nation should recognize. The amendment of the Senator from Nevada [Mr. NEWLANDS] that was taken out was, in my judgment, the most important provision in the bill.

The river and harbor bill as reported by the conferees is a good deal like a public buildings bill. It seems to be a series of appropriations organized for the purpose of passing a bill.

The section of the country that is most interested in this legislation is the lower valley of the Mississippi River, and very earnest appeals are made in behalf of appropriations for that river. The appropriations are made under the guise of appropriations for the improvement of its navigation, when the navigation of the Mississippi River under the present system will not benefit the country so much in dollars and cents as the appropriations amount to. The real purpose of the appropriation is to protect from floods the people living along the river. It is a flood-prevention appropriation in the main.

I do not believe the Federal Government has any more right or authority to appropriate money for building levees on the Mississippi River to prevent its overflow than it has to make an appropriation for the purpose of putting water on the land of the semiarid regions The people living upon the vast plains east of the Rocky Mountains, in the semiarid region, have just as much right to ask the Federal Government to appropriate money directly out of the Treasury for the purpose of putting water on that land as the people of the Mississippi Valley have to ask the Federal Government to appropriate money to keep the water off of their land.

The amendment offered by the Senator from Nevada seeks to unite these two interests and to put the supervision of these waters under a commission that will consider, in the main, three things: First, the prevention of floods by the holding back of the flood waters; second, to use the waters held back in the region where water is needed to make the soil productive; and third, to use the water that is conserved for the purpose of making the rivers more navigable.

The amendment of the Senator from Nevada, covering these three features of the question, is, by all odds, to my mind, the most important part of this bill.

PENSION APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. McCUMBER submitted the following report:

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 28730) making appropriations for the payment of invalid and other pensions of the United States for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1914, and for other purposes, having met, after full and free conference have agreed to recommend and do recommend to their respective Houses as follows:

That the Senate recede from its amendment.

P. J. McCUMBER,
B. F. SHIVELY,
HENRY E. BURNHAM,
Managers on the part of the Senate.

C. L. BARTLETT,
W. P. BORLAND,
JAMES W. GOOD,
Managers on the part of the House.

The report was agreed to.

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

Mr. LODGE. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to, and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business. After 2 hours and 15 minutes spent in executive session the doors were reopened.

DEFICIENCY APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. WARREN. From the Committee on Appropriations I report back favorably with amendments the bill (H. R. 28858) making appropriations to supply deficiencies in appropriations for the fiscal year 1913 and for prior years, and for other purposes, and I submit a report (No. 1336) thereon. I give notice that I will ask the Senate to take up the bill for consideration this evening.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be placed on the calendar.

EXTRA COMPENSATION FOR SENATE EMPLOYEES.

Mr. WARREN. Mr. President, the matter on which I am about to report affects 15 or 20 Senators, and I hope I may have attention.

The Committee on Appropriations herewith report back certain amendments, providing for certain extra payments to certain employees, and recommend that these twenty-odd amendments and the subject matter be referred to the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate.

I wish to say, in this connection, that I hope the committee will act promptly. So much of the payments as they may authorize will come out of the contingent fund of the Senate.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendments will be referred to the Committee on Contingent Expenses.

MEMORIAL ADDRESSES ON THE LATE SENATOR WELDON B. HEYBURN.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, I offer the resolutions which I send to the desk, and ask for their adoption.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. PAGE in the chair). The Senator from Idaho offers resolutions, which the Secretary will read.

The resolutions (S. Res. 489) were read, considered by unanimous consent, and unanimously agreed to, as follows:

Resolved, That the Senate has heard with profound sorrow of the death of Hon. WELDON BRINTON HEYBURN, late a Senator from the State of Idaho.

Resolved, That as a mark of respect to the memory of the deceased the business of the Senate be now suspended to enable his associates to pay proper tribute to his high character and distinguished public services.

Resolved, That the Secretary communicate these resolutions to the House of Representatives and transmit a copy thereof to the family of the deceased.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, the time during which we are permitted to detain the Senate will not allow even a brief outline of the active and crowded career of our late colleague. We can do no more than pay the brief but sincere tribute of friends and pass on to the duties which crowd upon us in the closing hours of the session. In less hurried hours some one will render a full and true estimate of his work and seek to give adequate honor and praise for his public services. When time shall have revealed more fully the value of his efforts here and disclosed with finer perspective the sturdy outlines of his strong and dominant character, a more dispassionate yet truer measure will be taken and he will assume the place to which he is justly entitled among the virile and forceful figures of the Senate.

We are most impressed now with the thought that he was stricken while yet in the zenith of his intellectual powers and at a time when his lips still held the language of conflict, when his hopes were still high and his ambitions aroused for greater work. While those who watched him here day after day marked his physical decline, he proudly ignored the insidious encroachment of the persistent malady and fell at a time when he was merely waiting to take up again his work and when his whole intellectual being was tense and ready for the obligations resting upon all who serve here. While the unannounced messenger was waiting about to call him he was planning and thinking of work far ahead and anxiously surveying the future for duties yet to be met and faithfully discharged. While eager and braced for the things which ought to be done, and which we are fitted to do, the summons comes. "Behold, He taketh away, who can hinder Him."

Born in comparatively humble station, surrounded from birth by the influences and environments of a devout and cultured home, reared amid the plainness and excellence of that old Quaker family life, the sanctity and simplicity of which no language can unduly praise, he started upon his career dowered with the most valuable of all estates—a character open, candid, and sturdy, a mind original and independent, and, above all, a broad, wholesome conception of the true relations and responsibilities of life, inculcated nowhere so well as in that school over which presides a devoted and God-fearing mother. No one had a more beautiful conception of home life, a truer, kindlier, broader view of all things which make for its happiness and worth. These views and ideals were among the noble inheritances from his boyhood days.

He had an individuality peculiar and surprising. His mental traits were exceptional. The dominant features of his character were energy, industry, and courage. He was one of the hard-working men of this body, strong in debate, faithful and efficient in the less attractive but more effective work of the committee. We shall seldom witness a more complete sacrifice of comfort and health, a more pointed and direct sacrifice of life to public duties than we witnessed upon his part for the last several years of his service. All understood this, but if the thought ever occurred to him that he was making such a sacrifice he made no mention of it to his colleagues or his friends. Faithfully, untiringly, efficiently he did his full duty and met every demand of this arduous service, even until the last hour.

I can not review here the vast work of Senator HEYBURN as a legislator. There was no measure in which he did not take an interest. His activities covered the whole field of legislation. His knowledge of details, the status, terms, and provisions of all measures was tremendous. But it is probable that the one legislative measure with which his name will be most conspicuously associated is that of the pure-food law. It was a most difficult measure to bring into effective form and it was an extraordinary task to secure its passage through Congress. There was and there had been for years a strong opposition to it. But with tireless effort and exceptional determination he whipped a great principle into a practicable, workable measure, and finally secured its enactment into law. It is a monumental piece of work. Its benefit and general good can hardly be overestimated. It is a lasting tribute to his efficiency, energy, and courage as a legislator. It has already been of incalculable benefit to the country and will continue to be a widespreading and permanent blessing to mankind. It is that kind of a monument to public service which time will not destroy nor gratitude soon forget. The State of Idaho takes great pride in his work for this great and beneficent measure.

Mr. President, Addison, the essayist, tells us in his rich, rare old way that once, while visiting a famous art gallery, he observed while there an old man creeping up and down, here and there, from one painting to another, retouching one and all with inimitable skill. So slight was the touch that it seemed scarcely to leave an effect. Continuously and incessantly he labored until through ceaseless effort he wore off every disagreeable gloss, added to all a deeper, richer hue, an infinite mellowness and charm, until all the paintings seemed more beautiful than when they came from the hands of the masters. The old man was Father Time. Standing near to a life that is closed, there appears in spite of all some of that roughness and harshness born of severe and earnest battle. But time smooths off the rough edges, harmonizes and mellows until the tempestuous struggle becomes at last a splendid and heroic poem of passion and duty. The difference of view, the conflict of opinion, the harsh clash of convictions will fade and forever disappear, and our late colleague will be remembered by one and all as an earnest, loyal, gifted, heroic man.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, the seventeenth century among the English-speaking people was a period of profound unrest, both in politics and in religion. It brought in its train a great civil war, the Puritan migration to America, and a spirit of religious revolt which left no creed unexamined, no forms and ceremonies, however hallowed by time and association, unquestioned, and which engendered innumerable sects. England and Scotland had broken from Rome a century before at the time of the Reformation. They had escaped the wars of religion which had rent France asunder, and the Thirty Years' War which had devastated and ruined Germany. The religious movement in seventeenth-century England entered upon a new field; it set Protestant against Protestant; it struck at the ecclesiastical hierarchy, assailed the union of church and state, drove some men back to the ancient faith of their ancestors, and at the other extreme found expression in dangerous fighting fanatics like the Fifth Monarchy Men.

Among the sects which then sprang into life was one which at its birth was regarded by the members of the powerful and dominant churches as among the worst examples of uncurbed fanaticism. Its founder was a laboring man, so ignorant that he could not express himself clearly when he wrote his own language, so energetic and with such strength of conviction that as he wandered over England with his immovable hat and leather breeches he gathered followers in every town and hamlet. So strange, so violent, so effective was he that even Roger Williams, the apostle of freedom of conscience, could not abide the doctrines of George Fox. The Old World and the New World alike beheld with horror the disciples of this strange teacher rushing naked through the streets and into churches, breaking glass and crying out that it was done as a sign to a perverse generation. Under the guidance of Barclay and Penn the extravagances were softened and gradually a sect emerged which, by its numbers and character, played an important part both in England and in America. Stripped of the external and unessential peculiarities like the refusal to remove the hat, the misuse of the pronoun of the second person singular, and the like, it became perceptible even then, as it is very apparent now, that these people, called Friends among themselves and Quakers by a deriding world, stood for a great and noble principle and cherished a very simple and beautiful faith. They held that all men were equal in the sight of God, that every man was a priest and every woman a priestess when they approached the throne of the Most High, and that no ceremonies or titles conferred by human beings could invest anyone with the right to stand between man and his Maker. Their faith was very pure, very austere, very spiritual, possibly too bright and good for human nature's daily food. Perhaps it is for this reason that the sect has diminished in numbers; perhaps it is because their work, a very great work, has been done. But the conception of a free church in a free State, first established in Pennsylvania, now common to the United States, and at last making its way in Europe, is a monument to the doctrines of the Friends which will neither fade nor pass away. As the years went on the Quakers, as they were usually called, rose steadily in importance and in public estimation. The sobriety of their conduct and manners, their diligence and success in business, the purity and honesty of their daily lives, their love of peace, their steady opposition to slavery and to oppression, and their charity ever open armed to the poor and downtrodden, won the respect and admiraton of every community where their modest meetinghouses were seen.

But behind the fair and pleasant exterior, behind the place which they had won for themselves, lay the qualities of character upon which the whole structure rested. The very existence of the sect implied mental and moral qualities of unusual force. At the outset they had continually to face contumely, opprobrium, and a persecution reaching to scourgings, prison, and death. They were in opposition to the world and the world's ways, and became indifferent to the censure of a hostile public opinion. They were bound by their tenets to nonresistance and for them were necessary the fortitude and courage which meet the scorn of society, physical suffering, and even death, not with blood warmed by the heady currents of the fight, but cold, unstirred and chilled by the ridicule and the contempt too often felt for those who will not fight or return blow for blow.

They had only one guide, their own conscience; only one monitor, the inner voice, which told them what was right. Strong men and women these, and, like the strongly marked everywhere, they transmitted these qualities through succeeding generations to their descendants. The outward forms of dress and speech might disappear, but the fearlessness, the independence of thought, the readiness to defy the world for a belief, the unswerving loyalty to principle, were sure to remain. These characteristics all came out in their descendants. Those who laid aside the ancestral doctrine of nonresistance were among the hardest and bravest fighters in the armies of the United States during the Civil War, and, whether in peace or war, no people can be found who will battle more strenuously for what they believe to be right than the men and women of Quaker ancestry.

It may seem, sir, as if I were not speaking at all of the distinguished Senator whose death we lament to-day, and yet every word that I have uttered relates to him, for in trying to depict the qualities of the people whom William Penn led over here into the wilderness I have been explaining and describing Senator HEYBURN. He was of an old, long-established family in Pennsylvania. The blood of the men and women who 200 years before had unshrinkingly faced social ostracism, persecution, and death ran uncorrupted in his veins. He feared nothing, so far as I could see. You might question his opinion; you could never doubt his courage. His abilities were of a high order. He was a good lawyer, a vigorous debater, ready and apt in retort. He had a large command of language, and his sentences fell from his lips well framed, strong, and clear. His industry was untiring, and he strove, to his own injury, but from a high sense of duty, to follow every measure which came before the Senate.

Yet it is not of his abilities nor of his worth as a lawyer and Senator that I think first, as with sadness I try to recall him to-day. It is his character and his moral qualities which come most sharply to my mind, and which in his life made a deep impression upon me. I confess when I first met him here I was often exasperated by what seemed to me an almost perverse spirit of opposition, but as I came to know him better I learned to recognize his courage, his high principles, his loyalty to his beliefs, and his faithfulness to duty as he saw it, a fidelity which never faltered or grew pale. I learned, too, that hard fighter as he was, no resentment ever lurked in his memory when the battle was over, and that underneath the combativeness was one of the kindest and most generous hearts that ever beat. As he cheerfully faced criticism and attack for what he believed to be right, so did he meet the coming of the end. The hand of fate knocked at the door. He did not complain; he did not flinch; he did not retreat. He had never turned his back on either friend or enemy, and with the same high spirit and unwavering courage he went about his work and stood his ground in the debates and in committee. As I watched him in those last days, often urging him to seek rest and give himself more care, all quite in vain to a man of that nature; as I saw him so calmly ready for the final summons, Browning's great lines kept recurring to my mind:

Fear death? To feel the fog in my throat,
The mist in my face,
When the snows begin, and the blasts denote
I am nearing the place,
The power of the night, the press of the storm,
The post of the foe;
Where he stands, the Arch Fear in a visible form,
Yet the strong man must go;
For the journey is done, and the summit attained,
And the barriers fall,
Though a battle's to fight ere the guerdon be gained,
The reward of it all.
I was ever a fighter, so—one fight more,
The best and the last!
I would hate that death bandaged my eyes, and forebore,
And bade me creep past.
No! let me taste the whole of it, fare like my peers
The heroes of old,
Bear the brunt, in a minute pay glad life's arrears
Of pain, darkness, and cold.
For sudden the worst turns the best to the brave,
The black minute's at end
The elements rage, the fiend voices that rave,
Shall dwindle, shall blend,
Shall change, shall become first a peace out of pain;
And with God be the rest.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. Mr. President, Senator HEYBURN was a man of affirmative and positive characteristics. Although of Quaker stock, his mind and inclinations were essentially aggressive—always tolerant of the views of others, he yet formed his own opinions and held to them with a consistent and unusual tenacity. One of the kindest and most lovable of men, he never thought of swerving upon any public question by reason of any friendly or personal motives. If one virtue above others was a part of his nature, it was that of an intense and militant patriotism. He had no sympathy with what he considered the assaults of these later times upon the established order of the Government. He believed that the system of government devised and put into operation by the fathers was the work of wise and patriotic men, and that it had been fully tested and proven by the hundred years and more of successful operation, withstanding all the shock and strain of war and the more insidious but even more dangerous attacks in times of peace. He believed in the efficiency of the Constitution to meet all the requirements of our governmental life, and as a safe, sure, and stable foundation of our republican system, and if he had any one fear about the future of his country, it was that demands for amendment to the Constitution to meet immediate popular wishes would so weaken that foundation as to endanger the whole superstructure. In his discussion of public questions he was always fearless, frank, and entirely independent; appreciating, as all men do, present approval, he never bent his views to meet that approval, but held his course direct and unwavering and with full confidence in the verdict of the future. While Senator HEYBURN was wholly American and gloried in our national growth and greatness, and believed in the full power and strength of the General Government, at the same time he was exceedingly jealous of what he considered the rights of his State, and year after year, in his place on this floor, he resisted to the end certain general policies which he believed retarded her development and which in their operation he thought bore oppressively upon the citizens of the public-land States; year after year he waged a losing fight, yet year by year began the fight anew. He was always direct, bold, and aggressive, and while his cause might be unsuccessful, it gathered both strength and respect by the vigor and honesty of his advocacy. All in all, Senator HEYBURN was a man of the highest type of American citizenship, faithful to his public and private duties and responsibilities, assuming and attempting the duties of each day as each day came and accepting with a calm philosophy the result of each day's work, whatever that result might be, his temper as unruffled under defeat as in success, and he was entirely without malice or ill will toward an opponent, no matter how earnest or fierce the struggle. In private life he was a delightful companion, and his public services were of inestimable value. He occupied a place on the floor of this Chamber that will not soon be filled, and we as his colleagues have, in his death, suffered a loss that is well-nigh irreparable. He died as he had lived, in the front of the fray, and as he himself desired, as often expressed to his friends, in the full measure of his mental strength. He will be ever held in loving remembrance by his colleagues here, and his work written upon our statute books will ever be a fitting memorial of his public service.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, in the closing hours of the second session of this Congress, and while in the shadow of death, Senator HEYBURN was cautioned concerning the great danger to his health if he persisted in his efforts on the floor of the Senate, and he was importuned to take at least a little rest. His answer was characteristic of the man. Though suffering greatly, with a smile of genial complacency he said: "Well, I do not know but that I am ready to die. I have seen much of life, have probably had my share of it, and I know of no better time to meet death than when one is in the performance of a duty which he owes to his country." These words were uttered in no spirit of bravado, for such spirit was most foreign to his nature. They were spoken in the very presence of the grim reaper by one who looked into the face of death with calm, level eyes that knew no fear. They were spoken while artificial stimulants were being administered to his laboring heart that he might finish that day's work; that he might give to the Senate words of great import; that he might sow the seeds of wise thoughts, trusting to Providence that they might fall on fertile soil and bring forth their harvest of good.

In listening to his words on this floor, always profound and ringing true to his convictions, we could not but be impressed with his seeming indifference to what many claimed to be public sentiment. But duty to him was to give the public the benefit of a judgment founded upon studious research, accurate reasoning, and calm deliberation. His political creed was that he who stands for right, according to his own conviction, uninfluenced by the effect of that stand on his own political destiny, will in the long run far better represent his people than he who caters to their every changing mood. He might sometimes be less popular, but he would always be much safer. With him duty and judgment went hand in hand, and neither individual interest nor popular clamor could ever disunite them. He knew that his every act and every utterance was dictated by his love of his fellow men. He was too candid to ever flatter and too honest to ever temporize with error. Without fear or favor, he conformed his vote and his efforts in debate to a judgment fortified by study and guided by devotion.

With a great, deep, and loyal heart Senator HEYBURN loved the people of his own State and the people of this Nation; loved them so well and sincerely that it never occurred to him that any one of them could ever doubt his fidelity, and this may account to some extent for a seeming indifference to public sentiment. No man was ever more devoted to their real welfare than he. To that interest he gave a mind of great penetration and powerful analysis. He was most studious and painstaking in his research, and was always master of the subject in hand. He was a great student, reading every night long past the midnight hour. Those who were ignorant of that habit might well wonder at his almost inexhaustible fund of information on every important occasion. The undermining of his physical health by these long hours of studious labor was his own loss and little reckoned by him—the benefit of that labor inured to his country's welfare, a cause of supremest moment to him. Those of us who were near him on the last evening of the session, when he was speaking so earnestly and prophetically for the people of the country, and knew that while his lips were uttering words of patriotic eloquence for his party and his country his heart was struggling with faltering and uneven throb, can never forget the sturdy grandeur of his nature—his faithfulness to the very end.

His virtues were many, but were I called upon to designate the one that seemed to glow with brighter luster than any other, I should speak the word patriotism. So deeply did he love his country, so devotedly did he love the men who had battled to save the Union, that many have thought he must have hated those who had battled to destroy it; with such depth of patriotism did he cherish the memory of those who had died to uphold the Union cause that many may have thought there was a lingering bitterness in his heart toward those who had laid down devoted lives on the altar of a lost cause; so jealous was he lest the flag of a reunited country might not receive the homage due from all the people, that many may have thought that he doubted the devotion of every section to that flag. But those who had the great privilege of his friendship, and with it the opportunity to know him well, knew that no American citizen, north or south, was, or ever could be, without the portals of his great, generous heart.

Mr. President, we can know but little of each other even under conditions of greatest intimacy. In our world of social, business, and political relations, we mingle with men who can never know us and whom we can never know. Our real world is within ourselves, and that world is ever sacred in its secrecy. Across its portals none other may ever step. There is but one key that can unlock even the vestibule to this inner world of self, the key of confidential friendship, and even from this position of vantage, we can catch but the imperfect reflection of the true divinity of the soul; the twilight that but faintly heralds the glow of the real day. Sometimes I think it strange that the noblest impulses of the human heart, all that is purest and best, all that is truly sublime in our natures, persistently veils itself in secrecy and intuitively recoils from publicity. And so it required this close, intimate friendship to understand the real, noble, generous character of Senator HEYBURN. In the forum of debate he was firm and unyielding, a warrior to be feared, and yet a warrior always to be respected. But away from the line of battle, surrounded by friends and family, he was the very soul of gentleness, courtesy, graciousness, kindliness, and charity.

On the 19th day of October we laid his body in the tomb to return its substance to the earth that gave it, there forever to rest. To-day we enshrine his noble virtues in our hearts, there forever to live.

Touched by our grief and inspired by our affection we seek to build a monument to his memory, not at his tomb, but in our hearts, and for its structure we draw from the depths of our natures the noblest and best of our impulses. His eyes can never behold the beauty of that structure, but the eyes of our own souls shall see it and our characters shall be ennobled by it.

The qualities which we most regard in ourselves are those which we most cherish in others. Therefore, in paying our tribute to the noble dead we quicken into greater life the particular virtues which we praise. In these services we can not benefit the dead. He neither needs nor heeds our eulogies. But we can and do unconsciously benefit ourselves, and through ourselves, the world at large, by directing our thoughts toward those lofty heights of character which we extol in our friend, who has forever passed from our sight.

As the volume which contains this day's memorial services to Senator HEYBURN is closed, it will never be opened again except for a brief period by those who knew him and loved him. For to really know him was to truly love him. But the thoughts and impulses of this day, combined with the memory of his life, the impression he made upon the consciousness of all who knew him; of all who heard his words of wisdom and earnest eloquence, will be builded and cemented into a monument to his name and character that will endure with each of us so long as our own lives shall last; and as no force is ever lost to the world, so the subtle influence of a noble character, leaving its magnetic impress even on the stubborn law of heredity, and gently, but none the less surely, working a change in the course of its current, will be an undying influence that will be reflected and re-reflected down the ages. No lineal descendant will ever bear the name of Senator HEYBURN, but unnumbered hosts shall bear the impress of his character.

Mr. DILLINGHAM. Mr. President, during the period of my service in this body I recall no associate who at all times and under all circumstances manifested a higher conception of the duties and the obligations of a Senator of the United States than did WELDON B. HEYBURN. He never limited the application of his great powers to questions which were of special interest to the people of his own State or to those residing in that section of the country from which he came, but, from the day he entered the Senate until death claimed him, he lived in the consciousness of the fact that he was a Senator of the United States in the proudest and broadest sense, and that as such he was required to scrutinize every measure affecting the public interest; to advance those which would serve the public good and to stamp with condemnation those which appeared doubtful or that might be mischievous. In the discharge of these duties he exhibited an industry almost incredible, and a degree of application found rarely, and only in men of great power, of trained intellects, and those who are naturally masterful.

He was a tireless, intelligent worker. The statement would hardly seem believable, if the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD did not disclose the fact, that during the second session of the present Congress he engaged in debates on the floor of the Senate which involved a discussion of nearly 150 different subjects of legislation. All this he did in addition to the routine work of a Senator; in addition to the heavy demands upon his time and strength in the discharge of his duties as a member of important committees, and at a time, too, when he was suffering an impairment of health which would have driven an ordinary man into retirement.

His power and influence, as it seems to me, resulted from his convictions, which were those of a man whose judgment was based upon the eternal principle of the fatherhood of God and the brotherhood of man—principles which found expression in a lofty and intense type of patriotism, a profound love of liberty under law, and a respect and reverence for that system of law under which the liberties of the people of this country have been developed and maintained.

Grounded in these doctrines, it was natural that he should adopt the law as his profession, into the study and practice of which he carried not only the endowments of a talented intellect but an industrious application, coupled with a marvelous capacity for labor which recognized neither length of hours nor the limitations of physical endurance. The effect of this thorough preparation was evidenced always by his clear conception of the issues arising in every controversy, his ability to grasp facts relevant thereto, his knowledge of the law, and his keen sense of the moral as well as the legal principles involved.

Mr. HEYBURN entered this body in the fullness of all his powers. He was a ripe lawyer, a clear thinker, a skilled, forceful debater, ever ready and resourceful, and he never advanced a proposition without being well fortified to maintain it. He was a splendid advocate, a dangerous adversary, but an honorable foeman. He was fearless for the right as he understood it, and he early won and held to the last a secure place among those men depended upon as leaders.

Among all those with whom I have associated in this body no man has impressed me as possessing a more unflinching devotion to the principles he espoused or a finer courage in maintaining them. In the best and highest sense WELDON B. HEYBURN was a fighter who knew no fear. To him it mattered not whether he stood alone doing battle for his convictions or surrounded by hosts of friends and supporters; in either event he delivered himself in the full strength of vigorous speech. That he was facing a hostile press or antagonizing powerful elements in the political life of the Nation made no difference to him. He published to the world his unshaken belief and he sought only the approval of a good conscience as a reward.

As chairman of the Committee on Privileges and Elections, of which he was an able and an honored member, I became more intimately acquainted with him than might otherwise have been possible, and that acquaintance ripened into a friendship which to me was a great satisfaction. My admiration both for his ability and character grew with the months, and my affection for him as a man steadily increased as I more and more realized the kindness of his heart and the gentleness of his spirit.

During the last session of the Congress I felt anxious because of the disturbing condition of his health, and appreciating his critical situation, pleaded with him to abandon all public duties and seek a restoration through a long period of relaxation. His reply was characteristic of the man. He said he did not desire to live unless he could do a man's work; that he preferred to fight the battle to the end, whether the contest was long or short, and when his work was done to go hence. In this dauntless spirit he met all the issues of life, and so it was that week after week and month after month he strove mightily, although in constant pain and imminent danger, and when he had indeed performed a man's work to the very last he went hence, leaving a record of faithfulness and achievement well worthy the emulation of all.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Mr. President, it is with something more than a feeling of perfunctory interest that I rise to add a brief tribute of respect to the memory of WELDON BRINTON HEYBURN, for he was not only an honored colleague, but a warm personal friend, for whom I entertained a very real affection.

During the eight years we served together in this Senate the work in which we were both engaged brought us into close relations and constant association. My respect for his many admirable qualities, for his rugged but exalted conception of public duty, for the simple dignity of his everyday bearing, increased as the years of our acquaintance lengthened.

He was of Quaker ancestry, and there was something very fine and inspiring in the staunch but never demonstrative affection in which he held the people of that faith. He was born in Delaware County, Pa., in the year 1852, and was, therefore, at the time of his death only 60 years of age, in the full possession of all his mental faculties, cultivated by habits of studious application and sharpened by the varied experiences of a busy life. With an unusually strong and massive body and a mind keen, forceful, and untiring, intellectual work, however laborious or exacting, was with him always a delight and never a burden. Had it not been for the disease which so cruelly fastened itself upon him, but to which he never bowed in submission or ceased to regard other than in the light of an intrusive and impertinent interruption of his labors, to be treated with imperious contempt, he would have been spared for many years of useful public service.

If I were asked to name his most conspicuous characteristic, I should say it was courage—physical as well as moral. Many men, indeed most men, can upon occasion, by a conscious effort of the will, meet a great peril with no outward manifestation of fear, but those who habitually and as a matter of course face every problem, however grave or threatening, without a shrinking of the soul or of the flesh are rare indeed. Senator HEYBURN was one of these unusual individuals from whose mental and moral equipment the element of cowardice had been wholly omitted. He was, moreover, intensely in earnest and intensely sincere. There was never about anything he said or did the slightest suggestion of the hypocrite or the timeserver. During the 10 years of his service in this body he met every question in a spirit of perfect candor and of utter disregard for every consideration save the intrinsic merits of the proposition. I firmly believe that in all that time it never occurred to him to consider the effect which his words or his vote might have upon his own political fortunes. Opportunism was no part of his political creed. Convinced of the rightfulness of any position he assumed, he stood for it unswervingly, without the slightest concern for the strength of the opposition or the odds against which he contended. If others agreed with him, he pursued his way, it is true, with greater satisfaction, but if nobody agreed with him he pursued his way nevertheless. The fact that he stood quite alone disturbed him not in the least. He was unmoved by the fiercest opposition; the semblance of a threat only added to the intensity of his contention. The question of the popularity or unpopularity of his views never entered into his calculations.

When I search the gallery of my memory for its most familiar picture of him it is always to behold him standing in his place, militant and earnest, vigorously pressing some legislation which he believed to be necessary and wise or grimly opposing something which he believed to be wrong. Fearless and independent, with his strong, sturdy frame, his deep chest, his large, splendidly shaped head, he was always a picturesque and interesting figure in debate, facing its stormiest phases like some gallant, self-reliant sea captain, clear-eyed and unafraid, driving by the force of his strong will through the fury of a wind-swept sea.

It was in this same mood that he took up the gage of battle with his last unconquerable antagonist, with a perfect knowledge that he was unconquerable. About that he never for one moment deceived himself. He understood clearly the gravity of his own case. But never for a single instant did he cry out or beg for quarter. With his back to the wall, he fought doggedly, unflinchingly, albeit hopelessly, with the same unyielding spirit that he would have made a losing fight for a great principle in which he believed or as he would have contended, though himself naked, with an armor-clad adversary. Day by day the poor mortal body weakened, but the heroic soul never whined or faltered. One day, as he stood at his desk addressing the Senate, he distinctly felt the breaking of a small artery in the frontal lobe of the brain. There followed an inrush of overwhelming sickness; one of his eyes was filled with a quick suffusion of blood; there was a momentary hesitation in his speech—long enough for those who sat near him to realize that something was dreadfully amiss—and then, with a superb effort of his wonderful will, he lifted the fainting soul to its task and completed his remarks and then walked from the Chamber without a word to anyone. The next day I saw him, and observing the darkened eye and drooping lid, I said: "What is the matter, Senator?" Without a trace of apprehension in his voice, as though he had been speaking of another, he replied: "A small blood vessel has been ruptured, forming a clot on the brain in such a way as to render one of my eyes temporarily blind. The doctor says that sight will return as the clot is gradually absorbed." For more than a year, while the inexorable fingers of death slowly but surely tightened about his heart, he quietly continued to discharge the daily duties of his place with a courage whose pathos appealed to everyone but himself. But finally the flesh, having grown weary of the struggle, gave up the unequal fight, which the brave, unconquerable spirit refused to do until the very end.

By those who knew him here he will be sadly missed. In the busy hours of the closing days of the session we pause only long enough to pay him the simple and inadequate tribute of a few words of affection and appreciation, and then resume our efforts to solve the problems of the living, leaving the mystery of the dead—if, indeed, there be any—to be unraveled in the good time and the good way of Him whose mystery it is. And this, if he could speak to us, would be what our late colleague would have us do, for he who lived by the gospel of work least of all men would have the necessary work of the world halted for long sorrowing over one whose worldly tasks have ended forevermore.

Mr. BURTON. Mr. President, WELDON B. HEYBURN was a person of unique and powerful personality. A man's characteristics are derived in part from inheritance and in part from environment. Senator HEYBURN's will power, his strength, and independence were such that he must have come of a sturdy ancestry, but there were more clearly visible indications of the effect of his environment.

For very nearly 30 years he was a resident of one of the newer and more progressive States of the Union, and shared the hardships, struggles, and trials which belong to the settlers in a new country, where fertile valleys and great areas of desert fields and scattered rocks were strangely mingled.

He was always in sympathy with the pioneers; in fact, he was one of them; that army always advancing, never disbanding, shrinking from no obstacles, marching over mountains and valleys, making glad the waste places of the earth, digging treasures from the sides of the mountains, establishing new communities and Commonwealths, always building better than they knew and on a grander scale than they knew.

He was faithful to the people of his State. His sympathies went out for the struggling miner, for the prospector who went forth to seek new mines in the bowels of the earth.

He was at times seemingly lacking in tolerance toward those who took different views with relation to the settlement of that new country and the utilization of its resources, a disposition which may be readily explained by the fact that he realized the difficulties of his fellow citizens who were engaged in the development of that new area, and his feelings on their behalf were very much aroused. No one could know him without recognizing the strength of his will, his courage, his independence.

There has probably never been a manifestation in this Chamber of more resolution than that which he showed in the last few months of his life, when, with the death warrant already written, he was unwilling to turn aside for rest, but continued in the performance of his duties to the end. It has been said that his courage and his independence were his leading characteristics. He sought no favors. He did not desire that thrift which follows fawning. His opinions were never the echoes of the voice of any leader, however eloquent or logical that voice might be. He was no registering machine to write down the behests of others. He could not change his opinions to conform to the views of those who might furnish him with great support in the way of votes. He stood too erect ever to bend his ear to the ground and listen to the whispers which speak of popularity and popular support. So he stood among us as a splendid figure, one who sought to serve his country in accordance with his ideals of patriotism and of independence. He had his faults, but they were eclipsed by noble qualities.

I am painfully conscious, Mr. President, of my inability, certainly in a few brief minutes, to do justice to his memory, but of this we may all be sure, that though his life was cut short he left a noble heritage in his patriotism, which his State and the Nation will cherish in the years to come.

Mr. JONES. Mr. President, poets and orators have sung the praises of men who have bravely died in battle amid the booming of cannon, the thrilling strains of marshal music, and the trampling of armed hosts. Our blood has bounded through our veins and we have thrilled at the story of some mighty deadly conflict in which had been shown the courage and fortitude that leads to death and the grave. Poets' flame and orators' fire, however, can not portray the sublime courage that controls the man who, knowing that if he continues his work, the messenger may summon him at any moment to that undiscovered bourne whence there is no return, nevertheless, with calm fortitude and cheerful demeanor continues to discharge the duties which he feels he must perform. This is a courage beyond the power of tongue or pen to portray.

This was the courage displayed by WELDON BRINTON HEYBURN prior to his death. For a year or two his colleagues knew that the dreaded messenger was hovering near. He knew it, too, and was listening for the summons. He talked of it calmly and without fear. He accepted it as something that could not be avoided. He wanted to do as much as possible ere the message came, not realizing or not heeding that his labors were but beckonings to the end. The messenger came, the battle was fought, the last earthly contest was over, and with his face to the foe before whom all must fall he went bravely beyond the veil.

In his death this Chamber lost one of its strongest characters. He was a man of powerful intellect and matchless moral courage. He was intellectually pugnacious and delighted in controversy. His wide learning, broad experience, long training at the bar, of which he was a leading member, and his ready command of language made him a most formidable antagonist in debates. He was calm, ready, and self-possessed, ever serious, oftentimes unconsciously witty, and always earnest and sincere.

He seemed to disregard utterly public opinion. He boldly, even defiantly, expressed views upon great questions which were against public sentiment. He assumed that he was better able with his study, investigation, and knowledge of the situation here to decide what should be done than anyone else, and he never shirked responsibility and boldly stated his position. Local opposition and local sentiment were overcome by the power of his intellect, dauntless courage, and overmastering spirit.

In the State convention of his party he boldly denounced what to him was heresy in its platform, and when the legislature met to select his successor, his presence dissipated the gathering storm of opposition as the rising sun dispels the scattered mists of the morning.

While he took his position upon all questions boldly and expressed his views with candor and positiveness, he conceded to his opponents the same honesty of purpose and liberty of conscience that he demanded for himself. He met all questions fearlessly and maintained his position openly. He could not veil his defense or conceal his attacks. His attacks were daring, his defense open. He could not be dislodged from a conclusion once reached, and it seemed sometimes as if he would not see the error of his position.

He was an intense partisan. His party loyalty was a part of his patriotism. When his party spoke through its majority he bowed to its decree, even if he did not agree with its judgment. An intense partisan himself, he respected partisanship in others. That parties are necessary to make representative government a success he strongly believed. If some declaration in his party platform did not meet with his approval he nevertheless remained with the party, believing that in unity there is success, in dissension defeat. He sought to work out differences within the party by reversing its decrees within itself rather than through defeat.

While not in harmony with the sentiment of the day, no man was more intensely patriotic, no man was more earnestly devoted to the welfare of the people and his Government than WELDON BRINTON HEYBURN. Denouncing mercilessly what he considered the heresies of the day, he was just as confident that what he advocated was for the people's welfare as the most ardent advocate of other policies and methods. If we did not approve his position we were forced to admire the courage, sincerity, and ability with which he maintained it. He was of incorruptible honesty, and the people's good was his sole aim. Better far a man like this in legislative halls, though mistaken, than the cowardly sycopant sometimes right.

With all his domineering, masterful, combative disposition there was a sweeter nature that "peeped out ever and anon," all the brighter because of the rough, rugged surroundings. Oftentimes have I seen him in committee apparently taking a determined stand against some measure in which a fellow member was interested, and, after expressing his views in his usual vigorous fashion, say "But I will not carry my opposition further; I simply wanted to make my position clear." Within his strong, rugged nature there was a heart as gentle and tender as a child's.

He did not depend upon his abilities alone while a Member of this body. He was a hard worker both in committee and on the floor of the Senate. He attended the meetings of the Senate very regularly and followed its proceedings with great care. He was always at committee meetings and took an active part in their deliberations, and the work of the committees and subcommittees of which he was chairman was looked after with the greatest fidelity and marked ability. An examination of the Congressional Index will show the amazing range of his activities and the tremendous labor he must have put forth.

The life of a Senator who conscientiously discharges the duties devolving upon him as the representative of his State and Nation is a most exacting one. It requires close study, long hours, and hard work. In addition to the general legislative work, Senators from the West have many matters of local concern that require much time, study, and preparation. And so it was that the burdens upon Mr. HEYBURN were very great; they were too much even for his great mental and physical strength, and his colleagues saw the end coming long before it came. He literally worked himself to death for his State and Nation.

What a brave fight he made! With the same dauntless courage with which he faced the problems of his legislative career he faced the grim reaper. By the very force of his indomitable will he seemed to stay death's hand. Face to face he yielded inch by inch, but was finally overcome by the foe that knows no defeat.

Mr. President, no knight in olden times ever faced death in defense of his lady love more calmly, no soldier ever marched more courageously to battle, no martyr ever faced the stake with greater heroism than did this man meet the summons of the grim reaper to the voyage whither all must go; whence none return. Brave in life's battles, bravely he died. Peace to his ashes, joy to his soul.

Mr. ROOT. Mr. President, no one could have sat in this Chamber as the colleague of Senator HEYBURN without receiving and retaining a deep impression of a very strong and distinctively individual character. He merited the description by which the Norse sagas so often carried a meaning of high praise when they declared one to be "not an everyday man." Even the traditional attitude and sentiment of formal eulogy can not make it natural or suitable to couple his memory with perfunctory expression.

He had a strong and active intelligence, well informed, thoroughly trained, utilized through enormous and untiring industry, and made effective through unusual facility of expression. His work as chairman of the Joint Committee on the Revision of the Laws was painstaking, accurate, and of permanent value. His attention to the business of the Senate was unremitting, and he was always watchful and alert to detect bad measures and prevent their passage, while his own advocacy of legislation was always upon the ground of what he believed to be the public advantage. The wide range of his interest in public affairs included every department of government, and in every direction he made valuable and effective contributions to our discussions. His great power was chiefly derived from his exceptional qualities of character. I think the underlying quality on which all the others rested was a capacity for loyal self-devotion to ideals. For whatever cause he espoused he was instinctively and unhesitatingly ready to fight à l'outrance, and to the partisanship of his cause he brought inflexible resolution and clear, high courage. His face once set he never turned to the right hand or to the left; he never wavered or hesitated or questioned or doubted. His conclusions were convictions. Throughout his arguments, always dignified and courteous and full of relevant and cogent matter, there sounded always the suggestion of a battle cry. He would have gone to the stake singing triumphal hymns. He would have led forlorn hopes. He would have sought death in battle with supreme joy. As became his character, he had a great capacity for wrath. His temper was sudden, easily moved, swift to expression. In conflict it would flare out at times like some great furnace, seen from afar, blazing for an instant on the night. But there never was a sweeter temper. He was gentle and kindly and considerate toward all the world. He had no shade of the morose or sullen, of spite or revengefulness. He harbored no resentments. He had ineradicable prejudices, but no hatreds. He had many conflicts, but no enmities, and I doubt if he had any real enemies. Certainly he had none here. His ingenuous sincerity, the whole-heartedness of his devotion to the truth as he felt it, the transparent unselfishness of his motives, the kindliness of his judgments, inspired us all with respect and admiration for his character. His very foibles endeared him to us. We had affection for him. We truly grieve for his untimely death, and it is a sad satisfaction to do honor to his memory.

Mr. THORNTON. Mr. President, I have been requested by the senior Senator from Idaho to say something on this occasion because he thought that I understood the late Senator HEYBURN somewhat better than did my brother Senators from the South, and I have accepted the trust and shall try to be just to his memory.

I came to this body prejudiced against him because of my preconceived idea that he was hostile in sentiment toward the people of my section of the Union; and some of his remarks and votes on certain questions shortly after my arrival here were calculated to make me believe that the general impression concerning his character in this respect was correct; but for more than a year before his death I had become satisfied that this view was based on a wrong conception of his feelings.

Senator HEYBURN was not a hater of the southern people, and no one here was more ready than he to vote for measures to relieve their necessities from the Government purse when an emergency arose with which they were unable to cope unaided and which called for immediate relief.

True, he wished to be satisfied that the necessity existed, but it was his habit to always insist on a proper explanation for a demand for expenditures of public money for unusual purposes.

But when the reason for it was made clear to his mind he cheerfully and ungrudgingly voted for all that was asked for the relief of the southern people.

He always objected to the expenditure of public money for the purpose of commemorating in any way the valor of Confederate soldiers or sailors or to the return of captured Confederate flags, and even to the return of captured bonds that had been issued during the Civil War by any of the States composing the Southern Confederacy; and this was why he acquired the reputation of being hostile to the South, a reputation that has outlived his life.

But his course in these matters was not due to any dislike of the southern people as such, but to his intense conviction not only that the cause for which they fought was wrong but that he could not vote for such measures without seeming to condone to some extent the action of the South in seceding from the Federal Union.

In my opinion, his view of those questions was too narrow and his judgment warped by his feelings, and I think he could have well afforded to look at them from the standpoint of others who were just as decided in their convictions of the wrong of secession as himself, but who considered that the time had come when they could show this consideration to their southern brethren, now as loyal citizens of a common country as themselves, without in the slightest degree detracting from their own sense of loyalty to the cause of the Union during the Civil War.

But Senator HEYBURN thought otherwise as regarded himself, and it was his own conclusion that always controlled his individual action.

I have heard him declare on the floor of the Senate that his feeling was not in any sense personal, not dictated by dislike of southerners, but by dislike of the cause for which they fought, and that he fully recognized the sincerity of their position in that regard; and I am sure that he spoke his true sentiments, for he was too honest and courageous to speak otherwise.

I feel that on this question I have been just to Senator HEYBURN, and as a southerner and ex-Confederate soldier I wish to go on record as protesting against what I consider to be a general misconception of his character in this regard—a misconception shared by myself until I had opportunities for better understanding him.

And now that he is dead I am glad to be able to pay tribute to some characteristics of Senator HEYBURN that I unreservedly admired and for which I gave him unstinted credit while he was alive.

In my experience in this body I have not met a Member who, in my opinion, felt a stronger obligation resting on him to thoroughly inform himself on measures before he voted on them.

I became first impressed with his desire for investigation through my observation of him as a member of the Committee on Public Lands, in which we served together; but it seemed almost impossible for a measure to come before the Senate that his alert and inquiring mind did not prompt him to take part in its consideration.

I believe that in this he overtaxed himself, for I am convinced that no Senator can fully investigate all questions, even those of importance, without impairment of his physical health; but necessarily he must trust in some matters to the investigation of the committees having them directly in charge.

I believe that Senator HEYBURN'S habit in this regard hastened his end.

But he never spared himself while contending for what he thought was right or against what he thought was wrong.

I often watched him last year, continuing to debate while scarcely able to stand, fearing that he would fall and die in the midst of his argument, yet thinking it quite possible that he would prefer to meet death in that particular way.

I admired him because he was always true to his convictions—a quality possessed by him in as high a degree as by any Member of this body.

I well remember that in our last conversation, just before the close of the last session, when I made some allusion to this trait of his character, he answered with a look and emphasis that left no doubt in my mind of his sincerity:

Senator, when the time comes that I can't vote my convictions in the United States Senate, I am ready to quit it forever.

I admired him for his intense Americanism, his pride in the greatness of his country, and his zealous desire to maintain and increase her greatness.

These were the qualities of Senator HEYBURN that commanded my respect—honesty, industry, conscientiousness, courage, and patriotism—qualities which I trust that we who have survived him may always wish to emulate.

Mr. MYERS. Mr. President, it is a melancholy pleasure for me upon this sad occasion to say a few words of tribute and praise to the sturdy worth and many good qualities of our departed associate, Senator HEYBURN, and to lay a wreath of kindly remembrance at the shrine of his memory. I said many good words of him during my acquaintance with him in the course of his lifetime, and now it is with heartfelt reverence and genuine esteem that I pause in the busy course of life to revere his memory with some words of praise.

Although I live in a State adjoining the State of Senator HEYBURN'S last residence, I never knew him personally until I entered this body and here met him. When I met him here his greeting to me was most kindly and cordial, and instantly impressed me as coming from a good-hearted man of kindly instincts. My relations with him during the remainder of his life were most cordial and pleasant, and to me will ever be a pleasant memory. Beneath a rugged exterior he possessed a sublime devotion to duty, a heroic adherence to principle, a heart as warm as the gentle sunshine of spring, and a disposition as tender as the first blossoms of the flower garden.

During our entire acquaintance he was always most kindly and cordial to me. In many ways and upon a number of occasions he was helpful to me. I enjoyed courtesies at his hands that were beneficial to me and which I much appreciated. In all of our relations I found him ever of a helpful disposition. I never approached him in any matter but what he evinced a strong desire to be helpful to me. When he could not fully agree with me he was not disposed to be obstructive, but carefully explained his views and always suggested from his resourceful mind some course that would obviate his objections and at the same time answer my purposes. He ever extended a helping hand to assist me over the rocky obstacles of legislative life, and many beneficial ideas I owe to his helpful suggestions. To me all of these things betokened a lovable disposition.

Senator HEYBURN was as fearless a man as I ever knew. His fearlessness always elicited my unbounded admiration. I believe he was absolutely fearless—as much so as any man could be. He seemed to take no reckoning of consequences. He stood absolutely firm for what he believed to be right, utterly regardless of what the consequences might be to him politically or otherwise. I do not believe the history of this country has revealed in public life a more fearless character than he. He cared nothing for public opinion. He cared nothing for enmities, opposition, criticism, or stricture. Evidently he had but one guide, and that was the right. I do not believe it would be possible for any human being to adhere more strictly to his ideas of the right. In this I believe his career sets an opportune and a beneficial example to the public men of the day and to the youth of our land. He knew neither friend nor foe in his devotion to right. His adherence to the right as he saw it was as immovable as the everlasting mountains, as solid as the Rock of Ages. His frankness, too, was unusual. He never hesitated to express himself on any subject that concerned him, his constituents, or the people of this country. So prominent were these splendid qualities in his character that they stand in bold relief to the average make-up of mankind and tower above that average like the lofty mountain peak that pierces the skies towers above the hills.

Men of the character of Senator HEYBURN are needed in this world. They are the men who accomplish things. They are the men who stand for ideals. They are the men who defend to the last what they believe to be right and never know what it is to retreat. We shall miss him here. His constituents will miss him. The world will miss him.

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President, I would be doing violence to my feelings if I were to sit in silence and fail to add a word to the tributes to our departed friend. It was a privilege to have known him. His character was as rugged as the mountains of his adopted State. The first six months I was a Member of the Senate my acquaintance with him was only casual. I had seen him upon the floor engaged in the debates and business of the Senate; I witnessed his combativeness, and I confess I did not then quite understand him; but it fell to my lot to be associated with him closely for a number of weeks in some important committee work, and I then, for the first time, learned to know the real Senator HEYBURN as he was known to his family and his most intimate friends. During that time I saw him and labored with him every hour of the day.

He perhaps would impress one as being a man of strong biases, and he was; but beyond that, and more than that, it seemed to me that the ruling passion in his work was to seek and to know the truth. During that investigation in a distant city, if you had heard him examine the witnesses, who perhaps had taken one side or the other of the controversy, and you were to witness the force and directness of his questions, it would occur to you that he was there in a partisan capacity, rather than as a judge; but if this element seemed to appear upon the surface, and you followed him through the entire course of the examination, you would find that he was eager to know the truth and the truth only.

His was one of those peculiar minds that always hewed to the line and was willing to let the chips fall where they might.

Mr. President, I can not conceive of Senator HEYBURN bending to every breeze. He always stood foursquare to all the winds that blew. He thought his thoughts and spoke his own words, not other people's. He believed that he was here in this Chamber commissioned to do a certain work. He performed it according to the light that was given to him. It was not necessary that he get his ear to the ground in order that he might know what his own views were or how he should vote. No one who ever knew Senator HEYBURN would charge him with that characteristic.

Mr. President, in the time I was thus intimately associated with him I learned to love him. I know I was his friend, and I believe that he was mine. I remember after he was stricken I stepped up to him one day and tried to persuade him to leave the Chamber to go and seek the rest he needed; but no, he would not go. He felt that if his time had come there was no better place to pass away than at the post of duty.

Mr. President, he was a man of high ideals. He was an intellectual giant; he had the genius of industry; he was the peer of any man in the Senate. He was one of those men of whom Kipling wrote—

> He walked with kings, nor lost the common touch.

I shall always remember him with a deep feeling of affection, knowing that when he passed away we lost a truly patriotic citizen and Senator. Peace to his ashes.

Mr. BRADY. Mr. President, in the death of WELDON BRINTON HEYBURN the State of Idaho has lost a distinguished citizen and representative and the Nation a brilliant and useful legislator. I wish that it were in my power to speak of him on this occasion from the intimate knowledge which some of you possess by reason of your long association with him in this Chamber. It was my privilege, however, to know him well through years of pleasant association, incident to service in the ranks of the same political party, in the upbuilding of our State and through the record of his achievements in the United States Senate.

I knew him as a citizen, as a party leader, and as a representative of a sovereign State. He was a large virile figure in the political and governmental activities of his time, a man whose great talents were early appreciated by the party leaders and the people of Idaho.

From the time he became a resident of Idaho until his death he played an important part in the history of the State. The brilliant legal powers which he possessed gained for him an early recognition, and his attainments in his profession commanded admiration wherever he practiced, whether in the State and supreme courts of the Northwest, in the United States district and circuit courts, or in the Supreme Court of the United States.

When the Territory of Idaho was about to hold its constitutional convention Mr. HEYBURN was chosen a delegate, and his colleagues, recognizing his legal attainments, made him chairman of the committee on the judiciary.

It was, however, in the party campaigns and political struggles that I came to know him in a more intimate and personal way and to recognize his sterling worth in both private and public life.

During the early years of his first term I watched his growth with the keenest pleasure. It was a source of great satisfaction to note how his personality became the moving force in a great and brilliant senatorial career.

These memories of my pleasant association with him come back to me with such clearness that it is difficult for me to realize that he has passed away. Knowing him as I did, and being so familiar with the great record he made in this body, I appreciate the responsibility of being his successor. He set a standard of legislative workmanship which few have excelled, and I am glad to be privileged to pay tribute to his great accomplishments.

I could not agree with him upon all public questions, nor could many of you, yet, however keenly we may have felt his opposition, we recognized that his attitude was taken conscientiously. The calm certainty with which he followed his own ideas and the clear thought with which he reflected upon current problems made him a man of great force. Neither in this Chamber nor in the country at large was there ever any uncertainty as to his position upon great public questions. He stood for his political convictions even if he stood alone. A stanch supporter of government and a loyal party man withal, he did not hesitate to stand apart from the majority opinion.

He had an uncommon power to resist those persuasions which are purely personal or partisan and to hold his own opinions undaunted by the disagreements or the misunderstandings of those who oppose him. He fought hard, sometimes relentlessly hard, but he was as relentless in putting aside the possible effect of his course upon his own political fortunes as he was persistent in combating those who for the moment stood against him.

Yet it can be truly said that no bitterness bred of debate ever followed him to his home. Those who knew him out of the storm of debate or in the quiet of his own home knew that warm kindness and generous tolerance marked his every discussion. He was away from the battlefield, his armor was off, he was no longer the fighter, but merely the gentle, considerate man.

To-day, when political beliefs are numerous and party lines confused, when the functions and methods of government are uncertain and formative, it requires a large catholicity of mind to appreciate fully the service of all those who play a vigorous part. More difficult still is it to estimate fairly those whose function it has been to approach public questions from a special angle. The radical who stands for a new truth that other men do not see and the conservative who defends a time-honored belief from which other men have departed are rarely understood by the popular mind. Yet these two opposing minds, by their persistent, honest effort, form a balance which is essential to the deliberations of this legislative body, which is reflected in the thought of the American people. Only when all men can see the whole truth can we do without these men of extreme view, and that time does not seem destined to come.

For myself I may say that I am committed to progressive policies, but I can not and do not set aside my appreciation and respect for those men who have been and are striving to preserve the fundamental principles of our governmental structure. Among the stanchest defenders of conservative Republicanism was WELDON BRINTON HEYBURN. Who is there among those who have been his colleagues in the years of his membership here that can fail to comprehend his earnest interest in representative government and constitutional procedure?

Senator HEYBURN was not undemocratic in the true sense of the word. He was always concerned with the good of the people of the State and Nation. He stood upon the side of those hard-working men and women who are trying to build a great American Commonwealth, the State of Idaho. He was responsible for many laws touching the farming, mining, and business interests of the West. He stood for the true conservation of the people's interests and for the policies which conserve our natural resources and popular rights in the gifts of nature, and favored proper administration of all laws without imposing any undue burden upon those men of the pioneer spirit, who are responsible for the turning of the uninhabited places into homesteads for American man and women.

He has stood by the homesteader as against the speculative exploiter of lands; he has been with the irrigationist, eagerly seeking the opportunity of tilling the soil that only waits for water, as against the "sleeper" and the land speculator, who want water without effort, not that they may reap the farm products, but that they may reap from land values which they have not helped to create. As he served the people of the State conscientiously, so he served the Nation.

The democratic feeling of our leaders is known by the consideration they give to their fellow men in the bills they make into laws rather than by any words they may coin to gain political favor. After years of failure to legislate, his persistent energy and comprehensive mind gave the American people the first law, with administrative restrictions, to guarantee that sooner or later every person in the United States will be completely protected against adulterated foods and drugs. Only a few days ago Dr. Wiley, in a public address at Boise, declared that the State of Idaho should erect a monument to Senator HEYBURN for the great good he had done in giving the Nation such splendid pure-food legislation. No man can rear a greater monument as an evidence of his desire to protect the masses than Senator HEYBURN has built for himself in his work as chairman of the Committee on Manufactures, which had charge of the pure-food legislation of the Senate.

That he was not in favor of the devices for popular participation in government which some of us advocate is not proof positive that he lacked faith in the rank and file of men. He believed in the right of men to govern themselves, but he was convinced that in the present circumstances of life conditions do not guarantee them sufficient knowledge and experience to enable them to participate successfully in the details of legislative, administrative, and judicial decision. The confidence that he had in his own sense of duty and the convictions of his own magnificent mind bred no distrust in delegated power, and he generously extended the same faith to other political leaders.

He failed to appreciate those great popular ideas of initiative government which the twentieth century has contributed to American political life. His feeling for other men and women was of the old-fashioned sort, which showed a courteous consideration by fighting impersonally for right and against wrong. A principle covered all humanity with him.

He was a man of massive mind. A constitutional lawyer of unusual ability, steeped in the spirit of the constitutional principles, his political beliefs were of the older school. He never at any time became a reactionary; he had always been a constitutional devotee.

No great and complicated question of legislation ever came up in this body but he had the mind to grasp its application, the tireless energy to pursue its details, and the endurance to watch it through every turn of debate. The history of legislative debate during the past 10 years in this Chamber can not be separated from the record of his participation in it. The principles he advocated were carried into effect in the bill dealing with pure foods and drugs. Twice his vote delivered the Territories of Arizona and New Mexico from the jeopardy of joint Statehood. He it was who guided the Philippine tariff laws throught the committee and on the floor. To him it was given to oppose the enactment of the reciprocity treaty with Canada. He was in active charge of the joint committee on the revision of the laws of the United States, completing as his special part the penal code and the first sixteen chapters of the judiciary, which was adopted by Congress.

He worked with the same tireless energy whether the problem was of great or minor importance, and strove always to a conscientious disposition of any question that came before him, regardless of its nature.

It is a privilege, indeed, to speak these personal views of a man in whom my State took such great pride. In the hush of sharp and incisive debate which death puts upon this Chamber, it is a privilege to pay just measure and tribute to a great man who has wrought among us so vigorously that we can not even now gain a full view of his character and works.

He was one great man who regarded his prerogatives as a public trust, a chosen man who used in full sense of duty the bestowal of power which came to his hand, a man of public spirit and great mental caliber, of inexhaustible energy, of austere conscience, of dauntless courage. Such a man was WELDON BRINTON HEYBURN.

MEMORIAL ADDRESSES ON THE LATE SENATOR JEFF DAVIS.

Mr. CLARKE of Arkansas. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the resolutions which I send to the desk.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. PAGE in the chair). The resolutions submitted by the Senator from Arkansas will be read.

The resolutions (S. Res. 490) were read, considered by unanimous consent, and unanimously agreed to, as follows:

Resolved, That the Senate has heard with deep sorrow of the death of the Hon. JEFF DAVIS, late a Senator from the State of Arkansas.

Resolved, That as a mark of respect to the memory of the deceased the business of the Senate be now suspended to enable his associates to pay proper tribute to his high character and distinguished public services.

Resolved, That the Secretary communicate a copy of these resolutions to the House of Representatives and transmit a copy thereof to the family of the deceased.

Mr. CLARKE of Arkansas. Mr. President, Senator JEFF DAVIS—and he delighted to call himself JEFF, and to have his intimate friends do the same—died suddenly at his home in Little Rock on January 2, 1913. As I said on another occasion, thus ended abruptly and prematurely the career of one of the most extraordinary men who made his appearance in the South in a generation. A simple recital of the events of his life, in sufficient detail to make his methods, his purposes, and his plans understood, would demonstrate this beyond reasonable dispute or cavil, but the proprieties of the present occasion will be satisfied with a less comprehensive treatment of the subject. Perhaps the time has not as yet come when this can be done impartially and fully. While the tongue of criticism and complaint is stilled by the shock caused by his death, and in the presence of his sorrowing family and friends, permanent impressions nevertheless exist which will inevitably find expression, when the sadness and sympathy of the hour shall have been forgotten, by those outside of the crushed and sorrowing circle of his family. This element may demand a hearing before a final and accepted judgment shall be entered against his name and fame.

Senator DAVIS was born in Little River County, Ark., on May 6, 1862. His father was Judge Lewis W. Davis, in early life a Baptist clergyman, and subsequently a practicing lawyer of respectable attainments and high character. His mother still survives, and is noted among those who know her as a woman of strong character, superior intelligence, and noble qualities as a wife, mother, and as a leader in the Christian and charitable work of the communities in which she has resided. While the dead Senator was yet a boy his father moved with his family to the county of Pope, where he resided until the time of his death, which occurred a few years since. There young DAVIS spent his boyhood until he entered the University of the State of Arkansas, where he remained for a period less than that required to cover the prescribed course for graduation. Shortly after he left the university he was chosen prosecuting attorney of one of the most important districts of the State. He discharged the duties of that office in a way that strikingly directed to him the attention of a section of the State which largely exceeded the boundaries of his district. At that time there was a well-organized and fierce conflict raging between what was then known as the People's Party and the dominant party of the State.

The young prosecuting attorney was frequently taken from his labors in his district and sent to distant parts of the State to maintain the principles and support of the candidates of the Democratic Party. His methods of debate were unique and forceful, and never failed to leave behind him an impression that caused the event to be recalled for a long time after his departure. About the time he was elected prosecuting attorney he was married to Miss Ina McKenzie, herself the daughter of a Methodist minister. It is worth while, in passing, to call attention to the remarkable contribution made to the effective working forces of society by the pioneer Christian preachers of our frontier civilization. The personal hardships of this ministry, and the rugged qualities of steadfastness to a high purpose which caused them to devote themselves to the salvation of a weak and fallen humanity, reproduced their honesty and masterful qualities of fidelity in an offspring that constitute many of the leaders of the race in the communities where they cast their lot. The history of nearly every community in the Southwest will disclose instances which furnish verification for this observation. The case of Senator DAVIS, and that of his beloved and devoted wife, bear as strong evidence of this as any incident within my personal observation. Senator DAVIS was the beneficiary of much good luck and many fortunate contingencies, but in my humble opinion none of them have so profoundly affected his career as the circumstances which directed his course across the pathway of Ina McKenzie and united his destiny with hers. I enjoyed abundant opportunities for knowing personally that she was a woman of a masterful mind, strong convictions, and of gentle and powerful personality. She was the only person I ever knew who could influence Senator DAVIS against what appeared to be his settled and fixed whims or purposes. With a woman's intuition she knew exactly what he ought to do, and where her judgment conflicted with his, she generally found means to cause her views and wishes to be respected. She was not an unsexed woman who ruled by force of command, but she employed in her conquest womanly qualities only. These she possessed without limit, and by the exertion of them was able to control in such a way as to be in fact the helpmate of her husband, and to become the head of a family of children whose habits, character, and demeanor testify to the fact that while she was familiar with the controversies and methods of affairs outside of the home circle, above all she was at her best in her home. A few years since she died, leaving behind her a mourning family of splendid children and a distressed host of friends, all only too sensible of the fact that they had lost a devoted mother and an inspired counselor. A short time before his death Senator DAVIS was married to Miss Lelia Carter, a member of one of the oldest and most respected families in western Arkansas. A host of devoted friends have tendered the inadequate and unavailing consolation of sympathy to her in the hour of her great bereavement.

Shortly after the termination of his service as prosecuting attorney Senator DAVIS became a candidate for attorney general, one of the most important offices in the State. In those days we did not have what is known as a general or blanket primary election for the selection of party candidates. Each county selected its delegates to the State convention, and the method of selection was determined by each county for itself. These were usually held on different days and by different methods. Some employed a county primary to express the preferences to be supported in the State convention, while some held what is known as township or precinct meetings to select delegates to a county convention, which in turn would express the preference of the county for the particular State offices. There were several candidates in opposition to DAVIS, but the principal one was Prof. Goar, the head of the Arkansas Law School. In nearly every county where a convention had been held the instructions had been given in favor of Prof. Goar, and his nomination was considered a foregone conclusion.

While addressing a meeting of voters in Madison County he suddenly fell dead, and by this sad and sudden event the political history of Arkansas for the intervening years has been cast on lines that could never before have been dreamed of as a possibility. After the death of Prof. Goar the tide of political favor began to turn to Senator DAVIS, so that when the convention assembled he had a majority of 1 vote over all of his competitors, and was nominated on the first ballot. It is part of the history of that struggle that when the tide of popular favor seemed to be running so strongly in the direction of Prof. Goar, Senator DAVIS, realizing his probable defeat, had begun to mature his plans to transfer his residence to the State of Oklahoma. But all this was changed by his election as attorney general. From that time forward began a long career as spectacular and turbulent as that of any man who ever sought public office and political control during a period of peace and in a civilized Commonwealth. Directly upon his entering the attorney general's office the legislature passed an act intended to suppress the depredations of the commercial trusts in so far as their conspiracies contemplated impositions upon the people of the State of Arkansas.

A conflict as to the proper interpretation of this act in its application to insurance companies immediately arose, and the new attorney general construed the statute to mean the absolute exclusion of all such companies from the right to do business in Arkansas if they were associated in any part of the world with any group of companies having a common purpose to control rates. This attitude was sharply antagonized by the friends of the insurance companies, and out of this difference of opinion came a pivotal opportunity which he had the ingenuity to seize and develop into a volume of protests against monopoly that proved sufficient to land him in the governor's office two years later. It is no disparagement to Senator DAVIS to say that two years before these events occurred no one would have ventured the prediction that such a selection was a political possibility. His election to the governorship literally wrecked all the organized political plans and systems that had grown up in the State for half a century. The resulting demoralization and revolution in the administration of public affairs was no surprise to those who knew the real extent of the wreck and ruin wrought upon the established order thereby. His stay of six years in the governor's office was from the very first day to the last a period of audacious activity and a constant warfare upon all the old arrangements and political traditions of the State. As governor he was called upon to make a great many appointments to important public offices. He invariably chose those who might not have expected promotion under the old régime. It is complimentary to the general intelligence and learning of the citizenship of the State that notwithstanding his appointees were chosen from among persons who would not in the regular course be mentioned in connection with the offices they were called upon by him to fill that they invariably "made good" and vindicated in nearly every instance the sound judgment which he exercised when he seemed to depart from the course marked out by the policy of political heredity.

Ingratitude is a very human quality, and it is so freely exercised in the ordinary affairs of men that whilst it is always hated it is never regarded as a stranger and rarely excites surprise. It is complimentary to the sense of appreciation and fidelity of the hosts that he called around him as volunteers serving the purposes of a carefully created, systematically organized, and specially favored "machine" that he was rarely the victim of ingratitude, and those of us who witnessed the 200 or more beneficiaries of his favor as they sorrowfully walked behind the hearse that bore his lifeless body to the grave felt that he had contrived according to a deeper philosophy and a sounder estimate of humanity than many of us suspected when he called around him that body of partisans whom he delighted to call the "Old Guard." The Tenth Legion never established its claim to unswerving fidelity and courage by more unmistakable evidence than did this band of loyal and honored citizens.

Shortly after Senator DAVIS entered upon the discharge of the duties of the governorship he developed a desire to extend his political career to the Senate, and he accordingly began to lay his plans and to develop issues with this end in view. He invited strife in certain quarters in order to furnish him with an issue that he could successfully attack and thereby intensify the partisanship of his friends and account for the expressed hatred of his enemies.

The essential facts evolved from even a casual study of his methods are that he never permitted anyone to become a half-hearted friend nor a concealed enemy. He early realized that half-offended friends might sooner or later find themselves in a position where they could do him more injury by encouraging the warfare of his enemies indirectly than they could as part of the open opposition. Therefore, he never "fell out" halfway with anyone. He knew that in politics the relationship between individuals is one for the advancement of mutual interests, and that such friendships too often endure only so long as mutual rewards bind the coalition. It is doubtless true that many real friendships grow out of the business of politics, but the general course is as he understood it. He frequently found, in making his calculations for future political contingencies, that it would better serve his purpose to force a realignment than be burdened with a possible mutiny of some vital part of his combination at a more critical stage of the conflict.

Thus it happened that at different periods of his political career the same persons were his enemies and friends alternately. When he once accepted a reconciliation with a former enemy he so dealt with him as to convince him that no resentment growing out of past differences remained, and when one of his friends or allies was forced to take up service on the other side he generally ridiculed him, less frequently denounced him, into a state of complete harmlessness. Of course this process could only last as long as he had physical strength and time to go among his fellows and by his personal presence keep them inspired with the sentiments and hostilities of the hour, and to thus communicate to them the fighting spirit of the occasion that only one with his magnetic qualities when aroused could impart. His chief political asset was his power as a stump speaker. In the exercise of this art he exhibited the qualities of a master to a degree that put him in a class to himself. He was not a widely learned man, nor did he desire to be. He was not willing to devote the time and self-denial involved in acquiring familiarity with the views and methods of those who had gone before. He absorbed enough out of the general intelligence of the country to be fairly familiar with many of the leading questions of the day and could discuss them before an audience with a sufficient show of knowledge to impart all the lesson that they seemed willing to absorb. He never concerned himself about mastering in full scope and detail great and absorbing questions, since he felt that he could only make use of such aspects of it as his auditors were willing and desirous of understanding, and that he was therefore engaged in a wholly unprofitable service when he talked over the heads of those who listened to him.

He knew humanity as few people know it. He did not deal largely with individuals. In fact, as the methods of practical politics are known and practiced he was not a great mixer. He did not have an accurate memory for names and faces, nor did he seek to make a distinct impression upon particular individuals. He stood fairly well with the whole crowd and said or did something on every occasion that might be recalled in connection with approving comment by nearly everyone who heard him. If any disagreed with him they were never in doubt as to the course they would pursue. He was essentially a fighter, and by pursuing tactics that aroused everyone else to the fighting mood he found it easy to enumerate his followers and to know his enemies.

Those who were not for him were against him. There was no noncommittal element in the State when we was up for election. Whether he studied to a finality the philosophy which committed him to this policy, I do not know, but he mastered it as supremely as if he had, and practiced it with a precision and uniformity that could not have been excelled, no matter how closely he might have considered it. To an ordinary campaigner this is a dangerous course, and all that was needed to make it a fatal course was sufficient time, because it is as true in politics as in other lines of effort that friends fall away from one's standard more rapidly than his enemies forgive him. Napoleon was never more successful in turning the assaults of an enemy in war than he was in minimizing to nothingness the assaults of his enemies in politics, and mainly by the power of ridicule and denunciation. He never courted sympathy, because it was certain that his enemies would never extend it, and his friends were bound to him by more virile and enduring forces.

Probably much of his success as a popular leader was due to the fact that he came into political prominence at a time when there existed a widespread and deep-seated belief in the public mind that the powers of the Government were being exerted unfairly in favor of the few and against the interests of the many. The unequal distribution of the wealth and favors of the land were a monumental and simple object lesson that called for an explanation and invited an attempt to apply a remedy. He capitalized this spirit of unrest because he did not seem to understand the situation differently from the people generally. In fact, it was not necessary to understand the underlying philosophy of the cause of it. The fact itself was sufficient to demand a thorough investigation and the application of a remedy, even if fundamentals must be modified in order to prevent a continuance of these conditions. He therefore took as his text the actual inequalities of the situation, the existence of which all seemed to be aware, and from the effects of which nearly everyone was easily made to understand he was a victim. Many who heard him did not care so much for the feasibility of any suggested remedy as they did to have voice given to their conscious dissatisfaction. He supplied this, and in full measure, and was thus relieved from working out his political advancement by the slower process of less-gifted aspirants.

I happen to know that he was not satisfied with his career in the Senate. He accounted for that in many ways, and always promised himself that with more favorable conditions he would be able to place his services here upon a higher plane of achievement in the future. When he first appeared in the Senate he was smarting under the resentment of wholesale and unwarranted attacks that had been made upon him, and a sort of spirit of retaliation seemed to linger with him and to somewhat direct and control his actions and expressions. Long separation from his professional activities and a constant and large outlay incident to an almost constant necessity for campaigning had drawn heavily upon his none too large estate, so that after he entered the Senate he found it necessary to devote much of his time to the paramount obligations of his family. His attention was therefore largely withdrawn from his official duties, and his enforced absence from the Senate thus prevented him from becoming familiar with that routine which is so essential to effective work here. When taunted by his opponents because of the modest extent of his achievements here, he found no difficulty in parrying a thrust which must have proven dangerous to almost any other candidate. He replied that when he came to the Senate he found it governed by traditions and customs that prevented proper recognition of the voice of the people, because its deliberations were dominated by standpatters and reactionaries, Democrats and Republicans alike, and that at the outset of his career he conceived it to be his highest duty to aid in creating a public opinion that would cause the people to replace these customs with those which would make more largely for independence, and its membership a keener appreciation of what the people were entitled to, and a firmer determination to achieve it for them. He enlarged upon this idea extensively and presented it most attractively.

It was evident to those who were more intimately acquainted with his real opinion that he knew as well as anyone else could know that his frequent and long-continued absences were interfering with the efficiency of his service here. He readily admitted as much before the last State convention, which declared his nomination for a second term, when he said that he was most gratified to be able to say that his business affairs were now in such condition that he could promise a more constant service in Washington, but no more loyal or devoted one. He said it was his purpose to take upon himself the task of mastering some of the current problems of the day, and he hoped to make himself useful in evolving and applying remedies of a substantial character. His assurance was most gratifying to his friends and followers, who found more difficulty than he did in causing his first explanation to be accepted. In the latter days of his life I found him more disposed to diligently investigate affairs of larger import than in former days, and I noticed an increasing absence of that intemperate form of expression which usually characterized his comment on official matters. I was much impressed with the belief that it was his fixed purpose to achieve a name here that would be creditable to him, and he knew affairs of this life well enough to know that he could only do this by the severest toil and the closest application to his duties. This change of attitude toward the service here was most gratifying to me, and encouraged the belief that if he should marshal into a coherent force the great qualities of energy, magnetism, and sincerity which he possessed and devote this combination to the achievement of the substantial things in which his people were interested his task would be easily and creditably performed.

There are multitudes who believe that he died too soon to afford an opportunity for a proper estimate of his real capacity and real purposes. His enemies believed him to be a mere self-seeking demagogue, who would not scruple to take advantage of any want of information or misinformation of his followers to advance his own political fortunes, while a larger number of devoted friends reassured themselves with the conviction that he had a real capacity for statesmanship, and that after he had achieved a position where his own tenure was secure and his apprenticeship ended he would manifest the qualities of industry and constructive ability that would show him to be a real man among men in managing the affairs of the Nation. This question may now never be answered to the satisfaction and acceptance of all. I personally knew much of him, and I know that his intellectual qualities never were understood and appreciated to the extent that they deserved. While attracting one class he repelled another, and thus he submitted the question of his real ability and worth to a jury that may now never render a unanimous verdict. He was a greater lawyer than he ever got credit for being, and he was a more powerful intellectual force than casual observers ever believed to be the case. It is creditable to State pride to know that his death has now silenced every criticism and that there is real sorrow throughout the Commonwealth to-day because of the event which we so regretfully commemorate to-day.

Mr. BRYAN. Mr. President, Arkansas was generous to JEFF DAVIS in the honors she conferred upon him. He was elected by the people of that State prosecuting attorney for two terms, attorney general for one term, governor three times in succession, and United States Senator twice in succession. He was in public life 20 years, held the highest offices within the gift of the people of a great State, and died at the early age of 50 years. The bare recital of these achievements proclaim him a remarkable man.

It is not by accident that a public man wins and retains public confidence and respect for so long a time in the great offices of governor and United States Senator. The white light of publicity is thrown upon the record as it is written, and there will always be found those who are ready to take advantage of every opportunity to criticize adversely and to condemn.

Senator DAVIS did not attain his success by default. He met and overcame opposition, sometimes of the fiercest, at every stage of his career. He had to fight his way.

We all of us have our faults. JEFF DAVIS had his. I am sure he would not have us pretend otherwise for him. Moreover, men were not slow to call attention to these faults while he lived. He had his loyal friends and supporters, who would not believe anything except good of him, and he had also his bitter enemies. He reciprocated in kind the feelings of each, with all the fervor of a strong, dominant, uncompromising nature. He asked no quarter and he gave none. He never surrendered to any foe save death—the great conqueror of us all.

The sudden ending of his earthly career seemed to draw closer to him the friends of a lifetime, and also to eradicate altogether the small and unimportant differences that had existed between him and those who had opposed him.

It was my privilege to attend his funeral. I saw his loyal friends from every part of the State, and was impressed by the unusual circumstance that a large number of them marched in a body to his last resting place. I inquired of some of those whom I met, to ascertain the secret of the success of this interesting man, and from the information thus gathered, I attribute his success—

First, to his unselfish fight for his party in the days when both the great political parties were strong contenders in his State for public favor, and

Second, to the claim, which seems well founded, that he always remained loyal to his friends, who believed that in him they had not only an able but a courageous leader.

Mr. ASHURST. Mr. President, in obedience to a generous impulse of the human heart, the Senate of the United States, in the midst of its labors, at the closing hours of Congress, when every moment of time is precious, pauses to pay tribute to the memory of another of its deceased Members, and to contemplate what has always been regarded as the most profound of life's mysteries—the mystery of death and the grave. At the grave Alexander left his worlds unconquered, and the rich man parted with his gold. At the grave Mozart apparently gave up his music, Lord Bacon forgot his learning, and Sir Isaac Newton abandoned philosophy and mathematics; at the grave friend is unlocked from the arm of friend and seemingly is thrust into everlasting and pulseless silence where ambition can no longer inspire nor glory thrill. During the Sixty-second Congress the greedy grave, whose ponderous jaws are never filled, removed from the Senate six Senators and its honored and beloved presiding officer, the Vice President of the United States. Indeed, Mr. President, it is startling to realize that such a large percentage of Senators die in service.

From that memorable day—Monday, April 6, 1789, when Richard Henry Lee, of Virginia, appeared and took his seat and thus formed a quorum of the whole Senators of the United States for the first meeting of the Senate—down to this date eleven hundred men have been elected to membership in this body, and out of this roster 149 of them, or $13\frac{6}{11}$ per cent of the whole number elected to membership, died while in service, Senator JEFF DAVIS, of Arkansas, being the hundred and forty-ninth Senator to die in service. This list of eleven hundred men elected to membership in this body contains the names of strong men and weak men; the names of philosophers, philanthropists, and constructive statesmen; contemplative thinkers whose classic features have been preserved to us by the sculptor and the portrait painter; men wearing the bloody gantlets of war; men wearing soft gloves of peace; men who opened and closed the purse of the Nation as they saw fit; men whose inelegant ostentation caused them to use their enormous wealth unwisely and unbecomingly; the names of sturdy farmers from New England's rock-bound coast; men fresh from the farms of the Middle States; planters from the Southern States; argonauts, ranchers, miners, cowboys, and Indian fighters from the Western States; orators who possessed, as was said of Mirabeau, "a tongue of fire steeped in honey"; the names of physicians who annihilate pain, who minister to the ills to which human flesh is subject, and who "charm ache with air and agony with ether"; historians, scholars, divines, and captains of industry; in fact, men of every creed, occupation, profession, and calling; men of valor, honor, and imperishable renown; men who, step after step, by honorable public service, raised themselves from the ground floor of log cabins to the highest eminence of human distinction, and a remarkably small percentage of men who, during or after service here, so misbehaved themselves that they blighted their greatness and fame.

Contemplating this long list of men, it is not excessive eulogy to say that history will record JEFF DAVIS, of Arkansas, as one of the strong and striking characters that have come to this body. He was a faithful friend and a faithful enemy; at times in his life scorn and contumely were heaped upon him, but he always returned war for war, blow for blow, and scorn for scorn. He was "lofty and sour to those who loved him not; but to those who sought him, sweet as summer." He had, or affected to have, a profound indifference as to whether other men liked him. To his opponents he always presented defiant belligerency or supercilious disdain, but through the cracks of the rough veneer of this man there was to be seen and felt a warm, honest, and loyal heart. He was an inveterate foe to what he conceived to be shams, frivolities, and frills.

I said a moment ago that he was a strong man. Mr. President, no person could have been victorious in so many conflicts as was JEFF DAVIS and have attached to himself so many ardent and loyal friends unless he were indeed a very strong man. His friends clung to him with a beautiful fidelity, and neither time, nor change, nor false report could alienate their affections. He understood and appreciated perfectly the wants and desires of poor people. He was familiar with the disappointments of their daily life; he knew their broken ambitions. He knew the high and too frequently the baffled hopes of those who moil and toil; he was the especial advocate and friend of those men who, uncomplainingly, from day to day, met danger upon the trains, in the mines, and in the workshops, and it is recorded that in every lawsuit in which he took part he was invariably on the side of those who most needed help and mercy and to whom life, like the shirt of Nessus, the longer worn the more deeply it chafed the raw flesh and naked nerve. The accomplishment of these things writes JEFF DAVIS down as a strong man.

On the night of the 2d of January of this year he was seized by the sudden return of a disorder which had clamped itself about his heart some months previously. He called for his son to send for a physician, but before the physician could arrive JEFF DAVIS took his seat in the parliament of the skies.

Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey. Mr. President, JEFF DAVIS was a great, splendid specimen of manhood. My acquaintance with him was of but short duration. We seemed, however, during the little time we knew each other to rub one another the right way from the very first we met, and hence each day with him to me was a day of delight and pleasantness. JEFF DAVIS, blessed with a splendid physique and strong personality, seemed to be a man who might reach a record of fourscore years and ten. We were congenial friends at once; his frankness and candor captivated me.

Twice during our acquaintance he said to me, however, when I mentioned his seemingly good health, "I am not altogether myself, MARTINE; I am not well. While I can not leave to my family great wealth I mean to leave them the history of an honest man"; and, as God knows, I believe he did.

I feel that the best gauge, Mr. President, of a man is the opinion of his fellow citizens. As one of a delegation appointed by the President of this body to attend his funeral, we went on our sad mission, and as we reached the beautiful city of Little Rock, Ark., his home, sadness seemed to pervade the people on all sides; flags were at half-mast, and gloom seemed everywhere apparent.

Does some one say that JEFF DAVIS was bluff and blunt, different from others? Yes; in a way he was, but has not the great God of the universe in His wisdom made different shades in the foliage of a forest, yet all blending in a harmonious hue, all most pleasing to the eye? And so, even though JEFF DAVIS God had molded and characterized in a different way, yet JEFF DAVIS, broad, generous, liberal-hearted, and kind, was a splendid specimen of his Maker, an honest man.

On all sides as we wandered around the streets of that beautiful city we would hear knots of men and see a gathering of tearful women all bewailing the loss of their splendid fellow citizen, JEFF DAVIS. Rich and poor, white and black, all gathered in the tearful cortege to do his memory honor.

I feel, my friends, that as the day went by and as the sun went down all humanity seemed to testify that there had been laid away a loyal friend, a true husband, a loving father, a patriot, and a statesman.

Mr. KAVANAUGH. Mr. President, it is not simply a perfunctory compliance with an established custom that I ask the indulgence of the Senate for a few minutes, but a desire upon my part to deliver in these Halls, where he served with distinction, a tribute to the memory of my friend the late Senator JEFF DAVIS.

He was my personal and political friend for a period of almost a quarter of a century. Our friendship began before he had been drawn into the maelstrom of political life, where he gained his greatest achievements, and before I had been chained to the treadmill of business. During all this time the bonds of friendship had grown stronger and stronger, and as time rolled on I learned to love and appreciate the many good qualities of my friend whose loss we mourn to-night.

Senator DAVIS was born in 1862 midst the strife of that fratricidal conflict which came so near wrecking this Nation. It has been suggested that the spirit of the times impressed itself upon his nature, which, after lying dormant through the period of childhood and boyhood, asserted itself as soon as he entered public life. The only offspring of indulgent parents, he was given every advantage which his surroundings and the circumstances would permit. We find him, while yet a youth, admitted to the bar and to membership in the law firm of which his honored father was the senior partner. He soon became interested in politics, and from the time he entered the arena until the moment of his untimely death he was the "stormy petrel" of Arkansas public life. During his political career he overturned time-honored precedents, ignored cherished and sacred traditions, and ruthlessly shattered the political alignments of a half century, and for what? His enemies said he did all of these things to gratify an inordinate and selfish ambition. He and his friends said he was actuated only by a desire to serve the great common people, whose champion he was, and to restore the affairs of government to the simplicity and democracy of the forefathers. As citizen, attorney, and statesman his every act and utterance was in behalf of those whom he termed "the under dogs in the battle of life."

In passing an eulogy upon his life at the grave a noted jurist of his native State said:

> He was not very well suited to try a cause for a rich citizen against a common citizen * * *. His feeling and sympathies were intensely human.

He held successively the offices of prosecuting attorney of his district, attorney general and governor of his State, and United States Senator. The secret of his great political success was that he never allowed himself to be placed on the defensive. He was so resourceful in maneuvering that he always found—and if he could not find it he made it—an opening for attack upon his adversary, and once the attack was begun he pursued it aggressively, fearlessly, and, his enemies said, ruthlessly. As an illustration of his boldness in political matters, I have known him while engaged in a contest to advocate on the stump the cause of another who was a candidate for a different office, or, upon the other hand, to assail another who was a candidate for a different office, when he deemed the man unworthy or that he was advocating a cause which Senator DAVIS did not approve. It may well be imagined that this brought down upon his head the maledictions of many people who might otherwise have not enrolled themselves among his enemies. Despite such daring actions his onward march to success was never interrupted.

His friends fairly idolized him and with one accord indorsed his policies and actions. His enemies denounced him as a demagogue and a disturber, a destroyer of reputations. It has been said that he was the most beloved man, and, at the same time, the worst hated man in all Arkansas, but after all the denunciations have been summed up, his worst enemy has never accused him of dishonesty or corruption. In fact, his bitterest enemies, while railing at his successes and denouncing his methods, admitted the sincerity of his purpose and his devotion to principle. One of his most unrelenting critics was another friend of mine who succeeded by appointment to the vacancy caused by the death of Senator DAVIS. He is the editor of a great newspaper, the oldest, I believe, published west of the Mississippi River. In his newspaper, on the 31st of March of last year, he said:

> In his race for a second term in the United States Senate Senator JEFF DAVIS has again shown his consummate skill in the pleading of his political cause before the jury of the people. Former Congressman Stephen Brundidge has fought a great fight—and at this writing has not made admission of defeat—in contest with the man against whom no foeman has been able to prevail these years he has held one high office after another. JEFF DAVIS is, in fact, one of the most remarkable campaigners and one of the most successful popular advocates American politics has produced. He puts his hand in the public hand and gives it a grip that makes a firm and feeling bond between. Thousands of people, men and women, look on him as their champion, their guardian, their safety, and their hope. He makes his wounds and injuries theirs, and they would avenge them as they would their own.

Thus, you see, those who opposed him realized his elements of strength. He was wont to say: "My friends are always right to me." And he expected his friends to reciprocate that feeling to the extent of its complete acceptance. He despised hypocrisy, he eschewed formality, and democratic simplicity marked the entire conduct of his life. This was the side of the life of Senator DAVIS which was presented to the public, and in presenting it I have stated it candidly and correctly as I have seen it. As I have said before, we were friends and neighbors.

Our associations lay along widely divergent lines and our opinions of matters and men were often far apart, but each respected the opinion of the other and we were always able, after a thorough discussion, to reach an understanding which in no wise affected our friendship, and it is as such a friend I speak to-day.

But, Mr. President, there is another side of the life of Senator DAVIS I desire to present, and that is the best and the most beautiful—his home life. No man ever lived who enjoyed a more ideal home life than he. He was twice married. His first marriage was to Miss Ina McKenzie and to them were born 12 children, 8 of whom live to bless and honor the names of the parents who gave them birth. There was no service Senator DAVIS would not perform; there was no sacrifice that he could not make that would add to the pleasure or comfort of his family. He saw to it that his children were given every educational and social advantage that would enable them to make of themselves useful men and women, and to-day there are no brighter, sweeter, gentler young men or women, boys or girls, in the city of Little Rock than the children of Senator DAVIS. His first wife was one of the noblest women it has been my good fortune to know. Senator DAVIS fairly idolized her and was often heard to say he owed everything he was to her. His second marriage to Miss Leila Carter was no less happy. She entered into the spirit of his ambitions and assisted in his duties as only a devoted helpmate can do and to-day in their home in the city of Little Rock she, the bride of a year, and the children of her husband and the aged mother of our departed friend, mingle their tears and sorrows together while trying to fathom the mysteries of fate that has taken from them their protector at the hour when he was most needed, comforted only by the thoughts that He does all things for the best—will care for them and so guide their lives that there will be a happy reunion beyond.

And now, Mr. President, may we not unite in saying: A chieftain has fallen, peace to his ashes, all honor to his memory!

MEMORIAL ADDRESSES ON THE LATE REPRESENTATIVE SYLVESTER C. SMITH.

Mr. PERKINS. Mr. President, I ask the Chair to lay before the Senate resolutions from the House of Representatives on the death of the late Representative SYLVESTER C. SMITH.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. PAGE in the chair). The Chair lays before the Senate resolutions from the House of Representatives, which will be read.

The Secretary read the resolutions, as follows:

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,
February 23, 1913.

Resolved, That the Clerk send a copy of these resolutions to the family of the deceased.

Mr. PERKINS. Mr. President, I offer the resolutions which I send to the desk, and ask for their adoption.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from California offers resolutions, which will be read.

The resolutions (S. Res. 493) were read, considered by unanimous consent, and unanimously agreed to, as follows:

Resolved, That the Senate has heard with deep sorrow of the death of Hon. SYLVESTER CLARK SMITH, late a Member of the House of Representatives from the State of California.

Resolved, That as a mark of respect to the memory of the deceased the business of the Senate be suspended in order that proper tribute may be paid his high character and distinguished public services.

Resolved, That the Secretary communicate a copy of these resolutions to the House of Representatives and to the family of the deceased.

Mr. PERKINS. Mr. President, in the death of SYLVESTER C. SMITH California has lost one of the ablest and most conscientious men who ever represented that State in Congress.

When just of age he went from Iowa to the Pacific coast, at about the time when the first signs of that rapid growth which has since characterized the Golden State began to manifest themselves.

He began life there by teaching in the interior valleys, and soon selected as his permanent abode Bakersfield, at the upper end of the San Joaquin Valley, which region was then sparsely settled and the inhabitants engaged in agriculture of a comparatively primitive character.

His energy and ambition were marked and were demonstrated in his study of law while pursuing the arduous calling of teaching. On admittance to the bar he at once identified himself with the efforts of the people to develop the vast resources of that part of the State.

Ordinarily the region was apparently barren, owing to lack of rainfall. The great need was water, and when the farmers began to agitate the subject of irrigation he threw himself into the movement with his whole heart, and to his intelligent and constant work is due in a very great measure the present surprising prosperity of the San Joaquin Valley.

In the prosecution of his public-spirited designs he became editor and later proprietor of the leading newspaper in that part of the State, and he retained his connection with it up to the time of his death.

In law, in journalism, and in politics he worked constantly for the public good, and he had the satisfaction of seeing that his efforts were appreciated and his influence sought in every movement for the advancement of the community in which he lived and of the entire State.

He was the active friend of irrigation everywhere, and early perceived the necessity for conserving the forests for the benefit of the dwellers in the valleys.

He came into contact with the hardy and adventurous cultivators of the soil in many ways, and studied their needs and resources.

He thus very early became aware of the general desire among farmers for a parcel post, and from the time he entered Congress he endeavored to secure official data to show the widespread demand for parcel-post service, particularly for those living in rural districts.

The establishment of the parcel post as it now exists is in no small degree due to his influence and belief in its power to benefit the farmer.

In connection with irrigation he came into personal contact with the great movement to develop the water resources of the mountains for power purposes.

In speaking in Congress on this subject he said:

> In the district which I have the honor to represent here many thousands of dry and sterile acres have been made fruitful—are now golden and purple with the orange and the grape—and thousands have found happy homes because power from a mountain stream makes pumping for irrigation possible.

Development in this direction has just begun. Hundreds of thousands of acres yet await the advent of the home builder and the pump.

Villages and towns may have productive industries because of the presence of suitable power facilities, and modern lines of transportation are made possible in the same way.

This prediction has been fulfilled, and the development in manufacturing and in transportation facilities in California through the use of streams to develop electric power has been marvelous, and this source of power has as yet been only touched.

His knowledge of land laws and his intimate acquaintance with the public lands and questions growing out of them caused him to be selected as a member of the Public Lands Committee, on which he served throughout his congressional career, and of which he became one of the most useful and influential members.

He took a deep interest in educational subjects, and served also on the Committee on Education, where his early experience as a teacher made his service of great value.

Congressman SMITH was very zealous in his advocacy of the Panama-Pacific Exposition at San Francisco, realizing that the celebration of the opening of the canal would mark the beginning of a new era for his State.

He had seen the wonderful growth in population and in production during the time of his residence in California, and realized that the growth in the immediate future would far surpass that of the past.

He had seen the population increase threefold, and the rural population increase even in the past 10 years from 7.8 per square mile to 15.2.

And the increase was in the direction in which he had always labored—to build up interior counties, to settle the vast spaces left uncultivated, to diversify crops, and to add to the true wealth of the State by bringing every acre of land under cultivation.

He saw this object in a fair way of accomplishment, and to this his own efforts in no small degree contributed.

He was ambitious to show to the world through the exposition what California is and of what it is capable, and he was firm in the belief that the Panama Canal would eventually make the Pacific coast the most populous and the most prosperous portion of our great country.

He also did good work as member of the Committee on Pacific Railroads and the Committee on Labor, in which subjects he was unusually informed.

In the discussion of all questions before the House, in which he took an interest, Congressman SMITH displayed a clear and logical mind, and a grasp of subject which made him one of the strong men of that body, and commanded confidence in his judgment.

This was specially observable in all that related to land matters, to post-office affairs, to public utilities, and the development of the resources of the country.

Financial questions were debated by him with such clearness and manifest command of the subjects and wide knowledge of business methods that his advice was sought by the Monetary Commission, of which he was made a member and on which he served with conspicuous ability.

In everything that could need the welfare of the common people of the United States, as well as that of the mass of the people of California in particular, Congressman SMITH took a prominent part. Having to do, from the commencement of his career, with the hard-working, industrious, and ambitious tillers of the soil, he knew them intimately, sympathized with them, and entered heart and soul into their efforts to better conditions, with which he was perfectly familiar. To work of this kind he devoted his best talents, and in all the discussions in Congress in which he took part there is observable that kindly and helpful spirit in respect to persons of this class which endeared him to them and aroused in them implicit confidence in him as a public man.

In treating of questions involving the betterment of the conditions of the people in California as elsewhere, it is a notable characteristic that he dealt in simple fundamental facts, to which he applied his wide knowledge of law, and his arguments and advice were received with a respect which was full acknowledgment of his unselfishness, honesty, and ability.

During the last few years of his life his devotion to what he deemed his duty was as steadfast as when he was in the fullness of his strength.

He was ever engaged in work for the common good, even when his failing health was such as to alarm his friends.

His death itself is believed to have been very materially hastened by the work he did in behalf of temperance in his home city.

Up to the very end he was engaged with all the strength he could command in an effort to better conditions in relation to the liquor traffic.

He died, as he lived, fighting for what he believed to be right, and for the advancement of the interests of the public which he served with all the strength and ability that in him lay.

May we so live that when the last summons comes, as it must to us all sooner or later, our friends and relatives can say of us as we do of him, that he fearlessly did his duty and left a legacy of character and honor which is beyond price.

Sunset and evening star,
And one clear call for me!
And may there be no moaning of the bar
When I put out to sea.

Twilight and evening bell,
And after that the dark!
And may there be no sadness of farewell
When I embark.

For though from out our bourne of time and place
The flood may bear me far,
I hope to see my Pilot face to face
When I have crossed the bar.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Mr. President, I deem it a melancholy privilege, in supporting the resolutions presented by the Senator from California [Mr. PERKINS] in memory of former Representative SMITH, from that State, to testify to his public service as a Member of the House of Representatives. It was my pleasure while serving in that House to know Mr. SMITH. I saw him come there from his far-distant constituency; I witnessed his advent as a new and inexperienced legislator; and I saw the earnestness and sincerity, as well as the ability and loyalty, with which he took hold of his public duties.

Almost from the very first Representative SMITH attracted attention even in that very large body of which he was a Member. His fidelity and his industry in his work upon the questions that particularly interested the people of California and the West generally, coupled with his natural eloquence as a public speaker, made him at once a leader among the western Members in the House of Representatives.

In debate his style was incisive, direct, and forceful; but there was in his voice something of the clarion call, which at once attracted attention and brought support. Had he lived to enjoy longer service, I have no doubt he would have attained a reputation far beyond the ordinary. As it was, among the Members of the House he had attained such a position when his service closed that he was properly regarded as a leader and as a faithful servant of the people, loyal to their interests and eloquent in defending them.

The West has perhaps been at a disadvantage, Mr. President, in sending its Representatives to the Capitol. It has not, as a rule, kept them here long enough to give them that experience which has marked the service of Representatives from other portions of the country, but Representative SMITH was a Member who in a short term of service, by the brilliant qualities of his mind and by his faithfulness and fidelity to duty, marked himself as a natural leader of men and an admirable public servant.

Mr. GRONNA. Mr. President, I shall not attempt to add anything of worth to what has been said concerning the life history of Mr. SYLVESTER CLARK SMITH, a late Representative from the State of California. That has been so beautifully pictured by Senators who have preceded me. But I can not allow this opportunity to pass without paying a last tribute of respect to his life and memory as a man and his worth as a legislator during the time we served together as Members of the House of Representatives.

I first became acquainted with Mr. SMITH at the beginning of the Fifty-ninth Congress. We both came to Congress at the same time and both were appointed on the Committee on Public Lands and served for a period of nearly six years, during which time this committee had before it many complicated questions which were difficult to solve.

Mr. SMITH was a strong factor in shaping the legislation that came before this committee. By his profound and logical reasoning he early demonstrated his ability as a legislator. His frank and consistent position won for him the admiration of not only those who agreed with him but also those who opposed him in the views which he held.

Mr. SMITH was a strong partisan, an ardent Republican of the old school. He believed in party organization and party responsibility. I did not always agree with him on the policies to be pursued in maintaining a party, nor did I always agree with him on legislation, but whether we agreed or disagreed on policies and certain principles I always admired him for his frankness and the courageous stand he took upon public questions which vitally concerned the people. Mr. SMITH had an aptitude for legislative work, he was a profound student, a forceful speaker, and a ready debater. I was among those who early became his friend; he won the admiration of the entire membership of the House for the courage and the ability he possessed.

We often wonder why a person is taken away just at a time when his work has begun to show results and his usefulness to society is most sadly missed, but it is something beyond human power to fully comprehend the mysteries of life and death. We only know that life is uncertain; our days of earthly existence may be many or they may be few; and it is all under the control and guidance of the Omnipotent Ruler of the universe.

Mr. SHEPPARD. Mr. President, through several Congresses I was a Member of the House of Representatives with SYLVESTER CLARK SMITH. My acquaintance with him was not intimate, but I knew him sufficiently well to grasp his distinctive qualities. He was affiliated with the Republican Party, to which he gave a vigorous and unswerving devotion. Associated as I was with the Democratic side of the House, coming from a different section of the country, with different traditions and a different environment, connected with different committees and adopting a different line of congressional work, I did not have the opportunity to develop with Mr. SMITH more than the usual relations between Representatives thus situated.

Our nearest and dearest friends are rarely in position to judge our lives with true discrimination and impartiality. Affection frequently blinds them to our faults and leads them to magnify our virtues. It often happens that our antagonists in the various struggles of life are most capable of weighing the real significance of what we do and say. Our opponents, by compelling us to keep our weapons sharp and ready, bring out what is best and strongest in us while we live, and sometimes become our sincerest eulogists when we die.

From my place among the Democrats of the House of Representatives I came to recognize in SYLVESTER SMITH one of the most effective and interesting figures among the Republicans of that historic Chamber. His manner was always emphatic, his ideas original and unique, his language clear and forceful. His voice would penetrate the tumult of congressional debate as the note of a trumpet pierces the crash of battle. Firm in conviction, quick in action, convincing in argument, lucid in expression, he was on the threshold of a great national career when disease laid its pitiless hand upon him.

He was energy itself in the service of his constituents. In visiting the departments, in appearing before committees, in advocating measures on the floor of the House for the benefit of his district and his State he was as absolutely untiring and uniformly successful. Loyal as he was to local interests, true as he was to party principle, he was equally devoted to the welfare of the country as a whole, and a genuine patriotism illumined both his public and private life.

Mr. President, the impression SYLVESTER SMITH has left in my memory is that of a strong intellect, an honest heart, a virile personality, a statesman of unusual force, an advocate of unusual power, a great and pure American.

May all the peace immortals know be his; may more such men be ours.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The resolutions submitted by the Senator from South Carolina will be read.

The resolutions (S. Res. 492) were read, considered by unanimous consent, and unanimously agreed to, as follows:

Resolved, That the Senate expresses its profound sorrow on account of the death of the Hon. GEORGE S. LEGARE, late a Member of the House of Representatives from the State of South Carolina.

Resolved, That the business of the Senate be now suspended in order that fitting tribute may be paid his high character and distinguished public services.

Resolved, That the Secretary communicate a copy of these resolutions to the House of Representatives and to the family of the deceased.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. Mr. President, those not familiar with the conditions in the South during the first two decades subsequent to the war between the States can form no adequate conception of the struggle to maintain a scanty livelihood and the South's civilization. The war drained our resources, impoverished our people, and placed us in a position where the first and indispensable consideration was the means of obtaining food and clothing.

Schools were closed because the children were necessary to help supplement the efforts of their parents in this struggle. The father and mothers of the South appreciated then, as they do now, the necessity for education, but were unable materially to assist their children in obtaining it.

The marvelous advancement in the material wealth of this section is not the greatest commentary upon the spirit, resourcefulness, and character of the southern people. The most lasting and glorious monument to their indomitable courage and high ideals is in the fact that, in spite of conditions unparalleled in the history of a civilized people, in spite of poverty, in spite of the temporary domination of alien forces, they still maintained their ideals and kept burning on the altar of their institutions the fires of education and progress.

The inherited spirit of a long line of indomitable ancestors fired the hearts of the children; born in these adverse circumstances, from the ashes of disaster these arose to march undaunted to the ultimate goal of education, of refinement, and culture to the achievement of material, mental, and moral wealth.

There is perhaps no page of history which, if it was written in all its fullness, would become such a lesson of inspiration and hope as the history of the struggle of the youth of the South during these dark days.

The glory won on a thousand battle fields, the proof of heroism there given, the unconquerable nerve and courage there displayed do not surpass that displayed by the boys and girls of the South in their struggle to conquer the difficulties surrounding them and to maintain their birthright.

Congressman LEGARE, like many another, was a victim of these circumstances. But with a keen appreciation of the condition in which he found himself, and a desire to overcome these conditions, he set himself resolutely to the battle before him. His fight for success, though but the common history of many another, does not detract one jot or tittle from the measure of praise due him.

He was born on Wardemaylaw Island, near Charleston, in 1870.

In boyhood, he removed to Charleston and engaged in the dairy business. The money that he saved from this occupation he used in paying for his education. He was fortunate in being in a city where there were, perhaps, the best facilities for education then in the State. He took a course at the Porter Military Academy and then spent two years at the University of South Carolina.

Congressman George D. Tillman gave him a clerkship here in Washington. This gave him an opportunity of completing his legal education. He attended the law school of Georgetown University. At this time he had the opportunity of acquiring an insight into congressional life, of which he availed himself, as his subsequent life fully attested. He graduated from the Georgetown University in 1893 and was admitted to practice in the courts of South Carolina in the same year. He located in Charleston, and in the course of his successful practice he became associated with the firm of Murphy, Farrow & Legare, one of the best-known and most successful law firms in eastern South Carolina. After the death of Mr. Farrow, the firm name was continued as that of Murphy & Legare. During the latter years of his life, he practiced law by himself until the condition of his health forced him to retire from active practice. Mr. LEGARE was one of the strong jury lawyers of the Charleston bar. He was a man of remarkable personal magnetism. He had to a preeminent degree the personal characteristics that make for popularity and success—a clear thinker, a good storyteller, of a genial disposition. These characteristics enabled him to make friends wherever he went and served him in attaining success, both in private and public life.

He was elected corporation counsel of the city of Charleston and held this position until 1903, at which time he was elected to Congress.

The characteristics above referred to made him one of the best-loved and most popular Members of that great body. Members of both political parties loved him. And in his native State, both rich and poor, black and white, got close to the heart of GEORGE LEGARE.

Others will speak of his domestic and private life.

Mr. LEGARE died in the prime of his manhood. For years he was fully aware of the fate that awaited him. He was thoroughly conscious that the end must come to him soon. He displayed the same courage in face of this unconquerable foe as he had displayed in the presence of difficulties which he had overcome, and went to his doom with a splendid fortitude.

The perfection of a circle does not depend upon the length of its diameter. And the lesson of the short, bright, successful life of GEORGE LEGARE is as perfect as though it had spanned the circle of three score years and ten and had gone out in the mellow glow of the natural evening of life.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President, the Senate has just heard the story of the struggle of a broken family in the South to reestablish itself. I need not, therefore, dwell upon that, though I had thought I would. It is an old problem, very dear to my heart.

GEORGE S. LEGARE was of old Huguenot stock, of that superb breed of honest, sturdy, middle-class Frenchmen who in south and central France resisted religious and political oppression to the death point, welcoming cessation of life rather than lame surrender of conviction in life.

When Louis XIV rescinded the Edict of Nantes he prepared for struggle in many countries an army of French immigrants, against whom France, in great crisis, struggled in diplomacy and upon the battle field in vain for very many decades. They carried to other lands arts, industry, simple living, and high thinking, and to no other country was it carried by them more than to South Carolina. The Legare family afterwards became typical in American national thought of southern slave-holding aristocracy, so much so that the name, without any basis of fact, was taken as parcel of Mrs. Stowe's indictment of the South in Uncle Tom's Cabin.

It will be news to many that no better democrats ever lived than GEORGE LEGARE and his family preceding him. If they shared any feeling of aristocracy at all, it was one in favor of clean speech, wife-loving domesticity, and loyalty to superior intelligence, breeding, and character wherever it might exist. If this be aristocracy, I profess no animosity to it.

South Carolina's record as a State of courage and initiative has been chiefly due to its Huguenot and Scotch-Irish traditions and ideals, its passion for religious and individual liberty and self-government, its passion for emphasizing the man and God, the only two realities in a spiritual sense.

GEORGE LEGARE was a gentleman, every inch of him, physically, mentally, and morally. If to be a gentleman be to be an aristocrat, I again confess no animosity to aristocracy. Lovable, loving, manly in strength, womanly in sacrifice and in devotion to ideals and in tender-heartedness, I lay my wreath upon his bier. Suffering for many years with a known advertisement of death, apt to visit him at any moment, he never faltered, but carried a smile with superb courage to the grave.

May God soften a blow harder than most deaths would be to the wife who was like him and to the ancient lineage of which he was so worthy a representative. In his lifetime he never asked and never refused quarter. There, too, he was a gentleman. In eternity, what he meted out to others in courage and in kindliness of heart will be meted out to him, and no apology in the chancel of God will be necessary.

Mr. TOWNSEND. Mr. President, I have sometimes thought that Congressmen do not appreciate as fully as they ought to do the sacred duty which is imposed upon them by the setting apart of days upon which to memorialize their departed colleagues. The dead do not need our words of praise; they are not affected by our censure. If we have waited to express to them our feelings of regard, if we have withheld our act of kindness until they are dead, our opportunity to render these blessed services to them is gone, but we can in some measure extend the beneficence of their virtues by embalming them in records which will be read and appropriated by others. Furthermore, it is well for the Congress to pause for a sacred hour when one of our associates whom we have known and loved enters the great beyond. And this is so because of the benefit to the Congressmen themselves. They are made a little kinder, a little better, a little stronger by contemplating the virtues and the death of a good man.

To me this day affords a precious opportunity to speak of one whom most of you did not know, but whom I knew intimately and well, and loved dearly for his splendid qualities of heart and mind.

GEORGE S. LEGARE and I entered together the Fifty-eighth Congress, and at the very beginning of our freshman year we became acquainted, and the acquaintance grew and strengthened into the strongest bond of friendship and love. I knew him as a Congressman; I became acquainted with his social and political standing in his home district in Charleston, S. C.; I had intimate knowledge of his beautiful family relations. I was his sincere and admiring friend, as was everyone who knew him well. When he entered Congress he was but 33 years old and, with an unusually bright intellect, an unsullied character, a forceful yet kindly disposition, and a seemingly strong and robust body, his future seemed peculiarly bright and promising. Coming, as he did come, from South Carolina, he was a Democrat. He loved the traditions of his country and gloried in the heroism and bravery of her southern sons. His father was in the Confederate Army, and in the awful devastation of the Civil War lost everything of material value; but that father lived to see a redeemed and reunited Union and its mighty interests represented in the national House of Representatives by his devoted and well-beloved son.

Congressman LEGARE was a patriot, and in his geography there was no Mason and Dixon's line, not even a twilight zone between the North and the South. He was big enough and wise enough and good enough to represent not only South Carolina, but Maine and California and Michigan as well. Sectionalism was unfelt by him, and he believed in one country and one flag, unlimited by State boundaries, unstained by prejudice or passion.

Two times he went with me into Michigan to address Republican banquets there, and while he did not depart from his political faith, he uttered such sentiments of patriotism and brotherly love that those who heard him became his friends and admirers. In each of his Michigan audiences were scores of northern veterans of the Civil War, and I can yet see the tears course down their grizzled cheeks as he spoke so eloquently and so feelingly of conditions in the Southland after the war, of his respect and honor for those who fought against his people to maintain the Union, of his glorious ideals for the future. The death of this good man was a sad event in Charleston, but sorrow was not confined to that city. It touched hundreds of hearts in Michigan, and men and women there who had met and known him were sincere mourners.

I believed and have so expressed myself many times that GEORGE S. LEGARE was an evangel between the North and South. He preached not alone by words but by life and action the gospel of national fraternity and good will. Michigan came closer to the South because he spoke to and mingled with her people. South Carolina had a broader view of nationality, a kindlier feeling for the northerner because he lived among and taught them. I know this is true so far as my State is concerned, and I believe it is equally true in his State, for I went with him once to Charleston and addressed a great audience in that city composed in a large part of men who wore the gray, and I received a sympathetic and enthusiastic hearing. It seemed that all vied with each other to give me welcome and to make me feel at home. They were echoing the sentiments of their generous Congressman.

Some time, as I remember it now, in the Fifty-ninth Congress Representative LEGARE became aware of the awful fact that the "white plague" was upon him. He went to Fort Bayard, N. Mex., where he was treated at the Government tuberculosis hospital during something less than a year and then returned so improved in health that he and his friends believed that he had mastered the dread destroyer. He again entered upon his congressional duties and by spending his vacations at his mountain home in Pickens, S. C., and by using due care as to living conditions he seemed in fairly good health, and we again had high hopes for his future usefulness. His district was proud of him, and it so loved him that it would not think of sending another to Congress in his place. Not until last year did any member of his party enter the primaries against him, and his political campaigns put no additional burden upon him. Last year, however, a contestant appeared against him, and while the Congressman's nomination was assured yet he entered vigorously into the campaign and the work thus done hastened his mortal existence to its close. The smoldering embers of consumption were fanned into a consuming fire, and the life so dear to his family and friends and so useful to his State burned out. Thus went out from this Congress one of the brightest and most lovable men I have ever known.

He has left a loved and loving wife who is almost heartbroken over her lover's death. They were sweethearts always, as much so during every year of their wedded life as on the day when the minister joined their hands to consummate their prior union of hearts in holy wedlock. To this happy pair six children were born, four of whom survive. They are beautiful children and were the pride of their father, as they will be the joy and comfort of their mother. A devoted father and mother survive him. In their old age their principal joy and comfort centered in their distinguished son, and these bereaved parents have my sincere sympathy. That his going away has left his home desolate but feebly states the fact. His loved ones have, however, only precious memories of a loving husband, father, and son, but they have no regrets caused by any failure of gentle care and unfeigned devotion to their dead. Earth is not so bright as before he left, but Heaven is dearer and richer since he entered there.

It is difficult when the doctor gently lays the pulseless hand upon the death-stilled breast; when the casket is lowered into earth's narrow cell; when the funeral cortege returns from the cemetery; when the lights go out and memory is the only companion—it is difficult then to speak the word which comforts the heart bereft. To me, however, it is most comforting to know that I have had the friendship of a good man; that I have known him well and found him true and loyal, for having so known him I can not lose him, certainly not that part of him which is impressed upon my innermost life; and besides, if there be another and a better existence—and who can doubt there is?—then surely the good, the beautiful, and the true must be preserved, for of such is the Kingdom of Heaven.

I do not know what the afterlife is nor where, but I know it is. Else why the speculation as to it? Why this longing for immortality? On what other theory can we explain the broken plans, the unfinished work, the incomplete lives? Is mind, which is a concomitant of human life, an exception to the universal law which denies the destructibility of any force? Surely no greater, no more potent, no more evident force than mind is known. It is king of matter and subjugates other forces. If there be a God, then mind is His manifestation and therefore eternal.

I love to think that our departed friends are nearer than we know; and anyway it is but a few days, more or less, before we shall be with them, and then we may know and understand some of the things which now baffle our philosophy.

GEORGE LEGARE made the world better and brighter because he lived in it, and although his name may not be written large on its tablets of fame, he has fallen asleep with the sweet consciousness that he left no wrongs unrequited, no enemies to cherish hatred, no unhealed wounds caused by him, no duty unperformed. But he has left an example of heroic courage in the face of a relentless and unconquerable malady, of loving kindness which knew no limits save those of his ability to do and be, of a man whom to know was to love. What is earth's fame compared with such a glorious record as this?

All the petty distinctions of rich and poor, of great and small, of high and low disappear when the grim messenger knocks at palace and hut. There may be a more costly funeral equipage and a few more floral designs in one case than in the other, but for each the coffin only contains clay and the dead catch no fragrance from the flowers. Both spirits take their flight to their source of being, and there, stripped of all earthly decorations, that one will be most radiantly attired, most joyously welcomed which is clothed with the radiance of good deeds and an unblemished character.

If it were not for the good, upright, splendid men I have met and known, I should feel that my official career had not been a great personal satisfaction. The denial of financial opportunities, the destruction of the blessings of a real home, the heart burning of political contests, the worry and work over the many times perplexing questions of Government would hardly be compensated by the temporary prominence, the too frequent shoddy distinctions, the evanescent glamour of public place, but when you add to the credit side the real friendship which comes from contact and association with genuine men the balance is on the right side. To have known such men as Congressman LEGARE so well is to be compensated now and forever.

Mr. SHEPPARD. Mr. President, the words of the preacher, the son of David, King in Jerusalem:

Vanity of vanities, saith the preacher; vanity of vanities, all is vanity.

For thousands of years this brief expression has embodied one of the world's principal viewpoints of the philosophy of life. And I believe that it suggests another viewpoint which in the same form would read:

Tragedy of tragedies, all is tragedy.

In very truth the dominant note of human experience is a note of sorrow. The period of childhood, in which life seems eternal and death seems meaningless, is the only period free from earth's deeper woes. The visions and the dreams we knew as children fade rapidly with the disillusions of maturer years.

There was a time when meadow, grove, and stream,
The earth, and every common sight,
To me did seem
Apparelled in celestial light,
The glory and the freshness of a dream.
It is not now as it hath been of yore;—
Turn wheresoe'er I may,
By night or day,
The things which I have seen I now can see no more.

Thus spoke William Wordsworth in voicing the idea that in early childhood we retain impressions of an immortality which was ours before physical birth and to which we return when physical death has followed the trials, the toils, the miseries of human existence. Continuing, he says:

The rainbow comes and goes,
And lovely is the rose,
The moon doth with delight
Look round her when the heavens are bare,
Waters on a starry night
Are beautiful and fair;
The sunshine is a glorious birth;
But yet I know, where'er I go,
That there hath past away a glory from the earth.

The tragedies of humanity find no more somber and no more forcible illustration than in the death of GEORGE LEGARE. Ten years ago he came to Congress with every indication of a brilliant destiny. He impressed his colleagues with an immediate appreciation of his power and his poise. Attractive in presence as he was gifted in mind, his bearing was worthy of the illustrious family from which he came, of the best traditions of his State and country. His face reflected the chivalry of his nature, a heart so gentle and so generous that the South could point to him as one of the rarest flowers of her soul and soil.

It was natural that he should have won an instant popularity in the American House of Representatives. He was an aggressive Democrat, but Republicans admired and honored him as much as did his own party associates. May his example grow until personal hostility shall have disappeared from American politics forever.

It was a graceful tribute to him and to the South when he was invited to Michigan to deliver an address on Abraham Lincoln. He performed this honorable and patriotic labor so impressively and so eloquently that the memory of GEORGE LEGARE will be cherished with as much affection by the people of Michigan as by the people of his own State. This address on Lincoln was made in the district represented at that time by Mr. TOWNSEND, now a Senator from Michigan, between whom and LEGARE an attachment arose almost like that of brothers. This friendship between TOWNSEND and LEGARE—between Michigan and South Carolina, between the North and the South—was a most beautiful and touching evidence of a united country.

Another striking feature of LEGARE's career was the devotion of his constituents. Such was their loyalty that although the struggle with disease kept him away from Washington the greater part of his time, he was returned election after election without a sign of opposition.

Mr. President, there never passed from earth a nobler spirit than that of GEORGE LEGARE. The premature closing of a life that offered such a rich fruition illustrates the predominance of the tragic in the drama of mankind. The rose has perished in the bud, but in God's garden of the stars it will open with a fragrance that shall linger through eternity.

Mr. GRONNA. Mr. President, we meet to pay our respects to the life and memory of GEORGE S. LEGARE, late a Representative of South Carolina, with whom I had the privilege and pleasure of serving in the Fifty-ninth, Sixtieth, and the Sixty-first Congresses.

Mr. LEGARE was a favorite among the Members of the House of Representatives, Republicans as well as Democrats. Not only was he popular, but beloved by those who had learned to know him well. He possessed a cheerful disposition, which is one of the attributes that helps to make our lives more happy and also makes loyal and true friends. It was not a difficult matter to form the acquaintance of Mr. LEGARE, because he was as easily approached as he was ready to approach others whenever he could render services that would add to the welfare and happiness of others.

Mr. LEGARE possessed not only a sunny disposition, but a keen intellect, a high sense of honor, and an abiding faith in mankind. He was always hopeful and ready to sacrifice his own interests for the benefit of others and, if necessary, deny himself of pleasure if he thought it would bring more happiness to his fellow men. Such men are valuable, and I might say rare in our days, and the world can ill afford to lose them. But when one's earthly life work is ended and the body is consigned to its last resting place, on such an occasion all good men are mourned and often pitied because they look upon the grave as a cold and gloomy place of rest, forgetting that it is only the end of an earthly journey and that it is the transition from a weary, troublesome, and uncertain life to a more hopeful, happy, and everlasting one. Mr. LEGARE's life was full of promise and hope; he was a true friend, a patriotic citizen, and possessed marked ability as a lawyer and statesman.

I was one of the committee who attended the funeral in his home city, Charleston, S. C. One familiar with the noble life of Mr. LEGARE could easily realize the cause of the profound and heartfelt sorrow which was manifested by his immediate family and large circle of friends over his untimely death. To these sorrowing friends we must add a word of comfort, but I believe it can not be done in a better or more fitting way than to ask them to review the history of his own life work, which is so inspiring and beautiful.

Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey. Mr. President, the world is richer and happier for the life of generous, kind-hearted, and true men; sadder and poorer for their death. I feel all will say these words well apply to the life and death of GEORGE LEGARE. I was not as well acquainted with him as some other Senators, but I was close enough to him to have learned the splendid traits of his character. As one looked into his deep, soulful eyes you were impressed with the love, sincerity, and loyalty that prompted his every thought and action. GEORGE LEGARE has gone to that bourne from whence no traveler returns, but he left with us, his family, and neighbors sweet and pleasant memories.

Mr. President, as one of the committee from this body to attend his funeral, I was much impressed and my heart deeply touched by the sad and tearful cortege of friends and neighbors in attendance at his funeral. Rich and poor, white and black, young and old, all crowded in a mournful procession of thousands to drop a tear at his bier and then to pass on to the beautiful cemetery, the home and resting place of many of South Carolina's illustrious dead.

Mr. President, oh, what a day of sadness that was for the city of Charleston. The morning was ushered in with fitful gusts of wind, the sky was overhung with dark and lowering clouds, all adding to the sadness and gloom of the day; but as the hour approached when the recital of "dust to dust, earth to earth" was to be pronounced by the clergyman the winds subsided, the clouds parted, and the warm glow of a southern sun shed its rays and blessings on all around.

We then laid away forever from the sight of his heartbroken widow, children, and fellow countrymen all that was mortal of a faithful husband, a loving father, and patriotic citizen—GEORGE LEGARE.

Mr. President, we laid away our brother in life's battles in a beautiful spot, amid the rich foliage and glorious bloom of the Sunny South. The chirp of the birds seemed an effort to drown the sobs of the stricken and bereaved ones on every side. All nature seemed to join in solemn effort to pronounce benediction over the well-spent life of an honest man.

GEORGE LEGARE has left to his family and to his country a heritage richer than gold, more enduring and impressive than shafts and tombs of stone; he has left the name of an honest man, the greatest work of the Eternal God. Mr. President, it is my prayer, and you will join me, that as Heaven tempers the winds to the shorn lamb so may the solace of God's comfort be ever with the stricken widow and children of GEORGE LEGARE.

Mr. TILLMAN. Mr. President, what I shall say on this occasion will be brief, for time presses and no amount of words can add anything to the sweetness of GEORGE LEGARE's memory or afford any consolation to his friends for his death. Words do not assuage grief. They only show the devotion and love of friends and relatives.

All who knew him loved GEORGE LEGARE too well to desecrate his memory with mere lip service. I first knew him when he was little more than a boy. He was bright and buoyant, and was so happy himself, bubbling over with vitality and fun, that he brought sunshine into every company he entered. This buoyancy and lightness of heart characterized him all his life, and was the main reason why so many men loved him. In all my experience I do not recall a single man who was his equal in this respect. I do not remember to have ever met a human being who enjoyed a joke more than he did. I smile frequently now to myself when I recall his recital of some of the practical jokes he perpetrated on his father, wife, and brother Congressmen. For him to do a thing of this kind was natural and like water running down hill. The beauty of it all was there was never any malice or intention to wound, and none of his jests ever did leave a wound or scar. In fact, such practical jokes were an absolute guaranty that the person on whom was the laugh was a good friend or loved one.

His associations with his family were ideal; always manly, loving, high minded, and thoughtful. Almost the last time he and I talked together he told me of an incident, showing the manner of man he was clearly to me, who am a father. He said he noticed his little son, a boy of 12, "Bill," as he called him, had a habit of going behind the barn. Being curious to see what he did there, he followed one day and found him smoking a cigarette. He said to him: "Bill, why do you hide such things from me? My boy, it is not manly to sneak around and smoke this way; if you want to smoke, come and smoke with me. I wish, though, you would not smoke, because it will make a runt of you by stopping your growth, and will ruin your health; but don't hide it. If you will smoke, use a pipe instead of a cigar or cigarette; that will be less harmful. I will get you a pipe if you want me to."

This openness with his own boy was characteristic of the man in dealing with men. I do not believe he could have played the hypocrite if he had tried. In all the years I knew him I do not remember to have ever seen the least cause for suspicion or hint of hypocrisy. Withal he was brave as a lion, illustrating the lines of the poet:

> The bravest are the tenderest,
> The loving are the daring.

GEORGE LEGARE was incapable of lying or trying to deceive anyone; and yet his popularity with his political antagonists was phenomenal, due entirely to his openness, frankness, and courage, as well as to other lovable qualities which draw men to each other in spite of themselves. He simply magnetized them.

We all recall Pope's illustration of human likes and dislikes:

> I do not like you, Dr. Fell;
> The reason why I can not tell,
> But this at least I know full well,
> I do not like you, Dr. Fell.

As Pope did not like Dr. Fell, so men could not help loving GEORGE LEGARE, and loved him in spite of themselves, simply because they were obliged to.

I remember a letter I wrote him when he first went to New Mexico to the Government sanitarium, in which I quoted a verse from a song I heard in Chicago some years ago:

> There is something in your manner,
> There is something in your smile,
> There is something in your handshake
> That is just my style.

So it was. I loved him as though he were my own son, and he reciprocated in kind. Our associations since I came to Washington have been the most intimate. When he had anything he wanted attended to in the Senate, he came to me naturally and instinctively. It was a pleasure to help him in his own work in the House of Representatives, and I shall miss him more than I like to think. His passing away at the early age of 43 is almost a calamity to the people of South Carolina, and to the people of Charleston in particular. Those people feel it, too. His work as a public man gave bright promise of a brilliant future, and had his life been spared, his abilities and happy knack of making friends and linking them to him with hooks of steel made everything possible that a public man can attain. Life in Washington is not the same now that GEORGE is gone, for he made frequent visits to my office, and all the clerks and others who came in contact with him loved him, because they could not help it.

That he was loved at his home almost universally was shown by the vast throng which filled the church to overflowing and the churchyard and street outside when his funeral was held.

I often think, and have thought more on the subject of late years than ever before, about death and the hereafter. We all know we have to die. That is a truism which makes very little impression on the mind and leaves practically no ideas behind it. To most people the words leave no impression at all, for, fortunately, human beings are so constituted that they can dismiss the idea of death in connection with themselves while realizing it to the fullest extent when thinking of other people. As some one has put it, "Old age, sickness, death, and hell are for others; not for us."

Cæsar when master of the world was stricken down by the daggers of assassins, and yet the world moved on just the same. To quote from Mark Antony's oration over his corpse:

> But yesterday the word of Cæsar might
> Have stood against the world; now lies he here,
> And none so poor to do him reverence.

Napoleon Bonaparte, who towered over Europe like a colossus and ruthlessly trampled the nations under his heel, was tempted by fate and driven by ambition to go too far. And when the Russian campaign had robbed him of his veterans, he became a prisoner after Waterloo, and died at St. Helena of a broken heart. His career was the tragedy of the last century. He died—

Leaving a name at which the world turns pale
To point a moral or adorn a tale.

His death caused not even a ripple, except that the world breathed more freely. The greatest and mightiest of earth go down to death, and it causes little or no disturbance or notice.

The paths of glory lead but to the grave.

This Congress in its brief life of two years has witnessed the departure of 7 men from the Senate and 18 from the House of Representatives. Verily—

We are no other than a moving row
Of magic shadow-shapes that come and go
Round with this sun-illumin'd lantern held
In midnight by the Master of the show.

Death and its terrors and the grave and its horrors have been prolific of thought to the poets. Some of them have drawn very gloomy pictures of the grave, while others have given us some very noble and sweet thoughts about it. Shakespeare says:

The weariest and most loathed worldly life
That age, ache, penury, imprisonment
Can lay on nature is a paradise
To what we fear of death.

Again, in Hamlet we have this graphic portrayal:

Ay, but to die, and go we know not where;
To lie in cold obstruction, and to rot;
This sensible warm motion to become
A kneaded clod; and the delighted spirit
To bathe in fiery floods or to reside
In thrilling region of thick-ribbed ice;
To be imprison'd in the viewless winds
And blown, with restless violence, round about
The pendent world.

Both pictures are horrible, and I much prefer to associate GEORGE LEGARE with another poem, which I clipped from a newspaper not long ago, credited to Robert Louis Stevenson, but I have failed to find it in his works:

Though he that ever kind and true
Kept stoutly step by step with you
Your whole long, gusty lifetime through,
Be gone a while before—
Be now a moment gone before,
Yet doubt not; anon the seasons will restore
Your friend to you.

He has but turned a corner—still
He pushes on with right good will
Through mire and marsh, by heugh and hill,
That selfsame arduous way—
That selfsame upland hopeful way
That you and he through many a doubtful day
Attempted still.

He is not dead, this friend—not dead,
But in the path we mortals tread
Got some few trifling steps ahead
And nearer to the end,
So that you, too, once past this bend,
Shall meet again, as face to face, this friend
You fancy dead.

Push gayly on, strong heart. The while
You travel forward mile by mile,
He loiters with a backward smile,
Till you can overtake,
And strains his eyes to search his wake,
Or, whistling, as he sees you through the brake,
Waits on a stile.

This is so much more in keeping with the man whose life and virtues we are commemorating to-day that I prefer to think of him in that way rather than in the other. I love to believe and feel that GEORGE LEGARE, although I saw his body put in the grave, is not dead, but is waiting for me "around the bend in the road." I believe if his spirit can have its way that he "waits on a stile" to greet those he loved here.

Of course, none of us can know until we ourselves die what death really is, and even then we will not know, because we will know nothing; but at least we will have the satisfaction, if we can feel and think at all—if our entity is not entirely destroyed and wiped out—of knowing that the mystery to us is only solved by dying. The spirit is simply released from its fleshly bonds, that is all.

We speak of the "great beyond" and "over the river" and other phrases of like character to symbolize our departure from among our friends here. It is a far more consoling thought to believe and feel that our loved ones around the "bend in the road" are waiting and looking backward over the shoulder for us to catch up than to feel that they are in the cold and clammy grave, with no light or air or anything else which we so enjoy here.

I have a mother, brothers, sisters, and two children who are around this "bend," and the greatest hope I have—and I believe it religiously, or I would be in despair—is that when I die I shall rejoin them.

MEMORIAL ADDRESSES ON THE LATE REPRESENTATIVE ELBERT H. HUBBARD.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, I ask the Chair to lay before the Senate the resolutions of the House of Representatives on the death of the late Representative ELBERT HAMILTON HUBBARD.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore (Mr. GALLINGER). The Chair lays before the Senate resolutions from the House of Representatives, which will be read.

The Secretary read the resolutions, as follows:

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,
June 4, 1912.

Resolved, That the House has heard with deep regret and profound sorrow of the death of Hon. ELBERT HAMILTON HUBBARD, for eight years a Representative from the eleventh district of the State of Iowa.

Resolved, That a committee of 15 Members of the House, with such Members of the Senate as may be joined, be appointed by the Speaker to attend the funeral at Sioux City, Iowa, and that the necessary expenses attending the execution of this order be paid out of the contingent fund of the House.

Resolved, That the Sergeant at Arms of the House be authorized and directed to take such steps as may be necessary for properly carrying out the provisions of this resolution.

Resolved, That the Clerk communicate these resolutions to the Senate and transmit a copy thereof to the family of the deceased.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, I submit the resolutions which I send to the desk and ask for their adoption.

The resolutions (S. Res. 491) were read, considered by unanimous consent, and unanimously agreed to, as follows:

Resolved, That the Senate has heard with deep sorrow of the death of Hon. ELBERT HAMILTON HUBBARD, late a Member of the House of Representatives from the State of Iowa.

Resolved, That as a mark of respect to the memory of the deceased the business of the Senate be suspended in order that proper tribute may be paid his high character and distinguished public services.

Resolved, That the Secretary communicate a copy of these resolutions to the House of Representatives and to the family of the deceased.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, it may be that upon some other occasion I may find an opportunity to express in a more analytical and comprehensive way my high appreciation of the public service of the subject of these resolutions. At this moment, however, I must content myself with a tribute of sincere and sorrowing friendship.

ELBERT H. HUBBARD was born at Rushville, in the State of Indiana, August 19, 1849. He lived as became a scholar, a gentleman, and a patriot. He died at Sioux City, Iowa, on the 4th day of June, 1912. His youth was spent in taking on the education which in after years made him conspicuous among his fellow men and in developing a character so high in its standards and so noble in its ideals that he was an example of the best type of American manhood.

When the responsibilities of maturity fell upon him he was not only strong enough to bear his burdens with ease and dignity, but he bore them gladly and faithfully because it was his duty to do it. He knew but one rule throughout his long life of honor and success. It was to do his duty as fully and as completely as it was within his power to do it. The difficulty of his task never deterred him or turned him aside. The disagreeableness of his task seemed only to make the dominant rule of his life more imperative. He went straight on, looking neither to the right nor to the left, seeking neither opportunity to escape if the work to be done was hard, nor to vaunt himself if it was likely to meet with general praise.

I have known in my time many good men, many strong men, but I never knew a man who more instinctively, resolutely, and unshrinkingly pursued the path of duty than ELBERT H. HUBBARD. I do not believe that he ever even balanced in his own mind the advantages which might come to him from temporizing with his conscience, as compared with the advantages of following his convictions boldly and openly to the very end, no matter where these convictions led him.

His professional attainments were everywhere recognized as of high order, and the honorable place he won at the bar attested his legal learning and his intellectual power. His public service was a notable contribution to the welfare of the country. In the legislature of his State he played an important part, and in the Congress of the United States he was one of the leaders in the most remarkable movement of modern politics.

The circumstances which surround us forbid more than a mere reference to those striking and fundamental reforms which he helped to bring about in the House of Representatives. Upon this occasion I must content myself with saying that when the history of the country is impartially written the work he helped to do will be accorded a foremost place in the struggle for freedom in representative government.

In his private life he was not only above all reproach but his serene and loving quality of mind and heart lifted him far above the great majority of his fellow mortals. I feel that I ought not to enter the sacred portals of his home for if I were gifted with divine expression I could not adequately portray the affection, constant and pervading that always reigned within its walls. It is enough to say that there the atmosphere of love, confidence, and companionship was as pure and inspiring as was ever breathed by the sons and daughters of men; and the gracious hospitality of his family is one of the most delightful memories of my life. When he passed to his reward upon the other shore, he left behind him a grief too profound for words; but he also left recollections of an exalted life so full of kindness, gentleness, noble aspirations, and worthy deeds that when the clouds of sorrow lift a little, the sunshine of these recollections will comfort the hearts of a wife and children who find it hard just now to remember anything but their grievous loss.

The hope of civilization is bound up in the lives of such men as ELBERT H. HUBBARD. The progress of the world is through such work as he did for humanity. Free institutions are possible only because such men as he fight for them.

Justice would disappear if there were not such men to struggle for it. Truth would fade away if there were not such men to proclaim it.

Mr. POINDEXTER. Mr. President, it can not but be a pleasure, in the language of the resolution, to suspend for a moment the business of the Senate and pay a tribute of affection to the memory of a man like ELBERT HAMILTON HUBBARD. It can not but be a benefit, not to him nor to his family but to us, to turn aside, however briefly it may be, from the perplexities of this service, from the conflict of opinion, from the burden of public questions, and relax ourselves in a receptive feeling of the noble qualities of the deceased Representative whose memory we are undertaking to honor.

If there is one thing, Mr. President, in which our country is deficient, it seems to me it is in the spiritual things of life. We can not but be benefited by an effort to throw around the magnificent material objects of this Capital City more sentiment, more of the ideal, and these brief memorials give us that opportunity.

I would not undertake to speak of Representative HUBBARD in any set and formal phrase. What I shall say of him shall be brief and unadorned. What I shall say of his character I shall undertake to make direct. He himself was brief of speech, directing his aim toward the accomplishment of the objects which he had in view.

It was not my privilege to know the deceased in that period of time when his character, which I did know in later years, was forming, and I shall leave to the distinguished representatives of his State to speak of those more intimate associations of his home and his family and his early life.

I had not the benefit, in forming my opinion of this distinguished man, of knowing those influences which went more potently than other things to shape his career. Those secret influences which in his life, as in the life of every man, are unknown sometimes even to the most intimate of his friends and relatives, are the most powerful in producing the final fruition of the man whom the world knows. What I knew was the finished man, in the full flower of his promise and the ripe fruit of his performance.

It was my fortune to be associated with Representative HUBBARD during a session of the House of Representatives when the qualities of its Members were tested to an unusual extent. It was also my fortune in the struggle and conflict on the questions which were determined in that Congress—the Sixty-first—to belong to the group of members of the Republican Party of which Representative HUBBARD was one of the leaders. So it was that I had an opportunity to know his qualities as a man and as a public official.

His virtues were the cardinal virtues. He was a plain man; he was a man without ornament of speech; he was a man, so far as I could judge, entirely devoid of selfish ambition. In that great struggle to which I have referred the need arose among those who were engaged in it to know upon whom they could depend, and those of us who were associated with Representative HUBBARD soon came to realize that when he had formed his opinion, that when he had deliberated upon a question, that when he had announced his conclusions, we could rest in the serene confidence that he would not sway from the path which he had chosen.

His temper was as sweet and delicious as that of a child; he was full of gentleness, yet full of strength; he was sympathetic and helpful, putting himself aside, putting his associates forward, aiding them in a way which could bring oftentimes no distinction to himself in the public eye, but which tended to the accomplishment of the purpose which he and they regarded as of importance. He was molded on Doric lines of simplicity, strength, and beauty.

Livy, in his account of Lucius Quinctius Cincinnatus, describes how he entered the city of Rome at the head of a victorious army, surrounded by the spoils of victory, and tells us that he abandoned the honors and the power of that situation and quietly returned to his little farm and to personal agricultural labor.

Representative HUBBARD had not the power, he had not the glory, of that old Roman character, yet he was as free from any love of the pride and pomp of power and glory as was Cincinnatus. He had no object in his public service but the welfare of his country.

A few years ago there was discovered in a purlieu of the city of Alexandria an old papyrus with some writings upon it, which were called the Logoi, or sayings of Jesus. One of them impressed itself upon my memory in these words:

> Cleave the wood, and there I am. Raise the rock, and there you find me.

As I understand, it was intended to point the great truth that the Eternal Author of our being is universal in His presence; that He pervades the most secret places in nature; that He is everywhere. We know that the children of the earth are His children, and that when we are cut off from this temporal zone we return to His bosom. If He is everywhere, as was declared in these sayings of the Author and Founder of our religion, and our departed friend has returned to Him, it is pleasant to think and it is a real consolation to know that his spirit, his soul, is still in our midst. Those who were associated with him, those who knew the beauties of his soul, through the power of that memory and the knowledge that it did not die can still receive strength and help and comfort for the weaknesses of our mortal characters, in the struggles in which we engage, from the same qualities which aided and strengthened us during his life.

Representative HUBBARD was one of those characters who are invincible. He was invincible whether in success or in defeat, because he championed the right. He planted himself upon the immutable foundation of truth as he believed it. In the melting pot of life there had been burned out of his character, as nearly as in the case of any man I have ever known, all of the dross; and he came out purified. He had no ulterior motive; and I would not think of standing here to speak in his memory if what I say did not come from the sincere feeling of my heart. We can say of ELBERT HAMILTON HUBBARD as the poet said of another:

> Of wounds and sore defeat
> He made his battle stay;
> Winged sandals for his feet
> He wove of his delay;
> Of weariness and fear
> He made his shouting spear;
> Of loss, and doubt, and dread,
> And swift oncoming doom
> He made a helmet for his head
> And a floating plume.
> From the shutting mist of death,
> From the failure of the breath,
> He made a battle horn to blow
> Across the vales of overthrow.

Mr. KENYON. Mr. President, the grim reaper has not been kind to our State in the last few sessions of Congress. Iowa seems to have suffered more than most States by the calling of its Members in this body and in the House from their earthly labors.

A little over two years ago our State mourned the loss of the incomparable and brilliant Dolliver; a year later we were called upon to say an earthly good-by to the gentle and brilliant HUBBARD. Both went in the full flush of a victorious career. Dolliver died before his time, so did HUBBARD. Sitting in a chair, little dreaming of the end, Dolliver passed, as gently as a child closes its eyes, into a sleep from which he never awakened. Just as the news of victory in the primary campaign had reached HUBBARD, he joined his beloved friend in the far-away isle of somewhere.

I went into the House of Representatives on the Sunday set aside for memorial addresses to Senator Dolliver. No man spoke with more tender affection than did Congressman HUBBARD, and the closing of his address there is so appropriate to his own passing that I make bold to use it:

> So passed—
> He said—

this master of speech, this gentle, human-loving man, with whom little children played, with whom his neighbors joked and gossiped, toward whom a Nation turned with listening hearts, for whom I refuse to mourn, rather would I uplift a song of triumph, thanksgiving, and praise; he fought a good fight.

Exactly the same words are appropriate of ELBERT H. HUBBARD. We need not mourn for him; his life was one of triumph; he fought the good fight; he kept the faith; and there awaited him a crown on high. ELBERT HUBBARD must have had a great parentage, his qualities were God-given, he was "a prince by virtue of an earlier creation and the imposition of a mightier hand." The slogan of his life was duty to conscience. Courage and courtesy were his constant attendants. In the fight in the House over the Cannon rules he was one of the leaders; when the Payne-Aldrich Act was before Congress, although it was made a party measure, he would not vote for it; on Canadian reciprocity he followed his convictions, although contrary to the desire of most of his constituents. There was so much courage in his heart that no little corner even was left for cowardice.

Men sometimes seem to belong to two classes—those with the brain quality and those with the heart quality. It is seldom that you find both equally balanced in any life. In some men the brain qualities so predominate that those little things belonging to the heart and that make life really worth living seem to atrophy and die away.

ELBERT HUBBARD had both qualities, but heart qualities predominated.

Out of the heart are the issues of life.

The great achievements of the world are the heart achievements. The genius of Shakespeare was of the heart. Lincoln will live on, more beloved with every passing year, because of his heart qualities. So we who knew ELBERT HUBBARD loved him because of his great heart. He was a brother man; his helping hand was always out to the poor and depressed. The little ragged boy in the street looked up and smiled when he passed. Others' troubles and sorrows he helped to bear. It was a loving heart that made life so happy for him. The sky always seems a little bluer, the music of the birds a little sweeter, and the laughter of children a little dearer to those who love their kind. The changing seasons are a joy to them; either the snows of winter or the flowers of summer carry a lesson of good will. So it was with him; whatever was, to him was right. He lived amid the sublime ideals of truth, courage, and justice. He despised nothing but the snobbery and shams of life; he hated a lie; he despised hypocrisy.

As I have seen him walking down the street, radiating geniality and good nature, head erect, and a certain charm of manner, he seemed to fill the picture drawn by the writer Hubbard, where he said:

Whenever you go out of doors draw the chin in, carry the crown of the head high, and fill the lungs to the utmost; drink in the sunshine, greet your friends with a smile, and put soul into every handclasp.

ELBERT HUBBARD did exactly that. Iowa loved him and he loved Iowa, and many a friend who had come within his influence longs—

* * * for the touch of a vanished hand
And the sound of a voice that is still.

I was with him some in the primary campaign and learned to have that affection for him which every man had who came into close contact with him. A few days before the primary election I saw him and he seemed well and strong. As the returns came in that night showing his selection by the Republicans of the eleventh congressional district as their candidate for Congress, and just as he knew his selection was assured, in his hour of triumph the finger of death touched him and he passed to the great beyond.

In such an hour how foolish seem all the clamorings for power, our struggles for place; why do men ever desire position and wealth at the expense of their fellow men? "What is man that Thou art mindful of him, or the son of man that Thou visiteth him?"

Like a flash of the lightning, a break in the wave,
Man passeth from life to his rest in the grave.

There is no knowing the day or the hour when the Son of Man cometh. It may be in the flush of victory, as it was to him; it may be in the gloom of defeat. It is well to be always ready for the summons—it always comes.

The head of the king that the sceptar hath borne;
The brow of the priest, that the miter hath worn;
The eye of the sage, and the heart of the brave—
Are hidden and lost in the depth of the grave.

The peasant whose lot was to sow and to reap;
The herdsman who climbed with his goats up the steep;
The beggar who wandered in search of his bread—
Have faded away like the grass that we tread.

In that hour of what avail are wealth and power? The satisfying things will be the memory of kindly deeds, of faces brightened and hearts relieved.

What a wonderful and curious thing is life. Some lives are beautiful, some are sublime. Beauty and sublimity are not the same. A mother's hand, thin with the work of years, is beautiful; a mother's face, furrowed with care, is likewise beautiful to her sons and daughters; the great ocean, with its white-capped waves, swelling in majesty, glorying in power, is sublime. Seldom are lives both beautiful and sublime. ELBERT HUBBARD'S private life was beautiful, as a father, husband, neighbor, friend; his public life was sublime, standing for principles, as little concerned about criticism as is Gibraltar with the waves lapping the rocks at its base. A life combining the two is as near perfect as mortals ever enjoy. Such a life was that of ELBERT HUBBARD.

On a beautiful day in June we followed him to the last resting place. Thousands of people had congregated around the church and on the streets, tear-dimmed eyes attesting the affection of the people for him. We who knew him closely and who believe in that immortality beyond the grave, without which life would be a dreary and wasteless desert, could join from our hearts in the words of those favorite hymns of his, sung at his funeral: "Rock of Ages" and "Lead, Kindly Light."

Nothing in my hand I bring,
Simply to the cross I cling,
* * * * *
Rock of Ages cleft for me,
Let me hide myself in Thee.

We knew that the "Rock of Ages" was cleft for him. Notwithstanding the gloom and sorrow surrounding us then and now, yet can we rejoice, for there abideth with us the conviction that the "Kindly Light" has led him upward and onward into the palace of the "Prince of Peace." While the night of farewell is of sorrowful darkness it must some time, some day, somewhere give way to the day of reunion—the morn of gladness.

O'er moor and fen, o'er crag and torrent, 'till
The night is gone,
And with the morn those angel faces smile
Which I have loved long since, and lost awhile.

MEMORIAL ADDRESSES ON THE LATE REPRESENTATIVE JAMES P. LATTA.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Mr. President, I ask the Chair to lay before the Senate resolutions of the House of Representatives on the death of my late colleague in that body, JAMES P. LATTA.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore (Mr. GALLINGER). The Chair lays before the Senate resolutions from the House of Representatives, which the Secretary will read.

The Secretary read the resolutions, as follows:

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,
May 26, 1912.

Resolved, That the business of the House be now suspended that opportunity may be given to pay tribute to the memory of Hon. JAMES P. LATTA, late a Member of the House from the State of Nebraska.

Resolved, That as a particular mark of respect to the memory of the deceased and in recognition of his distinguished public career the House, at the conclusion of these exercises, shall stand adjourned.

Resolved, That the clerk communicate these resolutions to the Senate.

Resolved, That the Clerk send a copy of these resolutions to the family of the deceased.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Mr. President, I offer the resolutions which I send to the desk and ask for their adoption.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Nebraska submits resolutions, which will be read.

The resolutions (S. Res. 494) were read, considered by unanimous consent, and unanimously agreed to, as follows:

Resolved, That the Senate expresses its profound sorrow on account of the death of the Hon. JAMES P. LATTA, late a Member of the House of Representatives from the State of Nebraska.

Resolved, That the business of the Senate be now suspended in order that fitting tribute may be paid his high character and distinguished public services.

Resolved, That the Secretary communicate a copy of these resolutions to the House of Representatives and to the family of the deceased.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Mr. President, the life of JAMES P. LATTA was typical of our country's recent progress. Born in Ohio in 1844, during his childhood he went with his parents to Iowa, then in her first development. There he remained until 18 years of age, when, a mere boy, becoming ambitious to find for himself a new home in the farther West, he secured the consent of his father, and alone, on foot, started across the State of Iowa to seek a home in the State of Nebraska. I say this is typical of our American progress, for the tide of population has flowed from the East toward the West in a never-ceasing stream, and ambitious men, like Representative LATTA'S father and like Representative LATTA himself, have turned their faces to the westward and sought their new homes in the "promised land."

Mr. LATTA'S life was also illustrative of our American development. Beginning life as a young man upon a farm on the banks of the Missouri River in Nebraska, by industry and thrift, by intelligence and energy, he gradually acquired a competence, established for himself a home, developed a prosperous farm, and, after 15 years of highly successful farming, was able to enter the banking business, in which he met with equal, if not greater, success.

Following his experience as a banker, in the riper years of his life he secured the confidence and esteem of his neighbors to such an extent that he was successively elected treasurer of his home town, mayor of the town, later to the legislature, first as representative and then as State senator, and finally, toward the close of his eventful life, he was elected a Member of the House of Representatives from the third Nebraska district.

I say that in this respect his life has been typical of American development, because this man, with few early advantages, in spite of great obstacles, not only walked to his new western home, but, starting with nothing, made himself a successful farmer, and after being a successful farmer, made himself a successful banker, and stepped naturally into the public service by reason of the great confidence reposed in him by his neighbors and friends.

JAMES P. LATTA was an unusual man, Mr. President. Strong of body and strong of mind, with a great heart and a broad sympathy, he was not content to win success for himself alone, but he became a tower of strength in the community in which he lived. In the times of stress and disaster in 1893, when the whole West was in a condition of depression, when farmers were in distress, when business men were in embarrassment, JAMES P. LATTA, then the prosperous farmer and successful banker, was not content to look after himself alone, for he realized his responsibility to the community in which he lived and to the neighbors who surrounded him, and not only exhausted all his own personal resources in assisting them in their distress, but, to my certain knowledge, he took of his good securities, came to the East, and pledged them in order to raise money that he might lend it to his less successful neighbors. This great act of his saved many from bankruptcy in those days, enabling a great many farmers in his own county to hold the properties which they had mortgaged. And when the clouds had cleared away and prosperity had again come to Nebraska and the West, it was no wonder that those neighbors of his insisted on elevating him to the position of their Representative at Washington.

He won his success not because he was in political accord with his constituents, but because he had such a hold upon their sympathies and their confidence that they voluntarily sent him to Washington.

I shall long remember some of the sights which I witnessed upon the occasion of his second campaign in that district. He was kind enough to take me through the district and introduce me to his friends, I being then a candidate for the Senate, and I remember how all over that district he was hailed not simply as their Representative in Congress, but hailed as their father and their protector because of the sacrifices which he had made in their interest.

When, at the end of a long nine days' trip, during which we had stopped at a hundred different towns in his district, on a certain golden afternoon in our wonderful Indian summer we reached his home town for the final meeting in that campaign, the outpouring of the people, his neighbors and his friends, to welcome him, without regard to party, with closed stores and closed offices, with shouts and huzzas and an enthusiasm rarely equaled in a local candidate, was something I shall long remember.

He was an unusual man—unusual in his strength, unusual in his sympathies, unusual in his courage, and unusual in the fact that he was able, after a long life of toil in the business world, to enter public life and acquit himself honorably and creditably.

Mr. TOWNSEND. Mr. President, the senior Senator from Nebraska [Mr. BROWN] is unavoidably absent, having been compelled to be away from the city this afternoon. He has prepared, however, a loving and sincere tribute to his late colleague in the House, and he has asked me to present it to the Senate for him this evening, which duty I very gladly perform.

He says:

"I knew Congressman LATTA first when he was a State senator in the Nebraska Legislature. At that time, as attorney general of the State, I had necessary occasion to know at first-hand the character of the man. He was true and faithful. His good sense, his business head, and his honest heart made him a foremost factor in that body and won for him the confidence and esteem of all his colleagues and the appreciative regard and respect of his constituents. His record was clean. Early in that service he developed a fearless indifference to his own political fortune. His sole guide and inspiration seemed to be the welfare of the people—all of them. He never divided the people into classes. Whether men were engaged on the farm or on the range, in the store or in the factory, in the banking house or in the railway headquarters he treated them all alike and stood for a square deal for each and all. He was true to this standard throughout his service in the American Congress.

"In his campaigns Mr. LATTA was never known to appeal to class prejudice in order to win votes for himself or his party. He was too patriotic to do that. He was too square in thought and character to resort to this easy though crooked method of electing himself to office. He was, therefore, a most wholesome influence in politics. Let me say to the honor of the people of the State who elected him first to the State senate and then to the National House of Representatives and to the honor of all the people of that rich and progressive State, they, like him, are good and true and square. Their ideals, like his, are high and noble, and they, like him, are devoted to the upbuilding and advancement of American ideals and institutions. If men like LATTA, modest and conscientious, earnest and vigilant, unafraid of personal political mishap, could always be found to serve in office the future welfare of this country and its institutions would be secure.

"Mr. LATTA was steadfast in his devotion and in his service to the people who had elected him. He was a great man in the sense that greatness is measured by sincerity, capacity, and industry. He had the courage and determination of the pioneer. From the day he took a homestead in the State of Nebraska to the hour of his death he stood and fought for his country's welfare and for civic standards of high and noble character. In politics he was partisan, believing in the agency of political parties as the most practical instrument through which to determine and establish State and National policies. As a Member of Congress and as a servant of his constituents he talked for good things, and he always voted as he talked.

"In one respect Mr. LATTA was a remarkable man; he had the trait of character which in these more recent days is not found too frequently in public men—he did not advertise his own honesty by impugning the motives of others. He never assumed to be the only honest friend the people had in Congress. He had another remarkable trait—he devoted himself to quietly serving the people faithfully, and therefore he furnished few headlines for the newspapers. He allowed his service to speak for itself and he left the advertising politician a free hand. Should the days of pretension and hypocrisy ever overtake this country, men of LATTA's character would receive scant recognition.

"By every test Congressman JAMES P. LATTA was a good man, and this is the highest tribute that can be paid to any man. He hated everything wrong and mean; he loved everything good and right.

"The life that counts must toil and fight,
Must hate the wrong and love the right,
Must stand by truth by day, by night;
This is the life that counts.

"The life that counts must hopeful be,
In darkest night make melody,
Must wait the dawn on bended knee;
This is the life that counts.

"The life that counts is lived with God,
And runs not from the cross, the rod,
But walks with joy where Jesus trod;
This is the life that counts."

MEMORIAL ADDRESSES ON THE LATE REPRESENTATIVE DAVID J. FOSTER.

Mr. DILLINGHAM. Mr. President, I ask the Chair to lay before the Senate resolutions from the House of Representatives on the death of the late Representative FOSTER.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore (Mr. GALLINGER). The Chair lays before the Senate resolutions from the House of Representatives, which will be read.

The Secretary read the resolutions as follows:

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,
January 19, 1913.

Resolved, That in pursuance of the special order heretofore adopted the House proceed to pay tribute to the memory of the Hon. DAVID JOHNSON FOSTER, late a Representative in Congress from the State of Vermont.

Resolved, That as a further mark of respect to the memory of the deceased and in recognition of his distinguished career and his great service to his country as a Representative in Congress the House, at the conclusion of the memorial proceedings of this day, shall stand adjourned.

Resolved, That the Clerk of the House communicate these resolutions to the Senate.

Resolved, That the Clerk of the House be, and he is hereby, instructed to send a copy of these resolutions to the family of the deceased.

Mr. DILLINGHAM. Mr. President, I offer the resolutions which I send to the desk, and ask for their adoption.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Vermont offers resolutions which will be read.

The resolutions (S. Res. 495) were read, considered by unanimous consent, and unanimously agreed to, as follows:

Resolved, That the Senate expresses its profound sorrow on account of the death of the Hon. DAVID J. FOSTER, late a Member of the House of Representatives from the State of Vermont.

Resolved, That the business of the Senate be now suspended in order that fitting tribute may be paid his high character and distinguished public services.

Resolved, That the Secretary communicate a copy of these resolutions to the House of Representatives and to the family of the deceased.

Mr. DILLINGHAM. Mr. President, nearly a year has passed since death summoned from our midst Vermont's Representative from the first congressional district and closed the earthly career of DAVID JOHNSON FOSTER. The announcement of his death, so sudden and unexpected, came as a distinct shock to his friends everywhere, and particularly to his associates in Congress, among whom the critical nature of his illness had not been known. From all classes came expressions of personal sorrow and the deepest sympathy for the stricken ones in the delightful home which he had so recently established in this city. Consternation, regret, and a keen sense of loss followed in the cities, in the villages, and on the farms of Vermont. The people of the State he had loved so well and had so faithfully and proudly served were his devoted friends and admirers.

But time, with her softening influences, has somewhat modified the first effects of the shock, and now we are able to look back with some degree of calmness upon the life of our friend, and are better able to judge of those elements in his character which gave him such a charming personality and which served to advance him so signally in the profession of his choice as well as in the public life to which his people called him.

Even a casual meeting with Mr. FOSTER was a delight. His courtesy and amiability, coupled with bright mentality and quick responsiveness, gave no suggestion of the real struggle through which he had achieved success at the bar and which had peculiarly fitted him for the long public service during which he had won a most conspicuous position in the councils of the Nation. And yet, underneath lay hidden a life brimming with ambitions but subject to many discouragements, of many brilliant accomplishments, and some disheartening defeats; but through all, from childhood until death, there was always in evidence a calm, steady purpose and firm determination to succeed and an industry combined with a courage and persistence against which obstacles only served as a challenge to greater endeavor.

The record of DAVID J. FOSTER's life would make a stimulating story of the step-by-step process by which men reach high positions in the world's work when their undertakings are properly inspired and directed by honest ambition, accompanied by earnest, well-directed efforts.

Mr. FOSTER was born on a farm in the town of Barnet, neither blessed nor cursed by riches. His was the life of the boys in the rural districts of our mountainous State, where they are important factors, learning at an early date that labor is both necessary and honorable; that good character is as essential as is capital in business; and that under our free institutions the avenues to success and distinction are open to all who are worthy to attain them. He was essentially a New England product, and had these principles instilled by precept and example, in the development of which the little red schoolhouse and the old New England academy did their full part. To the education thus secured was added a college course at Dartmouth, from which institution he was graduated in 1880. It was distinctly to his advantage that in acquiring this educational attainment he was compelled to rely upon his own resources, and that in his subsequent study of the law he was likewise obliged to rely upon his own resources to meet his expenses, however much they were reduced by rigid economy. Each effort gave him greater strength to meet the one that followed. Each achievement gave him greater confidence in his ability to win still greater victories, and so, in the practice of his profession, which he followed in the city of Burlington, this process went on, and he quickly took high rank as a lawyer and grew in power and influence as a citizen.

Time will not permit an estimate of his work, either in his profession or any of the positions which he so acceptably filled, and I must confine myself to saying that he was early recognized as not only well grounded in the principles of the law, a safe counselor, but also a forceful practitioner. In short, he exemplified that excellent definition of a lawyer—"a gentleman learned in the law." Twice he was elected State's attorney for the county of Chittenden. His tastes led him into political life, and his ability was soon so marked that he was called from his county to serve as a senator in the General Assembly of Vermont, as one of the board of railroad commissioners of that State, and later as commissioner of State taxes.

He so creditably acquitted himself in all these positions that in 1900 the people of Vermont's first congressional district chose him to represent them in the National House of Representatives. For 12 years he served them with a rare fidelity. Among his associates he was considered a man of culture and intelligence, of sound judgment and individuality of action, and was much appreciated for his charming personal qualities. Not seeking the glare of the limelight, he gradually but surely advanced in usefulness and influence in the work of the House. While he looked sharply after the needs of his State and district and was unsparing of himself in the interests of his constituents, he found time to give attention to other things and grappled with broad problems not limited to the borders of his State or even to our national boundaries—he studied international questions.

It was his good fortune early in his service to be placed upon the Committee on Foreign Affairs, and in the ripeness of his experience and knowledge became its chairman, being regarded as one of the leaders in that great body which represents in a special sense the "rank and file" of the citizenship of the Nation. Because of this he was on more than one occasion chosen as the representative of the United States at noteworthy celebrations of international character. He became a much-traveled man, well versed on questions involving our relations with foreign Governments. He was a strong advocate of international peace, and was much sought as a speaker on this and kindred subjects.

Mr. FOSTER became a Member of the House at about the time I entered the Senate. We had been friends at the bar of Vermont; we became better friends here. Twelve years of companionship developed only the most agreeable relations. During that entire period I recall no instance, no suggestion, of any serious difference of opinion between us. We advised freely concerning all matters of common interest, candidly discussed every problem which presented itself, looking always to harmony and unity of action, in which we never failed.

The last time I met him was at a meeting of the Vermont delegation, called to devise methods best calculated to protect Vermont's great dairy interests. He was unusually quiet and reserved, and impressed me as being weary and worn, but protested that he was not out of health. He returned to his home, and my next knowledge was that he was seriously, though not dangerously, ill. Repeated inquiries brought assurances that time only was necessary to restore him to his accustomed vigor, and then came the end—sudden, as it was unexpected, and a life full of kind and genial as well as strong qualities was lost to the world.

It is due to the memory of our friend and to those he most tenderly loved, that I should say in closing that, notwithstanding the disciplinary experiences to which I have alluded, as fundamental factors in the development of the character of Mr. FOSTER, I am of the opinion that the great moral qualities he possessed, without the modifying influences of which he could not, however strong, have reached the distinction which will stand the test of time and criticism, were fostered in him by an ideal home life. Hardly ever have I observed more delightful domestic relations. To wife and daughters he ever gave freely of his love and sympathy, devotion and service, and in their reciprocal love and sympathy he received inspiration to lofty thought and noble action, without which his work would have fallen far short of what it was.

To-day his loved ones mourn the loss of one who to them was everything good implied in the term husband and father. Vermont mourns the loss of a public servant in whom confidence was rightly placed. His record is an honor to his State and an enduring monument to his memory.

Mr. BURTON. Mr. President, DAVID JOHNSON FOSTER was a son of Vermont, a Commonwealth which has made notable contributions to the citizenship of this Republic. One of the least in area, and not far from the least in population, Vermont has afforded proof that for the birth of genius and patriotism neither fertile fields nor widespread plains are essential. These qualities live and flourish among the quarries and the mountains of Vermont.

From Revolutionary times to the present day, whenever the tocsin of alarm has sounded the call to arms, the men of Vermont have been ready to respond. Whenever there has been a call for a missionary or a teacher in some remote part of the earth, or wherever self-sacrifice has been required, the women of Vermont have been ready to respond to the call.

Mr. FOSTER was born in Caledonia County, in one of the most rocky portions of the State, and worked his own way through Dartmouth College. He enjoyed the educational advantages afforded by that institution, the college which has furnished to the country Webster, Woodbury, Choate, Chase, and many other citizens of the highest rank and the greatest usefulness in many walks of life.

His surroundings were essentially those of the country. The college which he attended is located in a small town, where there is an all-pervading university atmosphere. His early life was passed in the rural portion of Vermont, and although later he settled in a city of some considerable size, nevertheless he did not enter upon the hurly-burly rush of American life which belongs to our great cities.

He early showed a predilection for a public career. He enjoyed that apprenticeship which, more than any other position, has been the initial step for a congressional career—the position of prosecuting attorney. He was afterwards a State senator in Vermont.

I may say of him, as one who served contemporaneously with him in the House of Representatives, that he made a most favorable impression from the very beginning of his career in the House in the year 1900. In that body, where promotion is often slow, he showed the sterling qualities of honesty and of industry. With no brilliant efforts in the way of oratory, he was a master of clear statement. He showed such a thorough understanding of the subjects upon which he spoke that he commanded the respect, and I may say the admiration, of his fellow Members.

At a rather early date he became a member of the Committee on Foreign Affairs, and I take it his greatest interest during his service of 12 years was in our relations with foreign countries and in the cause of peace.

Unfortunately his career was brought to a premature end. Such was his standing in his State that he no doubt would have been continued in the House of Representatives or in Congress to the very end of his life. Death came with startling suddenness. Even on the day of his death, I am told, it was thought he would soon recover from the illness which had detained him at home. He left a splendid record in the House.

Mr. President, there is a feature of his career which is to me almost pathetic—that with his ambition to serve his country, with his fondness for public life, he was cut off in his prime. His family mourn his death, and I desire to give my tribute of sorrow and sympathy to his wife and daughters, and also my tribute to his memory.

Along with all those who, serving well in any great cause, have been taken away before the work of life is done, he looked down, as it were, from the mountain heights upon the future with budding hopes, with confidence that in the future the work which he had been performing would bring still greater and better results, and that the causes for which he had labored might reach their glad fruition in his lifetime. But he was taken away from us, and we must mourn our loss.

Notwithstanding that his career was cut short, he accomplished much that was useful. We may look to him for an example of devotion to public service, of honesty, of friendliness, of good will to all.

Whatever may be the rank or station of anyone whose death we call to mind, or whose life we commemorate, we judge of them as men. Judging of him by that standard, he was a model husband, a model father, and in all the varied walks of life he has left an example which it is inspiring to follow.

Mr. PAGE. Mr. President, few men of this generation have been better types of those sons of Vermont who toughened into manhood on the hillside farm than DAVID JOHNSON FOSTER.

To what extent climatic conditions tend to produce exceptional intellectual strength it is difficult to say, but it is an interesting study to observe the characteristics which are stamped upon men who have grown up in those mountainous regions of our Northern States, where the temperature reaches a point so low that the mercury congeals, and this is oftentimes the case in Caledonia County, where Congressman FOSTER was born. Few winters pass there in which the temperature does not fall to 42 degrees below zero. When to this is added the further fact that the boys and girls who grew up with Congressman FOSTER were obliged to break their own roads through the deep snows to the little red schoolhouse, it is not unreasonable to believe that these severe endurance tests may, in some degree at least, account for the vigorous type of manhood which came from that section of the country.

Congressman FOSTER was born on the 27th day of June, 1857, upon his father's farm in Barnet, Vt. His early life was uneventful. He grew to early manhood amid those rugged natural surroundings and adverse conditions which developed in him that iron will, that indomitable pluck, and that sturdy self-reliance which are characteristics of those who are compelled to learn life's hard lessons through the toil and struggle necessary to overcome well-nigh insurmountable difficulties.

In the year 1880, at the age of 23, he graduated from Dartmouth College, and for a few years thereafter was, I believe, a teacher of rhetoric in that institution.

During his college days he supplemented his slender income from father and friends by teaching school in winter and tutoring students in the lower classes of the college. It has been said that genius has an unlimited capacity for hard work. Measured by this standard, Congressman FOSTER had few superiors, for he was industry personified.

He removed to Burlington, Vt., soon after his graduation from Dartmouth College, and in 1883 was admitted to the bar. In 1886 he was made the prosecuting attorney of his county, an office which he continued to hold until 1890. From 1892 to 1894 he was a member of the State senate. From 1894 to 1898 he was State commissioner of taxes. In 1898 he was made chairman of the board of railroad commissioners of Vermont, a position which he held until 1900, when he was elected a Member of Congress.

Congressman FOSTER, by reason of his eminent abilities as a natural orator, was early called into public life. For many years he had been in constant demand in many of the States of the Union for service in political campaigns. He was the first president of the Young Men's Republican Club of Vermont. As a parliamentarian he ranked very high, and was often called to the chair by Speaker CANNON.

Having once entered the political arena, he found little difficulty in reaching the goal of his ambition, as he passed from station to station up the line of political and official honor to membership in the National House of Representatives.

It was probably as chairman of the Committee on Foreign Affairs of the National House of Representatives that Congressman FOSTER was able to perform his most important service to his country. He was appointed a member of that committee in 1901. In 1910 he was made its chairman, and from that time forward until his death he brought to the discharge of the duties of that office a measure of ability which made him an invaluable public servant.

I do not think I wrongly estimate the attitude of Vermont toward Congressman FOSTER when I say that a large portion of the good people of the Green Mountain State had concerning him but one expectation, and that was that when there was a vacancy in the upper branch of Congress from the west side of the State he would be called upon to fill that vacancy. Vermont looked upon this favorite son as a genuine product of the rigorous life and environment which had given to our State her long line of distinguished men, who, like him, had been developed and nurtured on her cold, rocky hillside Vermont farms. They saw in his character those elements which they loved and appreciated, because he was of them in nature, in extraction, in industry, and in vigor.

Congressman FOSTER's early life and training had developed a strength of character which made him equal to any and every emergency. President Taft named him as chairman of the delegation which represented this country at the Centennial of Mexican Independence, a commission the duties of which he discharged with credit to himself and honor to his country. President Taft also named him as chairman of the delegation from the United States to the general assembly of the International Institute of Agriculture at Rome.

Wherever he was placed, whether as a representative of this country abroad or as the chairman of the important Committee on Foreign Affairs of the House, he discharged the duties devolving upon him in such a way as to reflect credit upon himself and to create in the hearts of his constituents a just pride in their Representative.

Few men possessed his power of attracting to themselves the young men of their acquaintance. He was universally popular, but with the younger element of his district he was exceptionally so. Always genial, always meeting everyone with a smile, always zealously anxious to serve everyone by little acts of kindness, always faithful in the discharge of every trust reposed in him by his constituents in matters here in Washington, he had come to be—as he deserved to be—one of the most popular and best beloved of all the sons of his State.

Modest, unassuming, kind, with an irresistible personal charm which drew his fellow men to him, he was the perfect embodiment of courtesy and gentleness, which, coupled with a broad mind, a large heart, and an amiable and lovable disposition, resulted in producing a combination of qualities rarely found in a single individual.

It was a part of my duty to go to Vermont, in advance of the joint committee from the Senate and House appointed to attend the funeral, to help in arranging its details, and I shall never forget the genuine, heartfelt grief manifested by every Vermonter with whom I came in contact while on this sad errand. On every hand was heard the expression: "Vermont has suffered an irreparable loss."

From all parts of the State, not alone from his own congressional district, the people gathered, in numbers larger than are wont to be present on such occasions, to show their respect and their affection for Congressman FOSTER.

We often hear the remark made that the true test of a man's character is his home life. It was my great good fortune to visit Congressman FOSTER at his home here in Washington on repeated occasions, and I was always deeply impressed with the affectionate devotion which existed between the father and the three daughters, who, with the wife, constituted his family.

His last illness was not believed to be serious until the day of his death. It was my custom to telephone Mrs. Foster at their home and inquire as to his health, and, without a single exception, the reply came back to me: "He is not seriously ill; he is tired and needs a little time for recuperation. He will soon be back in the House." Little did she realize that in a few hours this strong man was to be stricken down by the grim reaper.

On March 21 of last year, at a time when life and hope were brightest and when honors were falling thickest upon him, he was called home.

One might be inclined to question the wisdom of divine Providence in removing from such a family a father so richly endowed, and to assert that there were few men who might not have been better spared than this strong, charming personality who had achieved such a commanding position in the affairs of his State and in the councils of the Nation. Why he should have been thus suddenly stricken down and his country deprived of his trained leadership, at a time when all his powers were flowering into their most perfect bloom, is a question which it is not given human intelligence to answer.

Mr. President, I realize only too well that I have been able to touch far too lightly upon a life whose fullness and beauty furnishes material from which could have been formulated so much of good. But when the future historian, in the light of a true perspective, shall come to write with deliberation and painstaking care a record of the strong and virile statesmen who have played their parts in the national field of legislation during the first decade of the twentieth century, his account will be far from complete if it fails to include therein in liberal measure the part played in important public affairs by DAVID JOHNSON FOSTER.

To the long line of Vermont's illustrious dead whose names hold places of honor in our Nation's history, and especially the names of those sons who have been prominent in the Nation's councils here in Washington during the last threescore years, to the names of Collamer, Foote, Morrill, Proctor, we now add the name of FOSTER.

They had lived longer than he and were garnered like sheaves of ripened wheat in their old age and after long years of distinguished public service, while he was cut down at the zenith of his vigorous manhood. Their memories are revered and venerated by Vermonters everywhere, but none of them were more dearly beloved by an appreciative constituency than the one to whose name we to-day pay our tribute of respect, DAVID JOHNSON FOSTER.

MEMORIAL ADDRESSES ON THE LATE REPRESENTATIVE LOUDENSLAGER.

Mr. BRIGGS. Mr. President, I ask the Chair to lay before the Senate the resolutions of the House of Representatives on the death of the late Representative LOUDENSLAGER of New Jersey.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore (Mr. GALLINGER). The Chair lays before the Senate resolutions of the House of Representatives which will be read.

The Secretary read the resolutions of the House as follows:

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,
May 5, 1912.

Resolved, That the business of the House be now suspended that opportunity may be given for tributes to the memory of Hon. HENRY C. LOUDENSLAGER, late a Member of the House from the State of New Jersey.

Resolved, That as a particular mark of respect to the memory of the deceased and in recognition of his distinguished public career the House, at the conclusion of these exercises, shall stand adjourned.

Resolved, That the Clerk communicate these resolutions to the Senate.

Resolved, That the Clerk send a copy of these resolutions to the family of the deceased.

Mr. BRIGGS. Mr. President, I submit the resolutions which I send to the desk, and I ask for their adoption.

The resolutions (S. Res. 496) were read, considered by unanimous consent, and unanimously agreed to, as follows:

Resolved, That the Senate expresses its profound sorrow on account of the death of the Hon. HENRY C. LOUDENSLAGER, late a Member of the House of Representatives from the State of New Jersey.

Resolved, That the business of the Senate be now suspended in order that fitting tribute may be paid his high character and distinguished public services.

Resolved, That the Secretary communicate a copy of these resolutions to the House of Representatives and to the family of the deceased.

Mr. BRIGGS. Mr. President, it is significant of the affection and esteem which HENRY CLAY LOUDENSLAGER inspired among the men with whom he came in contact that, when memorial addresses were delivered in his honor in the House of Representatives last May, a score of Members representing the North and the South, the East and the West, and the two great political parties vied in paying genuine tribute to him as a man and a colleague. It is significant, too, that through his 18 years of national service he was the intimate of men like Reed, Henderson, Sherman, and CANNON, and that no Member of Congress ever enjoyed in fuller measure the friendship of both sides of that Chamber. The Members who honored his memory that day numbered those who had grown gray in the service of the House and those who were serving their first term as legislators. No man was more catholic in his friendships, more ready to stand by his old and tried associates, or more eager to give advice and kindly admonition to the youngest Member.

The life of HENRY CLAY LOUDENSLAGER, beginning on a New Jersey farm and ending as one of the strong men of the House of Representatives, is an inspiration to the youth of his State. He was born on a farm in Gloucester County, near the town of Paulsboro, in 1852, and early became identified with the public affairs of his county. His first office was clerk of Gloucester County, and from that place of trust he went to the broader field of national politics. His district first sent him to Congress by a modest plurality as a Member of the Fifty-third Congress. It returned him two years later with a handsome plurality, and for 10 consecutive times the first congressional district sent him back to Washington. At the time of his death there were less than 10 Members of the House who had served for a greater number of consecutive terms.

As a Member of Congress Mr. LOUDENSLAGER was not active in debate but accurate. He preferred the work of the committee room to distinction on the floor, but when he did address the House, lacked none of the qualities that give a man distinction as an orator. His greatest pride was his identification with the work of the Committee on Naval Affairs, and in his 18 years of service no man in Congress was more instrumental in building up the American Navy from an insignificant tonnage to the rank of the third greatest naval power.

The Navy had no more ardent champion, and when the War with Spain came HENRY LOUDENSLAGER had played his part in giving to the Nation an efficient arm of the service. As in his advocacy of a strong Navy, he was also sound on all the big economic questions that Congress had to meet in his 18 years of legislative life. He was a believer in a protective tariff and true to the support of its principles, and was always found on the right side of the big questions that called for solution in that span of years. He was identified through all his service with pension legislation, and gave to its onerous work and heavy responsibilities sound business judgment, justice, and sympathy for the men who bore the brunt of the Civil War. There is no question that his devotion to his heavy and increasing duties and his conscientious performance of them hastened his death. And in his death the House lost a Member of the type that can ill be spared and its Members lost a generous and sincere friend.

Mr. LOUDENSLAGER was a partisan in politics, but in the ranks of his political opponents he was held in as high esteem as in his own party. He believed in organization and in the party caucus, and in his last years in the House was secretary of the Republican caucus. He possessed rare political acumen and played a large part in his party's councils. In 1906, while acting as secretary of the Republican congressional committee, the duties of the chairman fell upon him because of the poor health of James S. Sherman, and in 1908 he did efficient service in the same capacity. He was placed in full charge of the eastern headquarters in 1908 and 1910, and the victories of 1906 and 1908 owed much to him.

No man served his constituency to better purpose and no man enjoyed its confidence in greater measure. While tireless in his attention to the needs of his district and his State, he was broad enough and well equipped enough to give the same indefatigable attention to national problems. His domestic life was flawless, his political life free from the taint of suspicion, and he was a man who abhorred the demagogue and the self-seeker and who held his legions of friends closer year by year through the generous, sincere, and admirable traits of his personal character.

Mr. BURTON. Mr. President, the Sixty-second Congress has an unprecedented record in the number of deaths of its Members. It would seem that this is more than a mere coincidence, that it indicates the increasing strain and stress of public life. Indeed, if we compare the work of a Member of the House of Representatives or of the Senate with that of anyone engaged in one of the professions or in any other branch of life, the hours of labor, the manifold demands and the degree of worry are very considerably more in a legislative career. Year by year it would seem that these demands upon us are increasing, and that a greater care of health and if possible some lessening of the duties which rest upon us should be secured.

Mr. LOUDENSLAGER was a man who seemed to have a perfect physique and to enjoy the best of health. He was always cheerful. During the 15 years in which I was acquainted with him he never complained a day of indisposition. Indeed it was characteristic of him that he was always genial, always companionable.

Mr. President, his principal record will be that of an active political manager. He was during the greater part of his congressional service a member of the national Republican congressional committee. As such he enjoyed the friendship and confidence of three Presidents of the United States—President McKinley, President Roosevelt, and President Taft, and he was also an intimate associate of Vice President Sherman.

A certain amount of obloquy in this time rests upon the politician or political manager. He is an object of censure and sometimes of ridicule, and not infrequently it is claimed that his methods are devious. I do not believe there was ever one breath of suspicion against Mr. LOUDENSLAGER. Though he was like a fiery gladiator in political contests, he always had a smile and a ready handshake for his political opponents and enjoyed their personal confidence. During nearly all of the time when he was a member of this committee his efforts were marked by success. I remember conversing with him during the disastrous campaign of 1910, and I noted some degree of discouragement and a much less amount of confidence than had characterized him in the campaigns from 1896 to 1908; yet he bore the prospective punishment which his party was to receive bravely, with confidence that such reverses as might come would not be permanent, and that the principles which he had cherished so long would still retain their vitality.

I wish to repeat, Mr. President, that there was no breath of suspicion against him in his management of political campaigns, and that popular ideas are often wrong with reference to a candidate. If there is anything questionable in political management, it, like all other evils in the body politic, is principally due to the people themselves, to their inattention, to the necessity for constant vigilance, the great amount of labor and exhortation in arousing interest and bringing the people to perform their political duties.

In this branch of work Mr. LOUDENSLAGER did not shrink. He was always ready for any campaign, with its turmoil and its varied activities, to strike the hardest blows which a political leader can employ.

Nor was it as a political manager that his time was occupied. He was a careful legislator, a man who was always ready in the committee room, faithful and punctual in attendance, a devoted and careful student of great questions of governmental policy.

We all regret to learn of his death. We mourn his loss. We mourn him as one of exceptional friendliness and goodheartedness. We mourn him as a man who had a multitude of friends and few, if any, enemies.

The last years of his life were rendered sad by the death of his only son. Possibly this untimely loss may have hastened Mr. LOUDENSLAGER'S death.

His record is known in New Jersey and in the Nation as a valiant fighter for the principles which he espoused. He was a man who in all the varied walks of life commanded respect, and he has left a record in public and private life which is stainless and worthy of all praise.

Mr. JONES. Mr. President, the exercises of to-day emphasize the mortality that has afflicted the present Congress. We have to-day eulogized eight Members who have passed away, and it is striking that not one of those Members had reached the allotted span of three-score years and ten. They have all been taken in their prime. Most, if not all, of them had much to look forward to. We who knew them had every reason to believe that each had many years of usefulness yet before him. They are gone. Their life's work is ended.

I do not propose to philosophize as to why this has happened. I can add nothing to what has already been said. After all our philosophizing and speculation we still confront a mystery unsolvable in human experience. I simply want to say a word in regard to one whom I first met when I entered Congress. I entered the House in the Fifty-sixth Congress. Mr. LOUDENSLAGER was one of the first men I met. He was at that time one of the Republican leaders and influential in the counsels of the party and party organization. In the House, while strong friendships are formed and intimate relations established, it is different from this body. There the membership is large in number and here it is small. There service is upon few committees, generally only one or two, and here on many. Here we come in daily contact with many of our fellow Members in the work of committees; we become acquainted with them in the various departments of our legislative work.

During my 10 years of service in the House of Representatives, when Mr. LOUDENSLAGER was also a Member, he and I never served upon the same committee. He was chairman of the Pensions Committee and a member of the Naval Committee. By reason of the interest of my State in naval matters we were brought in close contact, as well as by reason of the prominent part he took in the political organization of the House.

As has been said by the Senator from Ohio [Mr. BURTON], he was a very genial man, sociable, friendly, and accommodating. He was an active, industrious, energetic man, looking after the interests of his people, and especially of his district, and especially after the interests of the Navy. He was very patriotic, and believed intensely in a strong Navy for our country. He took a great interest in that arm of the national defense. He was always prepared to defend the naval appropriation bill and to resist any assault that might be made upon what he considered the necessary arm of the national defense.

He was a strong partisan. He believed in organization and the party caucus. He always accepted the party decrees and followed and upheld them.

He was strong in personal friendships. He was always ready to help and assist his fellow Members and very considerate of new Members, and I remember with much pleasure the many courtesies he extended to me. Take him all in all, he was a most valued Member of the House of Representatives, a splendid man, a splendid citizen, a man whose friendship it was a privilege to have, a man whose memory is an incentive to higher endeavor and better work in behalf of the country and the interests of our people. His work as a legislator fully justified the confidence of his constituents and the honors they conferred on him.

I am glad to have had the opportunity to know him and to have served with him. I regret his untimely taking off. I am grateful for the opportunity on this solemn occasion to pay this simple tribute to his memory and to the friendship that I prized so highly.

Mr. CURTIS. Mr. President, it was in the Fifty-third Congress that HENRY CLAY LOUDENSLAGER began his service in the House of Representatives, and it was at the beginning of this Congress that I first knew him. Our service together continued until the Sixtieth Congress, and in that time I came to know him intimately and well and to esteem him highly both as a friend and as a legislator.

His was a character to inspire confidence and attract friends, and those of us who came daily into contact with him in the House and out, unite in bearing testimony to his cheerful good nature, his kindliness and his integrity. Though a partisan, he never carried his party preferences into his personal relations and his friends were many, even though differing in political belief. Because of his ability to do things, his rise to influence in the House was rapid, and it was not long before he made himself felt both on the floor of that body and in the councils of his party, and his advice was sought on many and varied important questions.

He was chosen secretary of the Republican national congressional committee in 1906 and served in that capacity until 1909, when he was selected as the chairman of the committee. He worked early and late and with marked success for his party and for a united organization in the House of Representatives.

His services to his district, his State, and his country can not be measured in words. He labored industriously in and out of season for the good of all and accomplished much which lives after him. His friends were sincere in their affection for him; the public respected and esteemed him, and the Nation possessed in him a son who gave of his devotion and his ability without stint. No sacrifice was demanded of him in public affairs which he did not cheerfully and willingly meet.

Although having long been in public life he was, first of all, a business man and believed in business methods in public affairs. He was interested in the welfare of the people at large, and his knowledge of events was thorough, and his action was taken from a broad and conservative viewpoint.

HENRY CLAY LOUDENSLAGER was a patriotic citizen, a devoted husband, a true and loyal friend. His going was mourned, his memory is revered and will ever abide with those who knew him, as to know him was to love him.

Mr. OLIVER. Mr. President, HENRY CLAY LOUDENSLAGER, Representative in Congress from the first district of New Jersey, died on the 12th day of August, 1911. He was less than 60 years old, and had served in Congress for nearly 20 years. For some time previous his health had been failing, and his death was no surprise, though it came as a shock to the thousands of friends he had made during his long public service. My acquaintance with Mr. LOUDENSLAGER was almost altogether of a personal nature, as I came but little into contact with him in connection with his services as a Representative in Congress. I first met him in 1906, when he was secretary of the Republican congressional committee and virtually chairman by reason of Mr. Sherman's illness. His personal traits were such as to endear him to all with whom he came in contact. He was gentle in demeanor, modest and easy in his intercourse with men, and conciliation was the keynote of his disposition; but underlying all this was a strength and vigor of character well understood by all friends, but not apparent to those whose intercourse with him was but casual. Whatever he undertook to do he did well, and the extent of his appreciation by those at home who knew him best is shown by his repeated election for 10 terms, a length of service excelled by only four of those who served with him in the present Congress. He was a strong believer in party organization and the maintenance of party spirit. He was a standpat Republican, with all that the name implies, because he believed it was to his country's interest to steer by the landmarks which had always guided the ship of state, and by adhering to which the Republican Party had maintained its supremacy during more than half a century.

He was a strong man, modest in his ambitions, gentle in his character, and altogether lovable. Peace to his ashes.

Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey. Mr. President, I speak not to-night of HARRY LOUDENSLAGER'S achievements in the halls of Congress, or on the stump, or on the platform, but I speak to-night of HARRY LOUDENSLAGER as a friend and a citizen of New Jersey.

HARRY LOUDENSLAGER represented the first district of New Jersey. He was HARRY to us all, a genial, generous, big-hearted man. Everyone who knew him loved him, for HARRY was everybody's friend. We did not agree in politics. I have combated him a hundred times on the stump, but never lost sight of his generosity nor his big and glorious humanity.

He said to me when I was stumping in his part of the State, the southern part of New Jersey, "We are wide apart in political contests but after all we have but one ambition, one hope, one aim, and that is to help our country and our fellow man." What a glorious aim, what a holy purpose was that, my countrymen.

In our State of New Jersey, there are literally thousands who would bear cheerful testimony to his ever-generous hand. When storm and sleet without battered window panes the cheery glow of many a hearthstone could be traced to the liberal purse and generous hand of HARRY LOUDENSLAGER.

His death seemed untimely, for he was but a boy. Sweet thoughts and loving memories are the treasures left by HARRY LOUDENSLAGER. That God's blessing may come to him and his family, Mr. President, is my supplication and my prayer.

CHICKASAW AND CHOCTAW INDIAN CLAIMS.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate the following message from the President of the United States, which was read and referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs and ordered to be printed:

To the Senate:

I am in receipt of a copy of resolution adopted by the Senate February 25, 1913, reading as follows:

Resolved, That the President be requested, if not incompatible with the public interest, to cause to be transmitted to the Senate copies of all letters, telegrams, reports, opinions, and other documents on file in either the Department of the Interior or the Department of Justice in relation to any contract or claims for fees or compensation on the part of the firm of Mansfield, McMurray & Cornish, or any member thereof, against the Chickasaw and Choctaw Tribes of Indians, which claims are alleged to be due and unpaid and are now pending before the President or any department of the Government; and,

Second. To transmit like copies of all such letters, telegrams, reports, opinions, and other documents in relation to any claim on the part of the Chickasaw and Choctaw Tribes of Indians against the firm of Mansfield, McMurray & Cornish, or any member thereof.

Resolved further, That the President be requested to withhold action on any and all said claims until further action by the Congress or by the courts.

In view of the request contained in this resolution, I shall withhold action on any of the claims referred to in the resolution. The papers called for are, however, so voluminous that it is impossible that they should be adequately prepared for transmission to the Senate or that any adequate consideration could be given to them before the expiration of the present session. I have concluded, therefore, to remit the whole matter for the incoming administration to deal with.

OIL AND GAS LANDS OF OSAGE NATION.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate a communication from the Secretary of the Interior, transmitting, in response to a resolution of the 28th ultimo, all of the files of the Department of the Interior, including both the office of the Secretary and the office of Indian Affairs, containing papers which can be identified as the correspondence and protests relating to the proposed leasing of oil and gas lands of the Osage Nation, together with the proposed rules and regulations, which, with the accompanying papers, was referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by J. C. South, its Chief Clerk, announced that the House had disagreed to the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 28812) making appropriations for the naval service for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1914; agrees to the conference asked for by the Senate on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon, and had appointed Mr. PADGETT, Mr. GREGG of Texas, and Mr. FOSS managers at the conference on the part of the House.

The message also announced that the House still further insists upon its disagreement to the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 26680) making appropriations for the legislative, executive, and judicial expenses of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1914, and for other purposes, agrees to the further conference asked for by the Senate on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon, and had appointed

Mr. JOHNSON of South Carolina, Mr. BURLESON, and Mr. GILLETT managers at the conference on the part of the House.

The message further announced that the President of the United States having returned to the House of Representatives, in accordance with the resolution of Congress of February 28, the bill (H. R. 18787) relating to the limitation of the hours of daily services of laborers and mechanics employed upon a public work of the United States and of the District of Columbia, and of all persons employed in constructing, maintaining, or improving a river or harbor of the United States and of the District of Columbia; and the Speaker of the House of Representatives having canceled his signature thereto, in accordance with said resolution, the House asks a further conference with the Senate on the said bill and amendments and had appointed Mr. WILSON of Pennsylvania, Mr. BUCHANAN, and Mr. GARDNER of New Jersey managers at the conference on the part of the House.

The message also announced that the House had agreed to the report of the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 27148) making appropriations for the service of the Post Office Department for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1914, and for other purposes, recedes from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate No. 25, and agrees to the same with an amendment, in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate, further insists upon its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate No. 26 upon which the committee of conference have been unable to agree, asks a further conference with the Senate on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon, and had appointed Mr. MOON of Tennessee, Mr. FINLEY, and Mr. WEEKS managers at the conference on the part of the House.

SENATOR FROM WEST VIRGINIA.

Mr. CHILTON presented the credentials of NATHAN GOFF, chosen by the Legislature of the State of West Virginia a Senator from that State for the term beginning March 4, 1913, which were read and ordered to be filed.

DEFICIENCY APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. WARREN. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of House bill 28858—the deficiency appropriation bill.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (H. R. 28858) making appropriations to supply deficiencies in appropriations for the fiscal year 1913 and for prior years, and for other purposes, which had been reported from the Committee on Appropriations with amendments.

Mr. WARREN. I make the usual request that the formal reading of the bill be dispensed with, that the bill be read for amendment, and that the committee amendments be first considered.

Mr. BRYAN. I do not desire to object, but I do not presume it is fair to the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. NELSON].

Mr. WARREN. I can not hear what the Senator from Florida says.

Mr. BRYAN. I thought it was only fair that the Senator from Minnesota, who was not in his seat, should know of the request. If it is satisfactory to him I have no objection.

Mr. WARREN. The Senator from Minnesota is in his place.

Mr. BRYAN. I see that he is.

Mr. NELSON. I did not understand.

Mr. BRYAN. I simply wanted the Senator from Minnesota to know that the request had been made to take up the deficiency appropriation bill, which would operate to displace the river and harbor bill.

Mr. NELSON. I have tried to get the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations to yield to the conference report on the river and harbor bill, but he insists upon going on with the deficiency appropriation bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Wyoming asks unanimous consent that the formal reading of the bill be dispensed with, that the bill be read for amendment, and that the committee amendments be first considered. Is there objection? The Chair hears none.

The Secretary proceeded to read the bill.

The first amendment of the Committee on Appropriations was, under the head of "Executive," on page 2, after line 7, to insert:

> To make the salary of the Secretary to the President at the rate of $7,500 per annum from March 4, 1913, to June 30, 1914, inclusive, $3,312.50, and hereafter said salary is fixed at the rate of $7,500 per annum.

The amendment was agreed to.

INDIAN APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. GAMBLE. I should like to submit a conference report on House bill 26874, the Indian appropriation bill.

Mr. WARREN. I understand the Senator from South Dakota wishes to submit a conference report and I cheerfully yield for that purpose. Of course if it should lead to any debate, it would have to go over and be printed.

Mr. GAMBLE. I submit the conference report and ask that the same be printed; and I give notice that I shall call it up for consideration as soon as the executive session ends, after the recess that will be taken to-night.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The conference report will be printed. (S. Doc. No. 1128.)

EIGHT-HOUR LAW.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair lays before the Senate a message from the House of Representatives and calls the attention of the Senator from Indiana [Mr. SHIVELY].

The Secretary read as follows:

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,
March 1, 1913.

Resolved, That the President of the United States having returned to the House of Representatives, in accordance with the resolution of Congress of February 28, the bill (H. R. 18787) relating to the limitation of the hours of daily services of laborers and mechanics employed upon a public work of the United States and of the District of Columbia, and of all persons employed in constructing, maintaining, or improving a river or harbor of the United States and of the District of Columbia; and the Speaker of the House of Representatives having canceled his signature thereto, in accordance with said resolution, the House asks a further conference with the Senate on the said bill and amendments and has appointed Mr. WILSON of Pennsylvania, Mr. BUCHANAN, and Mr. GARDNER of New Jersey, managers at the same on its part.

Mr. SHIVELY. Mr. President, I move a reconsideration of the vote by which the conference report on bill H. R. 18787, returned by the President to the House in compliance with House concurrent resolution No. 72, was agreed to.

The motion to reconsider was agreed to.

Mr. SHIVELY. Mr. President, I move that the Senate agree to the further conference asked for by the House of Representatives on bill H. R. 18787, returned by the President to the House in compliance with House concurrent resolution No. 72, and that the Chair appoint the conferees on the part of the Senate.

The motion was agreed to; and the President pro tempore appointed Mr. BORAH, Mr. PENROSE, and Mr. SHIVELY conferees on the part of the Senate at the further conference.

MILITARY ACADEMY APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. DU PONT. Will the Senator from Wyoming yield to me to submit a conference report?

Mr. WARREN. The Senator from Delaware wishes to submit a conference report on the Military Academy appropriation bill. If it is for reading, I yield.

Mr. DU PONT submitted the following report (S. Doc. No. 1127):

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 28699) making appropriations for the support of the Military Academy for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1914, having met, after full and free conference have agreed to recommend and do recommend to their respective Houses as follows:

That the Senate recede from its amendments numbered 4 and 5.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendments of the Senate numbered 2, 3, 6, 8, and 9, and agree to the same.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 1, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: Strike out all of the matter proposed to be inserted by said amendment down to and including the words "Provided further," in line 16, and in lieu thereof insert "$360,000: Provided"; and after the word "President," at the end of the amendment, insert: ": Provided further, That any cadet or cadets reinstated under the provisions of this act shall be additional to those otherwise authorized by law"; and the Senate agree to the same.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 7, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In line 5 of the matter inserted by said amendment strike out "$10,000" and in lieu thereof insert "$5,000"; and after the word "construction," in line 6, insert the words "and completion"; and the Senate agree to the same.

H. A. DU PONT,
JOS. M. DIXON,
JOS. F. JOHNSTON,
Managers on the part of the Senate.

JAMES HAY,
JAMES L. SLAYDEN,
JULIUS KAHN,
Managers on the part of the House.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the conference report.

Mr. BRISTOW. Mr. President, I should like to have the report printed before it is agreed to.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Kansas objects to the present consideration of the report, and it will be printed.

DEFICIENCY APPROPRIATION BILL.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 28858) making appropriations to supply deficiencies in appropriations for the fiscal year 1913 and for prior years, and for other purposes.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Secretary will resume the reading of the bill.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President, a parliamentary inquiry. How did the conference report upon the river and harbor bill happen to be set aside.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It has not been called up, the Chair will say.

Mr. WILLIAMS. That is the regular order, is it not?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If a motion had been made to call it up, but no such motion was made.

Mr. WILLIAMS. If that is the regular order, I call for the regular order.

Mr. LODGE. The regular order is the unfinished business, I suggest.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That is true.

Mr. WARREN. We are going on with an appropriation bill, and I yielded simply for the presentation of the conference report, which is a privileged question. When that report has been made, it is not thereafter a privileged question as against an appropriation bill which has not yet gone to conference.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I understand that one conference report has no priority over another. The river and harbor conference report was before the Senate for discussion.

Mr. WARREN. The river and harbor conference report was not before the Senate.

Mr. WILLIAMS. It was before the Senate and was being discussed.

Mr. WARREN. The deficiency bill was before the Senate, regularly called up—an appropriation bill.

Mr. WILLIAMS. How did the river and harbor bill get before the Senate?

Mr. LODGE. The regular order is the seamen's bill, and not the river and harbor bill.

Mr. DU PONT. No; it is the Military Academy appropriation bill.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I call for the regular order. If that is the seamen's bill, I welcome it, and I desire that it shall be considered.

Mr. WARREN. The regular order is the appropriation bill now being read.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The reading of the bill will proceed.

The reading of the bill was resumed.

The next amendment of the Committee on Appropriations was, on page 2, after line 12, to insert:

The cost of printing Senate Document No. 1113 of this session shall be charged wholly to and paid out of any balance remaining unexpended March 4, 1913, of the appropriation for the President's Commission on Economy and Efficiency.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment will be agreed to, without objection.

Mr. WILLIAMS. How does that bill get before the Senate, Mr. President?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. By motion of the Senator from Wyoming [Mr. WARREN].

Mr. LODGE. Regular order!

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The motion displaced for the time being whatever may have heretofore been under consideration.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I have understood that the unfinished business was the seamen's bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That bill was laid aside and has not been called up by the Senator having it in charge.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I call it up. I suppose any Senator has a right to call it up.

Mr. LODGE. When I made my suggestion about the seamen's bill, I supposed the deficiency bill had been taken up by unanimous consent.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It was not.

Mr. LODGE. It was taken up by motion?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It was.

Mr. LODGE. Therefore the regular order is the appropriation bill, which has displaced the other.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. As a matter of fact, this bill, having been taken up on motion, displaced the unfinished business.

Mr. LODGE. That is what I tried to explain.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President, the seamen's bill has been before the Senate for some time. It involves the principle of involuntary servitude on the part of able seamen in the merchant marine, and it ought not to be laid aside; it ought to be considered and passed upon one way or the other by the Senate. I do not care to discuss it at any length, but I do care that it shall be considered. It seems to me that it is the regular order in the Senate at this time, and it ought not to be set aside.

Furthermore, Mr. President, I do not understand how it happens that the conference report on the river and harbor bill, after being discussed for four or five hours to-day, should be set aside in behalf of another conference report.

Mr. WARREN. Mr. President, the Senator is mistaken in his understanding of the situation. The bill has not been laid aside for any other conference report. It lies right where it did—before the Senate for consideration. The bill under consideration is not a conference report; it is the regular annual deficiency appropriation bill, which we are proceeding to pass through the Senate, so that it may go to the other House and get into conference. I moved in the regular way to take it up, and the motion was carried unanimously.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President, will the Senator permit me to interrupt him?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Wisconsin.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President, the Senator's motion was not submitted to the Senate; there was no vote upon the question of taking up this appropriation bill as against the regular order, which is the unfinished business—the seamen's bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. As the Chair recalls the matter, the Senator from Wyoming made the motion, and the Chair submitted the question and declared it carried.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I have just consulted the record, Mr. President, and I think I am right about it.

Mr. WARREN. Mr. President, if there is any disposition here not to pass the deficiency bill, the quicker we understand it the better, because I want to say, in all seriousness, that unless we pass this bill to-night and get it to the printers, to the House, and to our engrossing clerks, we probably shall be unable to get it through in the limited time we have. That is all.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President, I for one am very reluctant to antagonize the consideration of an appropriation bill, but for 18 years the seamen of this country have asked to be relieved from slavery. Last August there came to this Senate a bill which, if enacted into law, would emancipate them. It has been in the Committee on Commerce from that time to this. The hearings upon it of the shipowners have been protracted day after day, week after week, and month after month, until now, in the closing hours of this Congress, it seems impossible to get it before the Senate for consideration. Better, Mr. President, that some appropriation bill should fail than that the blot of slavery should remain upon American seamen.

If we can have some assurance that that bill is going to be taken up and considered and given a fair chance to get into conference, appropriation bills can be passed. I for my part would not stand in the way of the consideration of these appropriation bills if there could be some understanding arrived at by unanimous consent for the taking up of that bill and a vote be had upon it.

Mr. President, some two years ago I presented to the Senate a memorial by the seamen of this country, setting forth conditions against which every American ought to revolt.

At that time I introduced a bill similar to the one which passed the House of Representatives. It was referred to the committee that has charge of this subject. Before the close of the last session I appealed to the committee to be informed if it could not receive some attention; if there was not some hope that it might be considered and reported upon at that session. I received the assurance of the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. NELSON], the chairman of the committee, that it was his purpose to convene his committee even before the beginning of the present session in order that the hearings might be disposed of, so that the committee at the very beginning of the session might consider and speedily report the bill. I followed it before that committee, keeping informed as best I could upon the progress made, and waiting, hoping, and believing it was to be presented to the Senate in time for the Senate to act upon it. It was my hope that it would be passed in time to permit the two Houses, through a conference, to arrive at an agreement that would relieve 120,000 to 130,000 men engaged in that vocation from the slavery under which they now suffer. At the same time it would give to the traveling public some security for life, so that we might not be confronted with such disasters as the Titanic and the multitude of others of somewhat similar character which have appalled the world.

The welfare of the men who man American vessels and of the public seems to have received little consideration, because legislation in the interest of property, in the interest of the owners of the vessels has forestalled all other considerations which work to the safety of passengers upon vessels, to the preservation of life, and all humane and decent treatment of the men who follow the sea for a living.

Now, Mr. President, we are nearing the close of this session, and for one I think the time has come to have consideration of this subject, to come to some understanding about it, and to know whether we can have a vote upon this tremendously important measure.

Mr. WARREN. Will the Senator allow me?

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Certainly.

Mr. WARREN. Mr. President, I hope the Senator understands one thing, and that is it does not make a particle more difference to me whether we pass the appropriation bills than it does to any other Senator. I had no motive whatever, either of displacing or delaying the consideration of the seamen's bill, but I think Senators will all admit that, when a bill has been laid aside for the day, other business can be taken up and considered. While the taking up of the deficiency appropriation bill might displace the other measure—for perhaps no longer time than we have already debated this matter—after the appropriation bill is disposed of I think its relation would be the same, because the unfinished business was before the Senate and must in some way have been laid aside for the day.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. It was temporarily laid aside for the consideration of another measure, but not for the consideration of this measure.

Mr. WARREN. If the Senator will allow me——

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. It was temporarily laid aside for the consideration of the conference report on the river and harbor bill, and no other measure has any right here as against the unfinished business excepting as it obtains that right by a vote of the Senate, or if by the consent of the Senate the unfinished business shall be still further laid aside for the consideration of the other measure.

Mr. WARREN. Will the Senator allow me to interrupt him again?

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Certainly.

Mr. WARREN. I was not in the Chamber when the unfinished business was laid aside, but it has been the usual—in fact, I might say the universal—custom when a bill is laid aside that it is laid aside subject to matters that come up during the day, and I supposed that that was the case in this instance.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I am very certain, if the Senator will permit me, that the Senator from Ohio did not consent to the laying aside of the seamen's bill for the day. He consented to the laying aside of that bill temporarily for the consideration of the conference report on the rivers and harbors bill; and, if that be true, Mr. President, it has not the sanction of the Senate to be laid aside for the consideration of any other bill until that sanction is obtained either by motion or by unanimous consent.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. As the Chair remembers the matter, the bill was laid aside temporarily without any conditions.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I think that is true.

Mr. WARREN. If it was laid aside without any conditions, then it was laid aside for the day.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Oh, no.

Mr. WARREN. Certainly it was. However, there will be no trouble about getting the other matter up.

Mr. BURTON. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Ohio.

Mr. BURTON. I do not wish to enter into any extended discussion regarding the seamen's bill. I am exceedingly anxious to bring it up and have it passed. It was regarded of such importance that at the close of the last session it was agreed that the members of the subcommittee to which it was referred should meet one week before the beginning of the present session to consider it; but, for a variety of reasons, it was impossible to secure the attendance of the whole subcommittee. In one case a member was detained by illness in his family. It is not necessary for me to go into the list of the names of those who were absent, but it was impossible to take the measure up until the beginning of this session.

There have been practically 20 days of hearings upon this bill. The delay has been by no means unusual. In the consideration of similar questions in England a commission had the subject under study for a year or more. It makes a revolution in the control of shipping and the relation between the seamen and the vessel owners. I am glad to say that we have reported a measure which marks a greater advance in the condition of seamen than all the legislation placed upon the statute books within the last 30 years. There are some propositions in the bill, however, so radical that the committee did not think they could accept them.

The Senator from Wisconsin is quite in error in stating that hearings have been given to the shipowners. With the utmost care no hearings have been held except representatives both of the seamen and the shipowners have been present.

I think no committee has ever observed more sedulous care to see that both sides were represented than the subcommittee and the whole committee have maintained in this case. There have been no outside conferences with one side or the other. Our hearings have been in the open.

Mr. NELSON. Mr. President, will the Senator allow me to interrupt him?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Ohio yield to the Senator from Minnesota?

Mr. BURTON. Yes.

Mr. NELSON. It seems to me that the only relief from this controversy between the chairman of the Appropriations Committee, the Senator from Wisconsin, and the Senator from Ohio is to proceed to the consideration of the conference report on the river and harbor bill, and, Mr. President, I move that the Senate proceed to its consideration.

Mr. WARREN. Mr. President, before that motion is put I desire to say that I have tried to do my duty as chairman of the Appropriations Committee. I decline to be a football with appropriation bills between those who desire to secure the consideration of different measures. If this appropriation bill is not to pass, I am willing to abandon it and will find no fault about it; but certainly if this bill can not go through very soon I shall be compelled to abandon it and let some other Senator take it up, if he thinks he can better attend to it. There are certain things that have to be done with appropriation bills that it is impossible to avoid——

Mr. NELSON. I realize that. There are certain things that have to be done.

Mr. WARREN. And we have already spent time enough debating matters without result to have passed the appropriation bill, and then we could have taken up the other.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President——

Mr. NELSON. Will the Senator from Mississippi yield to me?

Mr. WILLIAMS. Yes.

Mr. NELSON. I think the chairman of the Appropriations Committee ought to yield to the conference report on the rivers and harbors bill. The deficiency bill is not subject to a debate of five or six hours, as the rivers and harbors bill is and has been. In view of that fact, Mr. President, I think, under present conditions, the rivers and harbors bill ought to have the right of way, and therefore I renew my motion to proceed with the consideration of the conference report on the rivers and harbors bill.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I understand the rivers and harbors bill has the right of way without any motion of any description.

SEVERAL SENATORS. Oh, no.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. The unfinished business has the right of way.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President, the conference report on the rivers and harbors bill was the unfinished business.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Minnesota [Mr. NELSON] has made a motion to proceed with the consideration of the conference report on the rivers and harbors bill. That motion is not debatable.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I beg the Chair's pardon. If it is not debatable, I will not debate it, of course.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It is not debatable. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Minnesota. [Putting the question.] The Chair is in doubt, and will again put the question. [Putting the question.] By the sound the ayes appear to have it.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. BRIGGS (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the senior Senator from West Virginia [Mr. WATSON]. In his absence I withhold my vote.

Mr. CHILTON (when his name was called). I have a pair with the Senator from Illinois [Mr. CULLOM], and I therefore withhold my vote.

Mr. CLARKE of Arkansas (when his name was called). I have a pair with the junior Senator from Utah [Mr. SUTHERLAND]. I do not see him here, and therefore am not at liberty to vote.

Mr. CULBERSON (when his name was called). In view of my general pair with the Senator from Delaware [Mr. DU PONT], I withhold my vote.

So Mr. NELSON's motion was rejected.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Secretary will resume the reading of the bill.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President, I was going to prefer a request for the consideration of the seamen's bill after the conclusion of this bill; but I believe this bill can be disposed of in a brief time, and I will therefore defer that request.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Secretary will read.

The Secretary resumed the reading of the bill.

The next amendment of the Committee on Appropriations was, on page 2, after line 18, to insert:

Hereafter the Executive shall not extend or accept any invitation to participate in any international congress, conference, or like event, without first having specific authority of law to do so.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, under the head of "Department of State," on page 3, after line 20, to insert:

International Congress on Alcoholism: For expenses of delegates to be designated by the President to the Fourteenth International Congress on Alcoholism, at Milan, Italy, September, 1913, including secretarial and stenographic work and transcription of reports, $6,850.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President, a parliamentary inquiry.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator will state it.

Mr. WILLIAMS. What is the bill that the Secretary is reading?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It is the general deficiency appropriation bill.

Mr. WILLIAMS. How does that bill get before the Senate?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. On motion of the Senator from Wyoming, as before stated.

Mr. WILLIAMS. The seamen's bill was the unfinished business. When we voted down the resolution to take up the rivers and harbors bill the seamen's bill was the unfinished business.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The unfinished business or any other bill can be displaced on motion to take up a bill, and that is exactly what occurred.

Mr. WILLIAMS. But that motion has not been made. That motion has never been made, and has never been carried.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair must take exception to that. The notes may be read, if it is necessary, to show what occurred.

Mr. LODGE. The motion was made before the Senator from Mississippi came into the Chamber.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President, if a motion has been made, and if a motion has been carried, of course I am speaking to outer air; but no motion has been made and no motion has been carried to that effect since we had the recent discussion about it, and I know of no motion of the kind at any time.

Mr. WARREN. Mr. President, I certainly made that motion.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I remember that the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. NELSON] waived the further consideration of the river and harbor bill for the special consideration of the matter that was brought before the Senate at that time.

Mr. LODGE. Let the notes be read.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If the Senator will permit the Chair, of course the Senator from Mississippi knows the Chair has no motive——

Mr. WILLIAMS. Oh, I beg the Chair to believe that I did not mean anything of that kind. I know the Chair is as void of wrong motive as anyone in the world.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If the Senator from Mississippi will permit the Chair, the parliamentary status is this: The Senator from Ohio [Mr. BURTON] asked unanimous consent to lay aside the seamen's bill, and that request, being without objection, was agreed to. In the meantime the conference report on the river and harbor bill was considered for a time, and discontinued at a certain point.

Mr. WILLIAMS. But discontinued how?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. By laying it aside and other matters coming up.

Mr. SMOOT. By the Senate going into executive session.

Mr. WILLIAMS. By unanimous consent to lay it aside, or by a motion?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The consideration of the conference report was discontinued.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. By going into executive session.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. By going into executive session. The Senator from Wyoming [Mr. WARREN] made a motion this evening to proceed to the consideration of the general deficiency bill, and that motion was agreed to. That motion displaced every other bill, whether it was unfinished business or otherwise. At the present moment the unfinished business is the general deficiency bill, which is now under consideration.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Mr. President, I ask that the reporter read his notes from the time the Senator from Wyoming made the motion to take up the general deficiency bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair will be pleased to have that done.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President——

Mr. LODGE. Let the notes be read.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I want to say this, and then I shall take my seat:

There seems to be a determined effort upon the part of a few men to prevent the passage of the rivers and harbors bill. Up to this good moment that has succeeded through an indifference of the Senate in granting unanimous consent. I want to serve notice that no more unanimous consents will be granted and that, unless the rivers and harbors bill can be squarely fronted by the Senate and voted upon one way or the other, no other appropriation bills shall be voted upon until the 4th of March.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The reading will be continued.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I ask that the reporter's notes be read.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The notes will be read.

The reporter read as follows:

Mr. WARREN. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of House bill 28858, the deficiency appropriation bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Wyoming moves that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the deficiency appropriation bill.

The SECRETARY. A bill (H. R. 28858) making appropriations to supply deficiencies in appropriations for the fiscal year 1913 and for prior years, and for other purposes.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. WARREN. I make the usual request that the formal reading of the bill be dispensed with, that the bill be read for amendment, and that the committee amendments be first considered.

Mr. BRYAN. I do not desire to object, but I do not presume it is fair to the Senator from Minnesota.

Mr. WARREN. I can not hear what the Senator from Florida says.

Mr. BRYAN. I thought it was only fair that the Senator from Minnesota, who was not in his seat, should know of the request. If it is satisfactory to him, I have no objection.

Mr. WARREN. The Senator from Minnesota is in his place.

Mr. BRYAN. I see that he is.

Mr. NELSON. I did not understand.

Mr. BRYAN. I simply wanted the Senator from Minnesota to know that the request had been made to take up the deficiency appropriation bill, which would operate to displace the rivers and harbors bill.

Mr. NELSON. I have tried to get the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations to yield to the conference report on the rivers and harbors bill, but he insists upon going on with the deficiency appropriation bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Wyoming asks unanimous consent that the formal reading of the bill be dispensed with, that the bill be read for amendment, and that the committee amendments be first considered. Is there objection? The Chair hears none.

The Secretary proceeded to read the bill.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. That is all I ask for.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The reading of the bill will be proceeded with. The amendment last read will be agreed to, without objection.

The reading of the bill was resumed.

The next amendment of the Committee on Appropriations was, on page 4, after line 2, to insert.

Safety of life at sea: For compensation and necessary traveling and other expenses of officers of the Government and other persons to be designated by the President to consider subjects relating to greater security at sea, as recited in the joint resolution proposing an international maritime conference approved June 28, 1912 (37 Stat., p. 637), for necessary clerk hire in Washington, D. C., and elsewhere, and for the expenses of informal consultation with representatives of foreign Governments preliminary to the proposed international conference, $10,000: Provided, That officers of the Government shall receive reimbursement for expenses incurred in connection with this work, but no compensation in addition to the salaries attached to their respective positions.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 4, after line 16, to insert:

Payment to Malambo fire claimants: To pay the allowances made to the Malambo fire claimants under article 7 of the treaty of November 18, 1903, between the United States and Panama, as recommended by the President in his special message to Congress of December 13, 1911, in accordance with the recommendations of the Secretary of War and the Attorney General, $53,800.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, under the subhead "Public buildings," on page 5, after line 18, to insert:

To pay balance for rent of temporary quarters at Cleveland, Ohio, for the accommodations of Government officials from October 31 to December 22, 1910, $5,033.94.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 7, after line 11, to insert:

For acquisition of sites and additions to sites for and to begin the construction of public buildings and the extension of public buildings, preparation of plans, including personal services, authorized during the third session of the Sixty-second Congress, so much therefor as may be necessary is hereby appropriated.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, under the subhead "Public Health Service," on page 9, after line 5, to insert:

Authority is hereby granted to use the sum of $2,100 of the amount provided by the sundry civil act of March 4, 1911, "For medical examinations, care of seamen, care and treatment of all other persons entitled to relief, and miscellaneous expenses other than marine hospitals, which are not included under special heads," for "Freight, transportation, and traveling expenses," for the fiscal year 1912.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. STONE. I inquire whether amendments other than committee amendments are now in order?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Unanimous consent was given that the committee amendments should first be considered.

The reading of the bill was resumed.

The next amendment of the Committee on Appropriations was, under the subhead "Customs service," on page 10, after line 2, to insert:

To defray the expenses of a representative of the Treasury Department, to be designated by the Secretary of the Treasury, to the International Congress on Customs Regulations, to convene at Paris in May, 1913, $2,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, under the subhead "Miscellaneous, Treasury," on page 10, after line 15, to insert:

Hereafter the Auditor for the Post Office Department shall not assort and verify the money orders pertaining to postmasters' issued lists covering the period from January 1, 1912, to June 30, 1912: Provided, That the statements for said period and accompanying money orders shall be retained as a part of the record of unpaid money orders required by the act approved May 27, 1908.

Mr. BRISTOW. I should like to have the chairman of the committee explain just what that amendment means.

Mr. WARREN. That is the amendment referring to the Post Office Department?

Mr. BRISTOW. Yes; the auditor of that department.

Mr. WARREN. We have a letter here on the subject which is rather long. I will have it read if the Senator desires, but perhaps I can state it more briefly.

The new machinery for auditing the money-order papers in the Post Office Department was inaugurated some two years ago. At that time it was explained that it would cost $100,000 per annum less to conduct the work. There was then a limitation of the cost amounting to about $100,000 per year through a large reduction in the number of employees. It seems they had been nearly two years behind in the office at one time, and we had been appropriating perhaps $50,000 a year to enable them to catch up.

When this new system was installed they thought it would enable them to bring up the arrears, even with their greatly reduced force; but they have found that they are still behind about 50,000,000 money orders that have not been audited on one side, covering the business for three or four months, perhaps longer.

The Secretary of the Treasury and the auditor for the department have suggested that we should either appropriate $67,000 for extra help to bring the auditing of these matters up to date—they are keeping up with them now—or make this amendment, which was drawn up by the department exactly as we have it, and call it an arbitrary audit. I was talking to the Assistant Secretary about the matter recently, and it seems that they feel there is hardly a chance of an error, since one side has already been audited, and it is work in which they seldom find any error.

Mr. BRISTOW. The auditor recommends it?

Mr. WARREN. Yes. If the Senator feels that the other method is better, it can be followed.

Mr. BRISTOW. No.

Mr. WARREN. I acknowledge with pleasure that the Senator was a very efficient secretary in that department at one time.

Mr. BRISTOW. I understand the matter now.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is upon agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

The reading of the bill was resumed.

The next amendment of the Committee on Appropriations was, at the top of page 11, to insert:

The Secretary of the Treasury is authorized and directed to pay to Emma Morris, widow of Frank H. Morris, late Auditor of the Treasury for the War Department, who lost his life on the 22d day of December, 1900, while in the discharge of his official duties in the Winder Building, $4,000, the same being equivalent to one year's salary of the said Frank H. Morris.

Mr. BRISTOW. Mr. President, that is starting out on paying civil employees of the Government a year's salary when they die in office. With very much regret, I feel that somebody ought to make a point of order against it.

Mr. WARREN. If the Senator will allow me, does he remember the circumstance?

Mr. BRISTOW. Yes; and it was explained a year ago.

Mr. WARREN. The man was shot dead in his chair while doing duty, because he had demoted a man. I have felt that it was justice to the claim to include it in the bill. I knew something of the circumstances. The Senate has acted favorably on it as many as three times, but so far we have not been able to get the assent of the other House. I hope the Senator will leave it in and let it go to conference.

Mr. BRISTOW. I think it is a very bad precedent to establish. While I deeply regret to make points of order in cases where it is so disagreeable as it is here, I feel that it ought to be done. It seems to me it is a dangerous thing to begin, much as I regret the necessity of making the point.

Mr. ROOT. Is there not a difference between the case of a civil employee who simply dies during the period of his employment and that of a man who is killed for doing his duty? Will that make a precedent? It does not seem to me so. It seems to me that differentiates the case from the ordinary one.

Mr. BRISTOW. I have had the disagreeable duty of objecting to a good many things, and I will withdraw the objection for once.

Mr. WARREN. I hope a case of this kind will never happen again. I am very glad the Senator has withdrawn the point of order.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The point of order is withdrawn. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

The reading of the bill was resumed.

The next amendment of the Committee on Appropriations was, on page 11, after line 13, to insert:

For payment to Charles M. Campbell and Charles A. Davidson, late clerks of the courts of the United States for Indian Territory, for fees

The amendment was agreed to.

The reading of the bill was continued to line 13, page 23.

The next amendment was, on page 58, after line 23, to insert:

There is hereby appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, the sum of $3,305,257.19, being the net amount of a judgment of the Court of Claims in favor of the Confederated Bands of Ute Indians, dated February 13, 1911, said amount to remain in the Treasury to the credit of the Ute Indians and be subject to such future appropriations as Congress may direct. The amount of said judgment shall bear interest at 4 per cent per annum from and after February 13, 1911, such interest to be available for cash per capita payments to the Ute Indians entitled, or for expenditure for their benefit, in the discretion of the Secretary of the Interior.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 67, after line 19, to insert:

SEC. 3. That for the payment of the following claims, certified to be due by the several accounting officers of the Treasury Department under appropriations the balances of which have been exhausted or carried to the surplus fund under the provisions of section 5 of the act of June 20, 1874, and under appropriations heretofore treated as permanent, being for the service of the fiscal year 1910 and prior years, unless otherwise stated, and which have been certified to Congress under section 2 of the act of July 7, 1884, as fully set forth in Senate Document No. 1114, reported to Congress at its present session, there is appropriated as follows:

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. WARREN. I offer the following amendment on behalf of the committee. On page 32, after line 18, I move to insert:

For expenses of removal of the buildings or other structures upon the land acquired for the enlargement of the Capitol Grounds, for grading, seeding, and soiling, and preparation of plans for permanently improving the same, $35,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. WARREN. On page 50, after line 4, I move to insert:

Hereafter the appropriations for contingent expenses of the Senate shall be available for the payment of compensation to officers and employees when ordered by the Senate in payment for extra services.

Mr. BRISTOW. I make the point of order that that is legislation.

Mr. WARREN. Will the Senator withhold it for just a moment, so that I may state what it is for?

Mr. BRISTOW. Very well.

Mr. WARREN. Mr. President, in another House anything paid in the way of an extra to an employee for extra services, and so forth, is paid out of the contingent fund of that House. It never comes into conference; it never comes over to the Senate except in the total of the contingent fund.

We have had great differences of opinion, and it has been worse since the two Houses have been of different political faith. We have been requested to arrange our business, if possible, so that we should not have to ask another House to have to pass upon a $250 matter or a $150 matter—our special or extra items, purely Senate expenses—but that it should be paid out of our contingent fund. Their laws or rules seem to permit them to do that way.

Both the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations and the whole committee are placed in a position where it is most ungracious to refuse at the last moment brother Senators as to what amendments they may put in for their employees in the very last, hurrying days or day. I have sought in this amendment to permit all these small special items to be taken up and paid by the Senate without going to the House. The items could then be paid at various times during the session. As it is now, at the last moment, when we are working night and day, it is impossible to get a full committee, because the members are in conference on different bills. Yet the committee is called to pass on 20 or 30 or 40 items, or whatever number it may be, one calling, perhaps, for $2,000, another for $500, another for $200, and so forth, without anything before the committee to give it the necessary information to determine the merits of each case. We have sought to avoid it.

Of course, if the Senator should make this point of order, the Senator knows, as I do, that it is legislation. Then there will be from all quarters, I assume, the usual number of amendments which will go on the bill. They will go into conference, we shall struggle over them until the last moment, and come into the Senate with a disagreement, and the bill will either fail or we shall have to cut them out, and get a round scolding or worse from our colleagues.

I believe that the legislation proposed is in the interest of economy. It is in the interest of justice, and certainly it would greatly relieve the onerous duties of the Committee on Appropriations without imposing unduly on any other committee.

Mr. BRISTOW. I desire to read the law. This is a statute; it is not a rule of the Senate or a rule of the House.

Mr. WARREN. I do not make any claim that the point of order can not lie. It is legislation.

Mr. BRISTOW. But I wanted to answer the statement which the Senator made as to the House having one rule and the Senate another. The law is that—

No payment shall be made from said contingent fund as additional salary or compensation to any officer or employee of the Senate or House of Representatives.

That is a statute. It has the same force on the House that it has on the Senate. This amendment proposes to repeal that and simply permit the Committee on Contingent Expenses to handle and add expenditures here. It would be removing what may be an embarrassment to the Committee on Appropriations, but would place a very much more serious one on the Committee on Contingent Expenses.

I think it would be very unwise legislation. I must insist on the point of order.

Mr. WARREN. If all the ills of life must come to the one committee, I shall not complain, but I repeat that those expenses are paid in the House of Representatives and never go on the appropriation bill. The House has provided a way, probably since the print the Senator reads.

Mr. BRISTOW. Then they are paid in violation of law.

Mr. WARREN. Furthermore, we have violated the spirit of that law continually ever since I have been in the Senate by reports from the committee of which the Senator from Kansas is an honored member, the Committee on Contingent Expenses, whereby this or that clerk has been authorized to be paid out of the contingent fund until otherwise authorized by law. It has gone on all these years.

Mr. BRISTOW. But it is not a violation of this law.

Mr. WARREN. It is.

Mr. BRISTOW (reading)—

No payment shall be made from said contingent fund as additional salary or compensation to any officer.

That is, additional to that fixed by law.

Mr. WARREN. Additional salary or compensation; not additional compensation, but just straight compensation of employees, is prohibited.

Mr. BRISTOW. Additional salary or additional compensation. There can be no compensation that would not be termed salary.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The point of order is sustained.

Mr. LODGE. I offer the amendment I send to the desk.

The SECRETARY. It is proposed to add at the end of the bill the following:

That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, directed to pay, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, to the governor of the State of Massachusetts, or his duly authorized agent, $233,885.82, the money which the State paid as interest, and for coin as premium wherewith it paid interest, on bonds issued under the provisions of the act of the legislature approved March 30, 1863, for the purpose of strengthening the harbors and fortifying the coast, the principal of said bonds having been reimbursed the State under the provisions of the act approved July 7, 1884 (23 Stat. L., p. 204).

Mr. WARREN. That is clearly a claim, and our rules forbid a claim.

Mr. LODGE. They forbid a private claim. The claim of a State has not become a private claim yet.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I should like to hear the amendment read once more.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It will be again read.

Mr. LODGE. I can in a moment tell the Senator what it is and save the reading. There have been paid to almost all the States, certainly to a great many of them—the Senator from Kansas told me it had been paid there, and I think it has been paid in Pennsylvania and in New York and in almost all the States—the premiums which the States paid for bonds issued during the war in aid of the Government. Massachusetts is one of the very few States—I do not know that there is any other—to whom this refund has not been made.

Mr. WILLIAMS. The Senator need not explain it any further. I have no objection to the amendment. I just wanted to understand it.

Mr. LODGE. It has been reported from a standing committee.

Mr. WARREN. Reporting from a committee favorably hardly puts it in order on an appropriation bill.

Mr. LODGE. It does under the rule, as I know it.

Mr. WARREN. I know no difference between a State claim and a private claim in the rule as I read it.

Mr. LODGE. I do not think a State claim is a private claim.

Mr. WARREN. Furthermore, I want to say to the Senator that if we are to have a few more fights like we had at the close of the last session over these State claims I do not quite understand how the insertion of a large State claim in this bill would be of any advantage to the mover of it.

Mr. LODGE. This is a claim that has been paid to nearly every State. If this discrimination is going to be made against my State, it is not going to smooth the road of these appropriations.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I wish to ask the Senator from Wyoming a question. Does he not think that the small amount of money involved would be cheaply expended in order to obtain this adherence to State rights from the Senator from Massachusetts?

Mr. WARREN. I will refer the Senator from Mississippi to the Senator from Massachusetts for an answer.

Mr. OLIVER. Mr. President, I want to say that this bill was referred to me as a subcommittee of the Committee on Claims. The claim is clearly allowed. It comes under the head of claims treated of in the case of New York against The United States, decided by the Supreme Court in favor of New York, and it has been followed ever since. The amount is certified as correct by the Treasury Department, and payment is only withheld because they think that technically they have no authority to pay it unless by authority of Congress.

Mr. WARREN. In other words, Congress is required to pass upon the claim before it can be paid. The amendment can go before the Senate and it can vote on it.

Mr. BRISTOW. Mr. President, this is a claim that has been before the Committee on Claims. It is a bill that is now on the calendar. There is no more reason why it should be incorporated in the deficiency appropriation bill than any other bill for a claim that is on the calendar.

Mr. LODGE. The same claim was paid to Kansas on a general deficiency bill.

Mr. BRISTOW. Probably it was; I do not know. That was before my time. You might as well put the French spoliation claims on this bill as a claim of that character.

Mr. LODGE. They were not reported by any committee.

Mr. BRISTOW. They passed the Senate a time or two.

Mr. WARREN. I ought to say that these claims were paid formerly on deficiency bills. We ran along until we met with an Executive disapproval of about a million and a half dollars of such claims, one night. Then we decided that we would handle the claims in a different way, and since that time they have been handled through the Claims Committee in the omnibus claims bills and others.

I am not, of course, informed why this claim has not been settled before this as a claim in some regular claims bill, but the rule as to keeping claims out of appropriation bills has been pretty strictly adhered to since, and whenever the point has been made against any one of them it has gone out.

Mr. STONE. Mr. President, I desire to offer an amendment. Is this question settled?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It is not settled. The Chair has not ruled on the point of order. The Chair is prepared to rule on it.

Mr. LODGE. I hope the Chair will rule on it.

Mr. WARREN. I will say to the Senator from Massachusetts that the Senators from the State of Texas, the State of Oregon, and two or three other States, which had claims before the committee—

Mr. LODGE. In this class exactly?

Mr. WARREN. The Senators from those States, understanding that we were in the last days of the session, have not even offered them to the Committee on Appropriations. They thought it was necessary to withhold them.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair finds but one precedent, rather an ancient one, the ruling having been made as far back as 1858, where this identical question arose. Mr. Stuart, who was then in the chair, the point having been made by Mr. Hunter, decided that the claims of a State were in the same category as other claims and should be considered as private claims. From this decision Mr. Iverson appealed. The question being put, the yeas were 26 and the nays 15, and the point of order was sustained.

The present occupant of the chair feels that there is very tenable ground for the contention that the claim of a State is not a private claim. He has doubt in his mind about it, and will submit the matter to the Senate. Is the amendment in order on the pending bill? Senators agreeing that it is in order will say "aye." [Putting the question.] The noes seem to have it. The noes have it, and the Senate decides that the amendment is not in order.

Mr. WETMORE. I offer the following as an amendment to the Senate items.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. Add to the Senate items the following:

To enable the Senate Committee on the Library to purchase two portraits, one of the late Senator Justin S. Morrill, of Vermont, and the other of the late Senator John Tyler Morgan, of Alabama, both painted by Carl Gutherz, at a cost not to exceed $1,000 each, $2,000.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Does that require unanimous consent? In other words, is it subject to a point of order?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair will decide the point of order when the point is made.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I make the point of order.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The point of order is sustained.

Mr. WETMORE. Before the point of order is made I should like to say that this matter has received the careful attention of the Committee on the Library and was unanimously reported favorably to the Senate by that committee.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President, I hope that the Senate will not set the precedent of buying oil paintings of all the Members of the Senate who may happen to die some time. Some day my own countenance might be perpetuated in the halls of the Capitol to the terror of the tourists who visit it. There is no end to this thing if we enter upon it.

I loved the late Senator from Alabama, Mr. Morgan, as if he had been my own father. He was as kind to me as my own father could have been. When I ran for the Senate in Mississippi he wrote me the nicest and sweetest letter in the world. But if we start on this sort of thing there will be no end to it; the bald heads of every Senator will be perpetuated in oil around the corridors of the Capitol for all time. It does seem to me that we ought to remember that a part of the money that is in the Treasury belongs——

Mr. ASHURST. Let the point of order be decided immediately.

Mr. LODGE and others. Regular order!

Mr. WILLIAMS. We ought not to expend any money for the portraits of one another.

Mr. WETMORE. It has been very frequently done.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The point of order is sustained.

Mr. ROOT. I offer the amendment I send to the desk.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment will be read.

The SECRETARY. Add to the Senate items the following:

To pay Garfield Charles for compensation for compiling a supplement to the compilation entitled "Treaties, Conventions, International Acts, and Protocols Between the United States and Other Powers, 1776 to 1909," under resolution of the Senate (S. Res. 380, 62d Cong., 2d sess.), $1,500.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Reserving the point of order, I want to hear some explanation of the amendment.

Mr. ROOT. Mr. President, the Senate passed the resolution directing this work to be done. This gentleman has done the work. The question of the amount of compensation was left to a subcommittee composed of the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. CLARKE], the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. MCCUMBER], and myself, and this is the lowest figure suggested, I think, by any member of the subcommittee.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I shall not make any point of order against the amendment or make any objection to it.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. FOSTER. On page 21, after line 14, I move to insert the following.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 21, after line 14, insert:

For emergency repairs to the Chalmette Monument, Chalmette, La., $200.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. FOSTER. I submit a letter from the Assistant Secretary of War, which I ask may be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the letter was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

WAR DEPARTMENT,
Washington, March 1, 1913.

Hon. MURPHY J. FOSTER,
United States Senate.

MY DEAR SENATOR: From the original file which I inclose you will see the necessity for the appropriation by Congress of the sum of $200 for repairing the Chalmette Monument at Chalmette. It is too late for the department to put this estimate through the Treasury, and it occurs to me that you might be interested in securing this appropriation through an amendment to the general deficiency bill, which is still under consideration; and that, as the amount is so small, you would have little difficulty in doing so. In any event, may I ask you to return all these papers to me?

Sincerely, yours,
ROBERT SHAW OLIVER,
Assistant Secretary of War.

Mr. MCCUMBER. I offer the amendment I send to the desk.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment will be read.

The SECRETARY. After line 8, on page 49, insert:

To pay Robert W. Farrar for indexing and extra services as clerk to the Committee on Pensions, Sixty-second Congress, third session, $1,200.

To pay Dennis M. Kerr for services as assistant clerk by detail to the Committee on Pensions, Sixty-second Congress, third session, $1,200.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Why is that introduced? I reserve the point of order against it.

Mr. MCCUMBER. I do not think a point of order would lie anyway; but for 20 years this sum has been granted to the clerks doing this work, both in the House and in the Senate. The payment to the House employees has already been granted, as was explained by the chairman of the committee, out of the contingent fund.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Does the Senator say it has been the usual action for 20 years?

Mr. MCCUMBER. It is my understanding that this sum has been paid for about 20 years.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Then I shall not object.

Mr. WARREN. I know the Senator from North Dakota wants to be correct. The amount has varied up and down, but that amount has been paid some years.

Mr. BRYAN. I hope no one will object to the amendment offered by the Senator from North Dakota. I consider that the two clerks named are amply entitled to the consideration proposed by the chairman of the committee.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. STONE. I offer an amendment.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment will be read.

The SECRETARY. On page 10, after line 2, insert:

That the time for the execution of the provisions of chapter 355 of the Statutes at Large, "An act making appropriations for sundry civil expenses of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1913, and for other purposes," approved August 24, 1912, in so far as they relate to the reorganization of the customs service, shall be extended for a period of two years.

That estimates submitted in compliance with such provisions shall be on account of the fiscal year 1916, and the reorganization ordered by such provisions shall constitute for the fiscal year 1916 and until otherwise provided by Congress the permanent organization of the customs service.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. BRISTOW. What is that amendment? I do not understand it.

Mr. WARREN. I hope the Senator from Missouri will inform the Senator from Kansas about it.

Mr. STONE. I thought it had been agreed to.

Mr. WARREN. It has, but the Senator from Kansas asked a question.

Mr. STONE. What is it?

Mr. BRISTOW. I ask what is the provision.

Mr. STONE. It is an extension for two years of the operation of a provision which passed in the last sundry civil appropriation act for the reorganization of the customs service.

Mr. BRISTOW. Oh, I understand, it is to put a lot of those fellows out of office. It just lets them have two years longer before they will have to go out. Is that it?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment is agreed to.

Mr. CLAPP. I offer an amendment, to come in after line 11, on page 50.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment will be read.

The SECRETARY. On page 50, after line 11, insert:

G. B. Spaulding, $500; F. A. Johnson, $500; and J. D. Preston, $370, for services rendered to the Committee on Privileges and Elections making investigation of the amount of money paid to national and congressional campaign committees of all political parties, etc., from November 8, 1904, to the election of November 5, 1912, inclusive.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. KERN. I offer an amendment to come in on page 48, after line 17.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment will be read.

The SECRETARY. On page 48, after line 17, insert:

To pay Mary Cathcart Ransdell, widow of the late Sergeant at Arms of the Senate, Daniel M. Ransdell, a sum equal to one year's salary at the rate he was receiving at the time of his demise.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I move to amend the amendment by striking out the words "one year" and substituting "six months." In justification of my amendment I want to say that the matter came before the Committee on Contingent Expenses of the Senate, of which I am a member, and we made a careful examination and found that there were only three exceptions to the rule. In a long period—I have forgotten how many decades—there were only three exceptions to the rule. One Amzi Smith, I believe, who had served here for almost a lifetime, and there were some others, and we considered that it was ill-advised to extend the precedent any further. In fact, the precedent had been so ill-established that we might regard this particular appropriation as a precedent in itself.

If we are going to give men who have served as Secretary of the Senate, as Sergeant at Arms of the Senate at five and six thousands dollars a year one year's extra pay whenever they happen to die in the service, we ought at the same time to give one year's extra pay to all of the men who are earning nine hundred and a thousand and twelve hundred and fourteen hundred dollars a year in the service of the Senate.

I was very fondly attached to the man whose widow is asking this; I thought very much of him in very many ways, but I do not really think that we can afford to establish a precedent of giving to the families of deceased employees of the Senate one year's extra pay. We have already established the precedent of giving six months' pay in such cases, and it seems to me that that was wrong. It seems to me that the precedent of giving to the families of deceased Senators and Representatives six months' or a year's extra pay is also wrong.

Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey. We are not getting it.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Your family does if you happen to die in the service.

Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey. Well, thank God, I have not died. [Laughter.]

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President, I do not want to take up the time of the Senate unnecessarily. I have expressed the reasons that will actuate me in voting against the amendment, and I express a sort of quasi hope that the Senate may take the same view of it. I do not desire to discuss the subject further.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Mississippi withdraw his amendment?

Mr. WILLIAMS. No, Mr. President; I do not withdraw the amendment.

Mr. BRISTOW. Is this the resolution that was reported yesterday from the Committee on Contingent Expenses?

Mr. WARREN. Mr. President, I have not been able to hear what was the proposition of the Senator from Indiana [Mr. KERN]. I understood that the matter of the payment to the family of Col. Ransdell had been brought up as a separate resolution. Does the Senator offer it as an amendment here?

Mr. KERN. Yes, sir; I offer it as an amendment here. The resolution is hung up.

Mr. WILLIAMS. And I move to amend it by inserting "six months" instead of "one year."

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Mississippi moves to amend the amendment by striking out "twelve" and inserting "six."

Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey. I hope that motion will not prevail.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from New Jersey will please address the Chair.

Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey. I am addressing the Chair. I trust the motion will not prevail. I very well recall Col. Ransdell. He was the Sergeant at Arms of the Senate. I do not know just what salary he received, neither do I care; but I know that he was a most superb gentleman and, I believe, a very efficient officer. For nearly 50 years he had carried an empty sleeve, having lost an arm in the battles of the country, in his country's service. Who is there who can say that he has not been severely handicapped all his life by that loss? Who can say what he might have accomplished if he had been blessed with both the arms which God gave him when he was born? With one arm gone, he was very severely handicapped, and was unable to leave to his family that which, under other circumstances, he might have hoped to do, and as those of us who are blessed with both arms and good health can do. His condition was entirely different. So I appeal to you, Senators, to soften your hearts and to let the generous promptings of your souls move you to vote for this proposition to allow to Col. Ransdell's widow 12 months' pay, rather than 6 months, and a generous people and a just God will bless you.

Mr. BRISTOW. Mr. President, in reference to the amendment of the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. WILLIAMS] I desire to say that it is our custom to pay to the families of deceased employees and officers of the Senate six months' salary, and I can see no reason why we should make an exception in one case and not in another. If we are to pay 12 months' salary in such cases, then let us pay 12 months' salary. If the Senate wants to change its custom, and if the family of the Sergeant at Arms is to receive 12 months' pay, there is no reason why the family of any other officer here should not be paid the same; and, so far as I am concerned, if the Senate fixes a precedent of paying the family of a man who received $5,000 a year a full year's salary, then I shall insist that the families of employees who receive but $1,000 or $1,200 a year shall also have a full year's salary.

Mr. KERN. Mr. President, at a time when we are voting away the people's money in scores of millions of dollars in public buildings bills, in river and harbor bills, and bills similar to those, we behold the spectacle of Senators rising here and higgling about the question as to whether a deserving and needy woman, the widow of a man who served this body faithfully for 13 years and who by his untiring service in behalf of the Senate, collectively and individually, placed Members under obligation to him, shall be paid $3,750. There are five distinct precedents for this action.

The Senator from Mississippi [Mr. WILLIAMS] has spoken to the effect that in future this may serve as a precedent for the families of other deceased employees. Mr. President, if in the future there shall come a case where a brave soldier had given up his arm in defense of the honor of his country and afterwards served 13 years in this body and for this body as Col. Ransdell served, if such a case as that is presented, then let us grant the relief asked.

I speak with some feeling in this matter. I knew this man since my boyhood. I saw him in the vigor of his young manhood, struggling along with that empty sleeve after the war ended, in his efforts to make a livelihood and to make a name and place for himself in the community in which he lived. I saw him succeed grandly, and when I came here I observed, as you all observed, his assiduous attention to the duties of his office and to the Members of this body.

The night was never too dark or too cold for Col. Ransdell, at any sacrifice to himself, to do favors for Members of this body; and in this hour, when money is being voted away by hundreds of thousands of dollars—aye, by scores of millions of dollars—when men without the wink of an eye will cast a vote for a public buildings bill carrying $46,000,000, as they did here two nights ago, does it not seem unworthy of us, as a great deliberative body of the greatest Nation in the world, to haggle about the payment of $3,750 to a needy woman, who will travel on through the journey of life deprived of the society of as brave, as true, and as knightly a soul as ever lived?

Mr. NELSON. Mr. President, in speaking about precedents, I think we have made precedents here. We vote a year's salary, $7,500, to the widow of any Senator who dies, even if the Senator had been a millionaire. We give him an allowance. I have, year after year, been voting for such bills, giving a year's salary to the widow of a Senator. I do not know, after we have made such a precedent, why we should discriminate against the family of such an efficient and faithful officer as was Col. Ransdell.

Mr. WARREN. I want to say to the Senator from Indiana [Mr. KERN] that the salary of the Sergeant at Arms is $6,500, so that half of that would be but $3,250.

Mr. KERN. The amendment as offered does not call for any specific amount, but calls for a year's salary.

Mr. WARREN. Well, a year's salary is $6,500.

Mr. KERN. Yes, sir.

Mr. WARREN. So far as precedent is concerned, it is true that the usual allowance in such cases here has been an amount equal to six months' pay of employees. It is also true that we have on special occasions paid a full year's salary, as in the case of the clerk of the Appropriations Committee, Mr. Cleaves, and also in the case of the clerk of the Naval Committee, afterwards clerk of the Appropriations Committee, Mr. Pulsifer, who had served here for 30 years.

I do not believe, having those precedents before us, that we should say that because we may vote to the widow of this old soldier, who served 13 years as Sergeant at Arms of the Senate, to the entire satisfaction, I think, of every Senator who had dealings with him in all that time, that that would make a precedent that would require us hereafter to pay to the widows of all employees a year's salary; but if in the future we shall have some officer of this body who shall have served as well as Col. Ransdell served I shall be glad always to vote to give his family a year's pay.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President, if the widow is to receive a sum equal to a year's salary of her deceased husband on account of her husband's gallant service in the Army and because he lost an arm as a soldier, the appropriation ought to come upon a pension bill and not upon this bill.

So far as the remarks made by the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. NELSON] go—and the Senator from Minnesota never makes any remarks without having his heart go with them—and so far as the precedent of giving the widows of Senators an amount equal to a year's salary is concerned, it is a bad precedent, and it ought not to be followed or imitated. This body ought not to vote that the widow of an American citizen who happened to be a Senator and died while he was a Senator should receive a year's pay any more than it ought to vote that the widow of any civil-service employee in one of the executive departments who happened to die while he was an employee of the Government should receive a year's salary. It is an abuse; in the words of the yellow journals, "it is a steal," and the Senate ought to stop it. We ought not to continue it by emphasizing it and imitating it, but we ought to stop it now.

Why should my wife be paid $7,500 because I happen to die to-morrow? Why should the wife of the Senator from New York or the Senator from Massachusetts or the Senator from Wyoming be paid $7,500 in case any one of those Senators should die? Even if they are paid such an amount, why should that be quoted as a precedent to give somebody else the same wrongful, unjust special privilege of an appropriation out of the Treasury of the United States?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment submitted by the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. WILLIAMS] to the amendment of the Senator from Indiana [Mr. KERN].

Mr. BRISTOW. Mr. President, I desire to say in answer to the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. NELSON], that it is the custom to pay the families of deceased Senators $7,500, the amount of a year's salary, and it is the practice of the Senate to pay the families of its deceased employees six months' salary. Both practices may be bad; but it is not the practice to pay the family of one deceased Senator $15,000 because he was a genial and affable and valuable Senator, and to pay the family of another deceased Senator $7,500 because he was not so agreeable and had not been so useful.

If the Senate wants to discriminate in this way and vote the public money as a matter of personal service, it is for the Senate to do so; but I want a roll call, and let the precedent be set as to what the Senate desires to do in the future. I ask for the yeas and nays on the amendment to the amendment.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment offered by the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. WILLIAMS] to the amendment offered by the Senator from Indiana [Mr. KERN], on which the Senator from Kansas [Mr. BRISTOW] demands the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were not ordered.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment to the amendment.

The amendment to the amendment was rejected.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question recurs upon the amendment of the Senator from Indiana [Mr. KERN].

Mr. BRISTOW. I desire to say that I inadvertently voted wrong, and I should like to have the question on the amendment to the amendment again put.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair will again put the question. [Putting the question.]

The amendment to the amendment was rejected.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question now is on the amendment of the Senator from Indiana.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I ask for the yeas and nays.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Senators agreeing to the amendment will say "aye"; those opposed "no." The ayes have it, and the amendment is agreed to.

Mr. BRISTOW. The Senator from Mississippi asked for the yeas and nays.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I asked for the yeas and nays.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The yeas and nays have been once refused, but the Chair will again put the request for the yeas and nays. Is the demand for the yeas and nays on the adoption of the amendment seconded? [A pause.] Not a sufficient number have seconded the demand. The amendment is agreed to.

Mr. LODGE. I offer the amendment which I send to the desk.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. It is proposed to insert the following:

To pay Edward T. Clark, for extra services in connection with the preparation of the immigration bill, $250..

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, the amendment is agreed to.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I offer the amendment which I send to the desk.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Wisconsin offers an amendment, which will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 12, after line 5, it is proposed to insert:

To enable the Interstate Commerce Commission to carry out the objects of the act entitled "An act to amend an act entitled 'An act to regulate commerce,' approved February 4, 1887, and all acts amendatory thereof by providing for a valuation of the several classes of property of carriers subject thereto and securing information concerning their stocks, bonds, and other securities," approved March 1, 1913, $500,000.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I send to the Secretary's desk a communication signed by the chairman of the Interstate Commerce Commission and addressed to the chairman of the Appropriations Committee, which I ask to have read.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The communication will be read, without objection.

The Secretary read as follows:

INTERSTATE COMMERCE COMMISSION,
Washington, March 1, 1913.

Hon. FRANCIS E. WARREN,
Chairman Committee on Appropriations,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.

SIR: In view of the passage of the bill providing for the valuation of the properties of common carriers subject to the act to regulate commerce, the commission suggests the necessity for an additional appropriation of $500,000 for the ensuing fiscal year.

Respectfully,

FRANKLIN K. LANE, Chairman.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President, I desire to say only a word. I submitted this matter to the chairman of the Appropriations Committee of the Senate, and also caused it to be submitted to the chairman of the Appropriations Committee of the House of Representatives. Whatever the chairman of the Appropriations Committee of the Senate has to say about the matter he will himself submit. The chairman of the Appropriations Committee of the House said that he thought the amendment might be adopted by the Senate to this bill with entire propriety, and that it would be considered in conference in connection with an appropriation to the Interstate Commerce Commission provided in the sundry civil appropriation bill, the chairman of the House committee being uncertain as to whether the language of that appropriation would permit any portion of the appropriation provided for in that bill to be diverted to the purpose of the act to value the railway property of the country.

The appropriation in that bill is quite a large one, some $950,000, and he thought if a portion of it could be used for that purpose, then whatever deficiency might arise could be taken care of in the deficiency appropriation bill next year; but that it would be wise to add the amendment which I have proposed to the general deficiency bill, and then, if in conference the two committees should conclude that the appropriation provided on the other bill could not be used for this purpose, this amendment, if adopted by the Senate and approved by the House, might stand.

Mr. WARREN. Mr. President——

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I ought to say, if the Senator will pardon me for a moment, that the valuation bill passed the House and went to the President to-day, and I am informed from the offices at the White House that it has been signed and approved by the President to-day, and is now a law.

Mr. WARREN. Mr. President, I have felt that in the case of a deficiency bill considered on almost the last day of the session the rules in regard to amendments ought to apply, but if a large question comes up by reason of an emergency or because of the enactment of legislation too recent to have been provided for otherwise, that some leeway might be given. So I shall let the amendment go before the Senate for them to vote upon in the form in which it is presented by the Senator from Wisconsin.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the amendment submitted by the Senator from Wisconsin.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. BRIGGS. I offer the amendment which I send to the desk.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. It is proposed to insert:

To pay for extra services rendered in transferring, rearranging, remarking, cleaning, and refiling the bills, reports, documents, and laws in the Senate document room: To William E. Burns, $500.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

Mr. CLARKE of Arkansas. Mr. President, is there to be no end to this business? Is it a fact that these employees, who are paid what I might justly denominate the excessive salaries the clerical force around this Capitol receive, are to be paid additional for every act which they perform? Is it a fact that nobody cares anything about the obligation to preserve the public funds which are subject to our control? Is everything to go for the asking? When is it to end? Who started it, and who is going to stop it? These people are paid a regular salary; they serve in positions which they seek; and as soon as they perform any substantial service some Senator comes here and asks that they be paid extra for it. None of us know anything about the merits of this matter. None of us know anything about why it should be done, and the only argument we are met with when we make objection is that it has been done heretofore. There ought to be some sort of a point of order that would lie against such amendments. I do not know just exactly what particular point it would be, unless it is that the item is not covered by the law, and I make that point of order. Furthermore, the amendment does not come from any committee, and there is no authority for allowing the amount.

The practice ought to stop. Certainly such an amendment ought not to be brought up here after midnight, when no one knows anything about the facts and when no one can learn anything about them except from what appears on the face of the application. This thing has gone to the point where it has become an absolute abuse that almost goes to the integrity of the proceedings here.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment appears to have been reported from a committee and is evidently in order.

Mr. CLARKE of Arkansas. From what committee, may I inquire?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Committee on Appropriations, the Chair thinks.

Mr. CLARKE of Arkansas. Is the Committee on Appropriations reporting a measure to be put upon its own bill?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair was mistaken. He is now informed that the amendment was reported from the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate.

Mr. CLARKE of Arkansas. I beg to say that there must be some mistake about that.

Mr. BRIGGS. Mr. President, this is one of a number of amendments that were offered and submitted to the Committee on Appropriations. The Committee on Appropriations turned these amendments over to the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate. Under the provision of the law it was impossible for the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate to sanction the payment of these amounts; and, in the absence of several Senators and at their request, I propose to offer several amendments one after another. I have them all here.

Mr. CLARKE of Arkansas. Then they are amendments of the Senator from New Jersey.

Mr. BRIGGS. Or of the Senators who originally offered them.

Mr. CLARKE of Arkansas. Then they are simply individual amendments; they do not come from the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate. Whilst I am sure that the President pro tempore has the impression that they are amendments of the Committee on Contingent Expenses, I happen to know that it is not the case.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair finds that the parliamentary situation is that the amendment was reported by the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations and referred to the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate, and the Chair was under the impression that that committee had reported the amendment.

Mr. CLARKE of Arkansas. I am sure there is a mistake about that. It is simply an individual amendment offered by the Senator from New Jersey.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

Mr. CLARKE of Arkansas. I made a point of order against the amendment.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. The point of order was made upon that amendment that it is improperly here; that it is an increase of appropriation sought to be put on an appropriation bill without coming from a committee and that it has not been estimated for. If it was passed on favorably by some other committee and sent to the Appropriations Committee, under the rule it must have been sent to the Appropriations Committee 24 hours before the action can be taken upon it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The rule provides that an amendment is in order if it has been reported from a standing or select committee. The Chair is unable to determine whether this amendment was properly reported from the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate.

Mr. BRISTOW. Mr. President——

Mr. CLARKE of Arkansas. Well, the Senator from New Jersey does not pretend to be reporting these amendments from the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate. He is simply bringing them here in his individual capacity as a Senator.

Mr. BRIGGS. I am presenting them on behalf of Senators who are absent and who have requested me to do so.

Mr. CLARKE of Arkansas. That is entirely proper. May I suggest to the Chair that the Senator from New Jersey does not pretend to be reporting the amendments on behalf of the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate, but on behalf of individual Senators who recently introduced them. I have no objection to his doing that, and I would not object to anything he does, because he always acts entirely within the proprieties and entirely within the limits of his authority; but they are simply individual amendments, and they do not come here with the indorsement of that committee.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I desire to call attention to that portion of the second paragraph of Rule XVI, which provides that in case favorable action is taken by another committee on amendments they must, before they can be considered, be referred to the Committee on Appropriations. In this particular case, there having been favorable action by some other committee, the amendment should, under the rule, have been referred to the Appropriation Committee at least 24 hours before it comes here.

Mr. WARREN. Mr. President, I do not know whether or not the Senator from Georgia was here earlier, when the matter was up. There has been a very complicated and very embarrassing situation in the Committee on Appropriations. Amendments reach us while we are sitting at the table, passing upon a bill that is to come up here almost at the end of the session, while we have only Sunday between to-day and the day of final adjournment; and the rules must be suspended, or we shall have to shut out a great deal of work.

The Committee on Appropriations desired to arrange so that we could pay, as the House is now paying, such sums as the proper committee decided should be paid to employees for extra work. On the House side—and I am not criticizing it; I think I am within the rule—they have a Committee on Accounts. The Committee on Pensions, for instance, as the Senator from North Dakota has stated, has paid its clerks an extra amount for many years. The clerks on the other side have been paid a certain sum every year for many years; but the matter never comes into a bill upon which we have to pass, because they pay it there from the contingent fund, and all we know about it is that we grant to the House what they reasonably ask for a contingent fund. They naturally desire to treat us in the same way; and when they sit down to a conference around a table with the conferees on this side, they tell us of their embarrassment that they must pass on the different amendments that we put on for our individual clerk or committee clerks in this body, while they do not ask us to take notice of theirs. Therefore I sought to remedy this embarrassment by undertaking to transfer those matters to the Committee on Contingent Expenses, with a view to having it act as the Committee on Accounts of the House acts; and I moved an amendment to this bill which provided that we could pay them hereafter in our own way, according to the recommendations of that committee, out of our fund.

It does seem to me as if we must either do that or settle it in the tribunal of conference. While the Senator may be right on the point of order, it is hardly just to allow the amendments of some Senators to go in and cut out the others on a point of order.

Mr. CLARKE of Arkansas. Mr. President, I assumed that some member of the Appropriations Committee would protect the public interests in the preparation of a bill coming from that committee. I did not feel called upon to take any notice of what was going on until it had progressed to a point where it had become an absolute abuse. These items were coming in wholesale. Every committee clerk in the building was being paid extra for his services, for which he had already been paid more here than he could get elsewhere. It is the merit of the proposition to which I am speaking; not the mere procedure by which it is sought to accomplish the result.

The thing has gone on until it has become an absolute scandal. Every clerk in this building is insisting upon extra pay for the service he is already paid to perform. That is what is the matter with the situation, and not the mere fact that some Senator has been successful in having one of these extra allowances put on the bill without my objection.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair is prepared to rule on the point of order.

Mr. CLARKE of Arkansas. I should be glad to have the Chair do so.

Mr. WARREN. Before the Chair rules, I desire to say that the amount is not a large one.

Mr. CLARKE of Arkansas. It does not make any difference whether it is large or small; the question is whether or not it is right.

Mr. WARREN. But the Senate ought to know what is before it in the number of amendments that have been presented. They amount, I should say, to something like $12,000 or $13,000 altogether.

Mr. CLARKE of Arkansas. I do not believe I can be deprived of my rights now simply because I have slept on them heretofore. I had hoped that somebody else, who was identified with the Committee on Appropriations, would have taken the action that I feel called upon to take at this stage.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. In the opinion of the Chair, the point of order made by the Senator from Georgia [Mr. SMITH] is controlling, that point of order being that when moved from a standing or select committee these amendments shall, at least one day before they are considered, be referred to the Committee on Appropriations. That does not seem to have been done in this case; and the point of order is sustained.

Mr. CHILTON. Mr. President, I offer an amendment, to come in on page 62, after line 23.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 62, after line 23, it is proposed to insert:

To pay to the Citizens' Trust & Guaranty Co., of West Virginia, the amount withheld by the Navy Department in making settlements under contracts Nos. 1008 and 1106 of September 3 and November 1, 1902, with the Penn Erecting Co. for the construction of buildings Nos. 19 and 4 at the navy yard, Philadelphia, Pa., if there be no sufficient reason for further withholding the same, $1,491.92.

Mr. CHILTON. Mr. President, I desire to explain this matter briefly. It is set forth in a letter——

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President, I reserve the point of order.

Mr. CHILTON. A certain company had contracts with the Government for the erection of two buildings at the Philadelphia Navy Yard. That company defaulted in the contracts; and the Citizens' Trust & Guaranty Co., which was the surety of the defaulting company, had to take over the contracts and build them.

Mr. SMOOT. Evidently it is a claim, pure and simple, that ought to go to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. CHILTON. No; it is not a claim pure and simple. It is a case of the Government having our money in its hands, under a settlement clearly acknowledging that it should now be paid by the Navy Department, but there is no money available with which to pay it. The Acting Secretary of the Navy says, in a letter here to the chairman of the committee of the House, that the department is ready to pay it over, and it ought to be paid. It is due these people upon a settlement. There is simply no money appropriated with which to pay it. The amendment makes the reservation that it is not to be paid if there be any reason, on a settlement, why it should not be paid. It can not hurt anybody, and it is purely technical to make any objection to it.

Here is the letter, which I should like to have read, from the Acting Secretary of the Navy.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, the Secretary will read as requested.

Mr. CHILTON. This letter states that the fact that the money should be paid is not denied by anybody, and it is on a stated settlement between these parties and the Government.

Mr. SMOOT. Let me ask the Senator a question. Why has not this been introduced as a bill, and why has it not been here before? Why is it brought in here at the very last hour early on the morning of the day before adjournment.

Mr. CHILTON. It was presented in another place, and was not allowed.

Mr. SMOOT. I make the point of order on it, Mr. President.

Mr. CHILTON. I submit that the point of order is not good.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I reserved the point of order, and I now make it. It is a new item on an appropriation bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from West Virginia has asked that a certain letter shall be read. That may have some influence upon the Chair in deciding the point of order. The Secretary will read as requested.

The Secretary read as follows:

NAVY DEPARTMENT,
Washington, February 27, 1913.

Hon. JOHN J. FITZGERALD,
Chairman Committee on Appropriations,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR CONGRESSMAN: On the 14th instant Messrs. Ellis and Donaldson, attorneys at law of this city, made claim in behalf of the Citizens Trust & Guaranty Co. of West Virginia, to the balance withheld by this department in making settlement under contracts Nos. 1008 and 1106, of September 3 and November 1, 1902, with the Penn Erecting Co., for the construction of buildings Nos. 19 and 4 at the navy yard, Philadelphia, Pa., and requested that a deficiency estimate be submitted to Congress for the payment thereof. The amount in question, $1,491.99, was retained by this department when settlement was made with the surety company upon the completion of the work, because of the claim of the Tradesmen's Trust Co., of Philadelphia, that it had, as receiver for the contracting company, actually expended that amount for labor and materials employed in the prosecution of the work on building No. 4 after the bankruptcy of the contractor.

Inasmuch as the claim of the receiver would appear to have been abandoned, this department has advised Messrs. Ellis and Donaldson, by letter of the 24th instant, that it would be willing in the present state of the case to pay the surety company the amount withheld upon the filing by it of a satisfactory indemnity bond in the amount of the payment, but that there is at present no fund available from which this sum could be paid, and that their request for the presentation of the matter to Congress was received too late for the submission of a deficiency estimate at the present session, it being suggested, however, that they bring the matter to the attention of the department at a future date with a view to its presentation, if then deemed desirable, to the next Congress.

The foregoing information is submitted at this time, for the purpose of acquainting your committee with this department's attitude in the matter, at the suggestion of Mr. Donaldson, who says that he wishes, if possible, to have the item included in the deficiency bill now under consideration.

Faithfully, yours, PHILIP ANDREWS,
Acting Secretary.

Mr. CHILTON. Mr. President, my point is that that is equivalent to an estimate. There is a sum stated, and there is no doubt that it is owing from the Government. There is no doubt in the world that no committee could find anything different, and no estimate could change the situation. There is really an estimate by the Navy Department of the sum of money due, and nothing keeps it from being paid except the fact that there are no funds available out of which to pay it.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I withdraw the point of order.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I should like to ask the Senator from West Virginia why this claim has been pending for nearly 11 years?

Mr. CHILTON. It has not been pending for 11 years. It has just been recently released. It has not been paid, but has been held up because some one else claimed the money. Until that claim was withdrawn it had to be held up. There is no reason for not paying it, except that there are no funds available.

Mr. SMOOT. The letter says:

Making settlement under contracts Nos. 1008 and 1106 of September 3 and November 1, 1902.

Mr. CHILTON. The contracts were of that date, not the settlements.

Mr. SMOOT. When were the contracts completed?

Mr. CHILTON. Some time ago; but until recently this money was not released by the other company claiming it in Philadelphia.

Mr. SMOOT. That is what I say; the whole thing has been in dispute here for years and years.

Mr. CHILTON. There is nothing at all in dispute. There never was anything in dispute. There is nothing in dispute now. Nothing could be in dispute. There is an estimate. There is no dispute about it. It is so worded that if there is any reason why it should not be paid it shall not be available.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, let it go into conference; but I do not——

Mr. BRISTOW. I make the point of order that it is a claim.

Mr. CHILTON. The Chair may decide it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair is constrained to sustain the point of order.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. President, I offer the amendment which I send to the desk.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. It is proposed to insert, on page 21, after line 27, the following:

To enable the Secretary of War to pay to Rittenhouse Moore the sum of $3,653.05, being the amount stated and claimed by him, as set forth in House Document No. 100, Fifty-eighth Congress, second session, for overwidth dredging in the Potomac River below Washington, D. C., and recommended by the Secretary of War, as therein shown.

Mr. SMOOT. I think I remember this claim being before the Committee on Claims. It has been considered a number of times, Mr. President. I make the point of order that it is a private claim upon an appropriation bill.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Will the Senator withhold that point for a minute?

Mr. SMOOT. Yes; I will withhold it for a minute.

Mr. BANKHEAD. The Senator from Utah truly states that this claim has been before the committee a number of times. It has been reported from that committee at least four times since it accrued, and it has been passed by the Senate at least four times. It was passed during this session of Congress, and it is now on the House Calendar. The facts, briefly stated, are these:

This is an amount due Rittenhouse Moore on a dredging contract on the Potomac River. In making settlement they failed to pay him this amount. It went to the department and was adjudicated. The Secretary of War at that time—the present senior Senator from New York—reviewed the matter, and recommended that the amount be paid. I have in my hand the report of the Secretary of War.

The Government owes this man this money for work he has done. It says it owes him and that he ought to be paid. He has been here for 10 years trying to get payment. The Committee on Claims have never failed to report it when it has gone before them, because it is meritorious. The Senate has never failed to pass it when it was on the calendar.

Mr. SMOOT. The House has failed to pass it time and time again.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Yes.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair will inquire of the Senator whether this amendment, in any form, has passed the Senate at the present session of Congress?

Mr. BANKHEAD. It has passed at the present session of Congress.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If that be a fact, the point of order is overruled. The question is upon agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, I offer the following amendment, to be inserted after the amendment, between lines 8 and 9, on page 49:

To pay J. G. Hamilton for services actually rendered and performed as doorkeeper of the Senate from December 14, 1911, to March 1, 1913, an additional amount of $390.

I desire to say that the amendment I offer is, under the rule that was announced by the Chair a very short time ago, subject to a point of order. I simply desire to state what the amendment is, and then the point of order can be made if any Senator desires to do so.

All of the doorkeepers around this Chamber, both on the galleries and below, are, with the exception of one, receiving $1,440 per annum, as I understand. One, the gentleman who has attended the very front door during the last year, the one-armed doorkeeper out there, has received a salary of $1,050. The $390 provided for by this amendment is the difference between $1,050 and $1,440 for the several months that he has been there.

It is subject to a point of order. I hope, however, considering the fact that his salary is only $1,050, and that he is performing the same service as the other one at the door, this amendment, carrying only $390, will be allowed.

Mr. CLARKE of Arkansas. I make the point of order, although not so much on account of the amount. No doubt the salary ought to be higher. That is not the feature that prompts me to undertake to limit the items that go into the bill to such as are provided for by rules. I make the point of order.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The point of order is sustained.

Mr. BURTON. I desire to offer an amendment, which I send to the desk.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 23, line 14, it is proposed to insert:

INTERNATIONAL WATERWAYS COMMISSION.

For salaries and expenses of the International Waterways Commission, authorized by section 4 of the river and harbor act approved June 13, 1902, for the last half of the fiscal year 1913, $10,000.

Mr. WARREN. Mr. President, that has been properly estimated for; but the committee was not able to indorse it because the amount of $15,000 in the sundry civil bill, being immediately available, was, of course, at hand to be used for the remainder of this year. I presume the intent of the Senator who offers this amendment is to provide so that this amount can be used during this year, and the other sum can extend all the way through the next fiscal year. Last year we put in $20,000, if I remember correctly—the usual amount that they have had. The House conferees, on the statement that had been made by a chief of this department before, that they could finish in a year, cut it down to $10,000, I think. Am I right about that?

Mr. BURTON. Yes.

Mr. WARREN. Gen. Ernst, who is at the head of that commission, states that they will not be able to finish their work until the end of the next year.

Mr. BURTON. April 1, 1914.

Mr. WARREN. So I make that statement, and leave it to the Senate to vote it in or out, as they choose.

Mr. BURTON. Mr. Chairman, that is very readily explained. The object of the $10,000 is, in part, to provide for the last half of this year, and to make the provision for their salaries and expenses complete until April 1, 1914. But it is to be noted that they have incurred expenses during the months of January and February, and the words "immediately available" do not apply to that. There is an estimate for this and a recommendation of the Secretary of War under date of December 6, 1912. The amount in the sundry civil bill makes provision for their expenses from July 1 of this year until April 1 of next year, when it is expected that the work will be completed.

I may say, in that connection, that this is very important work—the fixing of monuments and the determination of the boundary in Lake Erie and other boundary waters between the United States and Canada. This $10,000 provides for the first half of this year—1913. Congress is doing a rather inconsistent thing to provide for the expenses from July 1, 1913, to April 1, 1914, and make no provision for the first half of this year.

Mr. CLARKE of Arkansas. I ask that the amendment may be again reported.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Secretary will read as requested.

The Secretary again read the amendment.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. BRIGGS. I offer, on behalf of the senior Senator from Kansas [Mr. CURTIS], the following amendment:

To pay F. H. Wakefield for preparing the history of legislation for the Senate in the third session of the Sixty-second Congress, for carrying out his tracing and notification plan to Members of the Senate and clerks of committees, $1,200.

This is another of those items which were referred originally to the Committee on Appropriations, and by them referred to the Committee on Contingent Expenses, and which, under the provisions of the law, the Committee on Contingent Expenses were not able to pay out of the contingent fund.

Mr. CLARKE of Arkansas. I make the same point of order. It is one of the same class.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If the amendment is of the same character as the others, the Chair will have to sustain the point of order.

Mr. BRIGGS. I offer the following amendment on behalf of the senior Senator from Nebraska [Mr. BROWN]:

To pay the persons who compiled, annotated, and indexed volume 3 of Indian Laws and Treaties, etc., under Senate resolutions of March 3, 1911, and August 14, 1912, $3,000, of which said sum so much as may be necessary may be expended as additional compensation to any officer or employee of the United States, to be immediately available, and to be paid upon vouchers signed by the chairman of the Committee on Indian Affairs of the Senate.

The same conditions exist in this case.

Mr. CLARKE of Arkansas. I make the same point of order.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The point of order is sustained.

Mr. WARREN. There is a little difference in the one just sent up, because it is in pursuance of a resolution passed by the Senate that the work should be done. Of course that resolution did not state the amount of money, but it did authorize the work to be done.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Secretary will state the amendment.

The SECRETARY. After the amendment heretofore agreed to on page 49, it is proposed to insert:

To pay the persons who compiled, annotated, and indexed volume 3 of Indian Laws and Treaties, etc., under Senate resolutions of March 3, 1911, and August 14, 1912, $3,000, of which said sum so much as may be necessary may be expended as additional compensation to any officer or employee of the United States, to be immediately available, and to be paid upon vouchers signed by the chairman of the Committee on Indian Affairs of the Senate.

Mr. CLARKE of Arkansas. Mr. President, there are several objections to it. The first is that it has not been referred to the committee at least one day before its consideration; the next is that it adds a new item to an appropriation; and it seems to provide for a future expenditure of money, and therefore would be general legislation. There are half a dozen objections to that one.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The point of order is sustained.

Mr. BRIGGS. On behalf of the senior Senator from Colorado [Mr. GUGGENHEIM], I offer another amendment, which, I suppose, must take the same route as those passed upon.

Mr. CLARKE of Arkansas. I shall make the point of order against that.

Mr. WARREN. That is a matter, I think, of two hundred and odd dollars, and is for a long, hard season of work under one of these commissions that was authorized by the Senate.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. It is proposed to insert on page 49:

To pay James F. Belford for services rendered as secretary to the commission to investigate the pneumatic-tube postal system, $225.

Mr. CLARKE of Arkansas. May I inquire why that clerk has not been paid heretofore?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I do not understand that myself, Mr. President. I am on that commission. We elected him clerk. He only charged $75 a month, and he has done a great deal of work. I do not know why he has not been paid.

Mr. BRISTOW. Is there not a special appropriation to pay those expenses?

Mr. WARREN. Mr. President, even if there were, it could not be paid without legislation, under the very law the Senator has quoted.

Mr. CLARKE of Arkansas. Let the amendment be reported again. I did not exactly catch the character of the services for which payment is expected.

The Secretary again read the proposed amendment.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I can state to the Senator from Arkansas that the last Congress required the chairman of the Post Office Committees of the two Houses to appoint certain Members of the Senate and certain Members of the House to act as a commission to investigate the status of the pneumatic-tube service that served the Post Office Department of the United States, and authorized them to employ assistants. They have been at work since some time last December—the 1st of December. We elected this gentleman clerk, and made him do a great deal of work for us. I understand he charges only $75 a month for it. He has some other work. I thought the commission had authority to draw on some fund for it. The Senator from Colorado [Mr. GUGGENHEIM] was chairman of the commission.

Mr. BRISTOW. Mr. President, was there not a special appropriation made in the last Post Office appropriation bill for this joint committee?

Mr. WARREN. As I said before, that will not help the matter at all, because this gentleman is on the roll. He is a fourteen hundred and forty dollar clerk.

Mr. BRISTOW. But if the appropriation has been made, and is subject to the authority of some committee, to be expended upon the vouchers of the committee, it does not have to be appropriated again, does it?

Mr. WARREN. It does if the man is already receiving a salary in the Government service.

Mr. BOURNE. Under the law it can not be paid.

Mr. WARREN. The Senator just quoted the law, and ought to know it.

Mr. BRISTOW. If I quoted the law, I was not aware of that fact; I certainly did not intend to do so. If an appropriation of so many thousand dollars is made for a joint committee for an investigation, and the expenses are to be paid upon vouchers submitted by the chairman of that joint committee out of the appropriation that is made, does that appropriation have to be made the second time for the payment of such expenses?

Mr. WARREN. Not at all, if you hire some one who is not in the employ of the Government; but if it is an employee of the Government, under a salary, you have to provide specially for it.

Mr. BRISTOW. Then he is paid $75 a month in addition to his present salary. Is that correct?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Yes; he was the secretary of some other committee and did this work in addition to his regular work.

Mr. WARREN. Does the Senator know that he had been paid $75 in addition to the pay for his regular service?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. He has not been paid at all. We agreed to pay him. The members of the commission have fixed $75 a month, without reference to his other work, as compensation for the essential work he did for the commission.

Mr. CLARKE of Arkansas. I withdraw the point of order, because this appears to be a case where a man has not been paid at all for services that he rendered.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. DILLINGHAM. I offer the amendment I send to the desk.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment will be read.

The SECRETARY. Under the heading "Senate" insert:

Senate Elections Cases: To enable the Secretary of the Senate to pay, upon vouchers approved by the present chairman of the Committee on Privileges and Elections, for preparing a revised edition of Senate Election Cases, bringing the same down to the close of the Sixty-second Congress, as directed by Senate resolution of January 18, 1913, $1,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary; and said sum, or any part thereof, in the discretion of the present chairman of the Committee on Privileges and Elections, may be paid as additional compensation to any employee of the United States, and shall continue to be available during the fiscal year ending June 30, 1914.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I make the point of order that that is not within the rule and can not be added to the appropriation bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Vermont desire to be heard on the point of order?

Mr. DILLINGHAM. I do not know that I care to be heard on the point of order. I wish simply to explain that this work is now in progress under the authority of a resolution adopted by the Senate two months ago, more or less. It is not yet completed. It will be completed, probably, within six weeks or two months.

Mr. CLARKE of Arkansas. May I ask the Senator from Vermont a question?

Mr. DILLINGHAM. Certainly.

Mr. CLARKE of Arkansas. Is the compilation being made by the present clerical force of the Committee on Privileges and Elections?

Mr. DILLINGHAM. It is.

Mr. CLARKE of Arkansas. And this is to pay them extra for doing that work?

Mr. DILLINGHAM. This is to pay them extra for doing that work.

Mr. CLARKE of Arkansas. Why can not the clerks of the committee do such work as the committee requires to be done? What is the clerk of the committee to do if he does not do the work required to be done?

Mr. DILLINGHAM. I will say in reply——

Mr. CLARKE of Arkansas. It is not so much a reply as information that I desire.

Mr. DILLINGHAM. It is the custom to have work done by men skilled in the work. The Secretary of that committee is very well versed in doing such work, and he has been working at night—working until midnight—to bring it down.

Let me say that when the resolution was adopted by the Senate there was not available for the use of any Member of the Senate a copy of the Compilation of Election Cases. The Senator from Arkansas had occasion to know that fact, because he made application at the folding room and at the Document Room and at the Public Printer's. The present edition of that work is entirely out of print. The resolution which was adopted by the Senate provided for bringing the work down to 1912, and for a republication with the additional matter. The work is now under process and will be finished some time within the near future. It was done by direction of the Senate.

Mr. CLARKE of Arkansas. I am not complaining about a new edition of the Election Cases being printed. I understand perfectly that somebody has got to be paid for doing the work, but what I was complaining about is that that work not only can be done by the existing clerical force of the committee but actually has been done, and this is simply a proposition to pay a second time an official who has already been paid to do the very same work. It is the system that I am complaining against and not the few dollars involved in the amendment. If the clerk could do it and actually did it, that it was necessary work is no good reason why he should be paid in addition. If his salary is not sufficient, it ought to be increased.

Mr. DILLINGHAM. It is no part of his salary to do such work.

Mr. CLARKE of Arkansas. He has no regular work except such work as the committee has for him to do.

Mr. DILLINGHAM. If we had employed some one else we would have had to take a person who was entirely inexperienced, without knowledge of this particular work.

Mr. CLARKE of Arkansas. It is not necessary to employ anybody else to serve as the clerk of the Committee on Privileges and Elections, because the committee already has a competent clerk who is not only able to do the work but has actually done the work.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Will the Senator from Vermont kindly state the terms of the resolution in a general way?

Mr. DILLINGHAM. I have not a copy of the resolution before me, but, as I remember the resolution, it provided that the work should be done under the direction of the Committee on Privileges and Elections and that it should be brought down to 1912.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. What is the point of order?

Mr. CLARKE of Arkansas. I do not make a point of order. I think the amendment ought to be defeated on its merits.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the amendment submitted by the Senator from Vermont.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. JONES. I desire to offer an amendment which is subject to a point of order, but it does not call for the payment of a dollar and is in the interest of the homesteaders who are building up the country. I do not think anyone will make a point of order against it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Washington will send the amendment to the desk.

Mr. PERCY. I make a point of order against it in the interest of time.

Mr. JONES. It would not save any time to make a point of order now, because I want to explain it, and I do not believe anyone will then make a point of order against it.

Mr. CLARKE of Arkansas. Let it be read.

Mr. WARREN. So far as the chairman is concerned, it is true it is open to a point of order, but if the Senator will get unanimous consent that it may go in I will do my best to protect it. Of course, there is no doubt but that it is subject to a point of order.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment will first be read.

The SECRETARY. After line 9, on page 35, insert:

That any person entitled to enter lands under the homestead laws, who may have established residence upon unsurveyed lands, which were subject to homestead entry prior to the pasasge and approval of the act of June 6, 1912, entitled "An act to amend section 2291 and section 2297 of the Revised Statutes relating to homesteads," may perfect his proof for such lands under said act of June 6, 1912, or under the law existing at the time of the establishment of such residence, as he may elect, such election to be signified to the Department of the Interior in accordance with rules and regulations to be prescribed by the Secretary.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Washington will be briefly heard.

Mr. JONES. Congress passed an act in 1912 known as the three-year homestead law. Subsequently we passed an act by an amendment on an appropriation act permitting settlers who had made entry prior to its passage but had not proved up to elect whether they would prove up under the act of 1912 or under the act existing at the time they made their homestead entry. This amendment simply provides that where persons settled on unsurveyed land, squatted on land upon which they could not make an entry until it was surveyed, and made entry after the passage of the act of 1912, they may elect whether they will make proof under the act of 1912 or under the law existing at the time they made settlement. Some have lived on this unsurveyed land five or six years, and it is nothing more than right that they should be permitted to make proof under the law which they have been expecting to comply with if they prefer to do it. This is all the amendment does. This is urgent, and there should be no objection to it.

Mr. WARREN. The bill has already passed the Senate.

Mr. JONES. It has already passed the Senate.

Mr. WARREN. I suggest to the Senator from Washington to ask unanimous consent that the amendment may be put on the bill.

Mr. JONES. Very well; I ask unanimous consent that it may go on the bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and the amendment is agreed to.

Mr. CRAWFORD. I desire to offer an amendment.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Will the Senator from South Dakota suspend for a moment? The Senator from Maine [Mr. GARDNER] has addressed the Chair two or three times. The Senator from Maine.

Mr. GARDNER. On page 50, line 11, after the numerals "$175," I move to insert what I send to the desk.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment will be read.

The SECRETARY. After line 11, on page 50, insert:

Pay to Joseph Reardon for extra clerical services rendered to the Hon. Obadiah Gardner of Maine from October 1 to December 1, 1911, $200.

Mr. GARDNER. Mr. President, I do not want to take up the time of the Senate with any long speech. I am congested with speeches already made. This is a bill that was contracted by myself before I had a secretary, when I first came here. I am liable for it myself, and if the Senate does not choose to pay it, it is all right.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. CRAWFORD. In connection with the work on the omnibus claims bill, which I think it will be admitted was unusually heavy, one of the clerks who is a sort of a fixture in the committee and is indispensible, and I think will be recognized by the incoming administraton as a sort of necessary fixture connected with that committee, did an unusual amount of hard work. His compensation is only $900 a year, and out of a sense of justice toward him I offer an amendment. It may be subject to a point of order, but I shall discharge what I think is my duty toward him.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment will be read.

The SECRETARY. It is proposed to insert on page 50, after line 11, the following:

To pay Harry B. Straight for extra clerical services rendered in connection with the omnibus claims bill, $250.

Mr. CLARKE of Arkansas. I do not want to object to meritorious cases where the value of the service is evident. I am not a cheeseparing economist. But I find that this matter of giving to the clerical force of committees extra allowances has grown into a regular business. From the fact that this gentleman gets but $900 a year, of course, he was not intended to perform very important services with that committee. I venture to say that the other clerks of the committee had something to do with the preparation of this amendment.

Mr. CRAWFORD. The situation is a little unusual. The regular clerks of the committee have their duties to perform. This young man was a clerk there when I became connected with the committee, and had been employed in that capacity for a number of years before. The archives, the files of that committee have grown until they are very extensive. This young man can go in there the darkest night and almost without any effort at all get what he wants. He is indispensible.

Mr. CLARKE of Arkansas. I am not going to object to the amount, and I have such confidence in the fairness of the Senator from South Dakota that I am satisfied he would not employ a clerk unless he thought he needed him. I know that has been a very busy committee because they have done a vast volume of important work. I think I can draw a distinction between this case and those to which I have been objecting. I do not enter an objection.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments were concurred in.

The amendments were ordered to be engrossed and the bill to be read a third time.

The bill was read the third time and passed.

Mr. WARREN. The clerk will correct the totals and sections.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That will be done.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by J. C. South, its Chief Clerk, announced that the House had passed the following bill and joint resolution:

S. 1142. An act to protect the monuments already erected on the battle field of Buli Run, Va., and other monuments that may be there erected; and

S. J. Res. 164. Joint resolution stopping traffic and preventing interference with the suffrage procession.

The message also announced that the House had agreed to the report of the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 27941) making appropriations for the support of the Army for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1914.

R. 28730) making appropriations for the payment of invalid and other pensions of the United States for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1914, and for other purposes.

The message also announced that the House insists upon its amendments to the bill (S. 3043) granting to the coal mining companies in the State of Oklahoma the right to acquire additional acreage adjoining their mine leases, and for other purposes, disagreed to by the Senate; agrees to the conference asked for by the Senate on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon, and had appointed Mr. CARTER, Mr. HAYDEN, and Mr. CAMPBELL managers at the conference on the part of the House.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

The message further announced that the Speaker of the House had signed the following enrolled bills and joint resolution, and they were thereupon signed by the President pro tempore:

RIVERS AND HARBORS BILL—SEAMEN IN MERCHANT MARINE.

Mr. NELSON. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the conference report on House bill 28180, the rivers and harbors bill.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Will the Senator from Minnesota yield to me to submit a request for unanimous consent?

Mr. NELSON. I will.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The motion itself is not debatable. A request for unanimous consent will be in order.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President, I submit the request, which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Wisconsin submits the following:

The SECRETARY. The Senator from Wisconsin asks unanimous consent that one hour from this hour, 1.45 a. m., the Senate will proceed without further debate to vote upon the motion to agree upon the conference report upon the bill H. R. 28180, the rivers and harbors bill, so called, and, further, that on Monday, March 3, 1913, at not later than 8 o'clock p. m., the Senate will proceed to vote without further debate upon any amendment that may be pending, any amendments that may be offered, and upon the bill H. R. 23673, the seamen's bill, so called, through the regular parliamentary stages, to its final disposition.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection?

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I do not rise to object at all to the unanimous-consent agreement proposed, but I believe it is proper now for the Senate to come to an understanding as to the time to which we will take a recess. It is Sunday morning now. Before this request is put, if the Senator from Wisconsin will yield——

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I will yield for that purpose.

Mr. SMOOT. I ask unanimous consent that when the Senate take a recess to-day it be until 2 o'clock p. m.

Mr. JOHNSTON of Alabama. I object.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. So do I. I do not believe in meeting at all to-day.

Mr. SMOOT. I wish to say that unless we meet some time to-day it will be utterly impossible to get through the appropriation bills and consider the conference reports that are to be made.

Mr. WARREN. The House has just taken a recess until 2.30 p. m. to-day.

Mr. SMOOT. The House has just taken a recess until 2.30 p. m. I move that when the Senate takes a recess to-day it be until 2 p. m. this afternoon.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Utah.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Now I renew my request for unanimous consent.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the request?

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President——

Mr. OLIVER. Let it be read.

Mr. WARREN. I wish to ask the Senator from Wisconsin to state, in brief, what the agreement proposed provides for. I only want to look out for the conference reports that will be coming in.

Mr. CUMMINS. I object to the desultory conversation in front. I addressed the Chair and was recognized.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. But a unanimous-consent agreement has been asked for by the Senator from Wisconsin, and it has not been acted upon.

Mr. CUMMINS. Very well; I was about to address myself to the unanimous-consent agreement proposed.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair will recognize the Senator from Iowa for that purpose.

Mr. CUMMINS. I want to vote upon the conference report on the rivers and harbors bill, and I do not want to wait here an hour for the purpose of doing it. I think it is unfair and unnecessary to keep the Senate in session for another hour at this time in the morning. If we can not have a vote upon the conference report this morning, I have no objection whatever to fixing a time on Monday for a vote upon the report. I desire to occupy probably five minutes—not more than that—in order to state the reasons why I can not vote for the bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Will the Senator from Wisconsin give his attention to the Senator from Iowa?

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I beg pardon.

Mr. CUMMINS. It seems to me that in view of the fact that we have been here nearly all night for three nights we ought not to be required to stay here until 3 o'clock in the morning in order to get a vote upon this report. I will object to fixing that hour, although I will not object to fixing any hour to-morrow afternoon, Monday, that may suit the convenience of those who are especially interested in the measure.

Mr. NELSON. Mr. President, if we should fix the hour to-morrow, it would be too late; the bill would utterly fail. If it is the desire to pass the rivers and harbors bill, we ought to dispose of it now or this forenoon.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President, I realize that Members of the Senate are very much worn-out and that we are somewhat on edge. I do hope we will be able to arrive at an agreement which will enable us at least to reach a vote upon the conference report on the rivers and harbors bill before we take a recess.

I do not believe it will be necessary to consume the full time of an hour, which was allotted in the proposition as I submitted it. There are only two or three Members of the Senate, so far as I could ascertain by something like a thorough canvass, who desire to speak at all; and I measured out a somewhat abundant allowance, so as to be certain that everybody would get an opportunity to speak. I believe we can conclude in perhaps 30 minutes, and if we could do so, that would place the conference report in the hands of the conferees and give opportunity for them to work upon it before the Senate meets at 2 o'clock.

Mr. CUMMINS. I do not quite understand the suggestion of the Senator from Minnesota. This is the conference report, and if it is adopted by the Senate the legislative action upon the bill has passed.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. But it may not be adopted.

Mr. CUMMINS. If it is not adopted, then, I assume, the bill will fail. I should like to ask the Senator from Minnesota why he thinks that if the action is not taken until to-morrow or until Monday there is danger that the bill may fail, assuming that it will receive the support of a majority of the Senate.

Mr. NELSON. Then the conference report has to go back to the House and be acted upon there.

Mr. CUMMINS. That is true of nearly every appropriation bill.

Mr. SMOOT. All but four.

Mr. CUMMINS. All but four, as the Senator from Utah says. If the Senate will agree to vote upon the conference report on the rivers and harbors bill at 2 o'clock, I shall make no objection. It has probably been debated here sufficiently. I will waive the privilege that I hoped to enjoy of saying a word about it. But to stay here until 3 o'clock for the purpose of voting upon it is, to me, unnecessary and unfair as well.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. May I ask the Senator from Iowa if he would consent that we might vote upon the conference report in 30 minutes?

Mr. CUMMINS. Well, I will strain that point. I will make no objection if the Senator makes it not later than half past 2 o'clock.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Then I submit the request in that form.

Mr. NEWLANDS. Mr. President, I wish to say a word regarding this matter, as I may not have another opportunity. I have no objection to the request.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair hears no objection, and the request as modified——

Mr. OLIVER. I should like to hear the proposed unanimous-consent agreement read.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The unanimous-consent agreement will be read as modified.

The SECRETARY. The Senator from Wisconsin asks unanimous consent that at not later than 2.30 this day the Senate will proceed, without further debate, to vote upon the motion to agree to the conference report upon H. R. 28180, the rivers and and harbors bill; and, further, that on Sunday, March 2, 1913, at not later than 8 o'clock p. m., the Senate will proceed to vote, without further debate, upon any amendments that may be pending, any amendments that may be offered, and upon the bill H. R. 23673, the seamen's bill, so called—through the regular parliamentary stages—to its final disposition.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. To-morrow.

Mr. BURTON. Mr. President, I desire to be heard on that. I do not object to the first portion in regard to the rivers and harbors bill, but the second I do object to. If a vote should be postponed until 8 o'clock Monday evening——

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. No; Sunday evening.

Mr. BURTON. Then probably it will be necessary to put the bill into conference.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. That will allow six hours.

Mr. BURTON. If the Senate will agree that we shall take up the seamen's bill at 3 o'clock and discuss it consecutively until 8 o'clock, I shall have no objection. I presume, in the meantime, we should let in conference reports.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. The proposition is to take it up at 2 o'clock.

Mr. BRISTOW. What about the executive session to consider nominations?

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. There is not any provision for an executive session.

Mr. BRISTOW. I think there ought to be.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Not as against the consideration of this seamen's bill.

Mr. BRISTOW. There is more than one who can object to this proposed agreement.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. All right; if the Senator wants to make an objection he can make it.

Mr. BRISTOW. The seamen's bill has been waiting for six months, and we do not hear about it until 18 hours before the session closes.

Mr. BURTON. It is the unfinished business.

Mr. BRISTOW. Many of us never heard it discussed. I do not know what are its provisions.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. There are six hours allotted for discussion.

Mr. KENYON. I ask the Senator from Wisconsin if he will not amend his request and provide for a vote on the rivers and harbors bill by a yea-and-nay vote?

Mr. BURTON. Right now?

Mr. KENYON. No; at 2.30 o'clock.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. A yea-and-nay vote will be allowed, I have no doubt. Let us have the request put.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the request made by the Senator from Wisconsin?

Mr. BRISTOW. I want to know if there is any arrangement, or whether there is to be any, for an executive session?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair is unable to answer the question.

Mr. BRISTOW. Until an arrangement is made for an executive session I will interpose an objection to the proposed unanimous-consent agreement.

Mr. STONE. Why provide for an executive session? The Senate can go into executive session at any time.

Mr. GAMBLE. Do I understand the unanimous consent proposed is to preclude the submission of conference reports and action thereon?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It does not include that.

Mr. GAMBLE. It does not exclude them?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It does not include them. It does exclude them.

Mr. SMOOT. It can be made subject to conference reports.

Mr. GAMBLE. I think it would be wise to make the unanimous-consent agreement subject to conference reports. I have already given notice——

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I would be willing to make that change, provided it is stated that the conference reports do not lead to debate, but it would be useless to attempt the consideration of the seamen's bill and then have the time taken up by debate upon a conference report. We might as well understand that now.

Mr. OLIVER. I would suggest that if there are conference reports to be acted upon, or if there is executive business unfinished, the Senate can continue the session after 8 o'clock and dispose of that business.

Mr. SMOOT. Certainly.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Oh, yes.

Mr. OLIVER. This agreement need not interfere with either the disposition of conference reports or executive business.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I could not interfere with the disposition of executive business after 8 o'clock.

Mr. OLIVER. That is what I mean.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair will venture to make the suggestion that the agreement does not seem to exclude conference reports. It simply provides for the hour of voting, and conference reports, being privileged so far as presentation is concerned, can be handed in.

Mr. GAMBLE. If that is the understanding, I will not object to the unanimous-consent agreement; otherwise I would object.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection?

Mr. BURTON. I am very loath to object. I have no objection to an agreement that after three or four hours' discussion—I think three hours would answer—we shall take a vote on the seamen's bill, and I hope to bring it up to-morrow right away; but I can not consent to an agreement and then make it possible to have conference reports come in and take all the time, so that we would be compelled to vote on the bill without any explanation or discussion.

I am willing to agree that we shall take it up right away after 2.30 to-morrow, and after I should say four hours' discussion we take the vote. I will say three hours.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Why not say six hours? That is what the proposition allots.

Mr. BURTON. If we had the time without interruption——

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. It might take the full six hours. The agreement proposed is that at not later than 8 o'clock we shall take the vote.

Mr. BURTON. If we had the time from 2.30 or 3 o'clock to-night without interruption, I should not have a moment's hesitancy in agreeing upon 8 o'clock; but with the possibility, as the Chair suggests, and as we know here by the experience of the last two or three days, that we will be interrupted by this, that, and the other conference report, I do not feel like agreeing to it.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. It is within the control of the Senate as to whether they will give time for the discussion of conference reports. Conference reports might be received, and we might go on with the seamen's bill without giving any time for the discussion of those reports. I am inclined to think no conference reports will be made during that period.

Mr. NELSON. If the Senator will allow me to make a suggestion, it is a privilege to present a conference report at any time, but if we adhere to the rule strictly the report has to lie over a day before it can be taken up, so there can be no advantage taken by the presentation of conference reports.

Mr. BURTON. There are one or two, however, that have been filed to-day, are there not? All I care for, Mr. President, is to have it perfectly clear that we are to have a reasonable time for discussion.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I certainly desire that, I will say to the Senator from Ohio.

Mr. BURTON. And we will probably be interrupted by an executive session to-morrow.

Mr. BRISTOW. May I suggest——

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. An executive session can follow after 8 o'clock to-morrow evening.

Mr. BRISTOW. May I suggest that as soon as the seamen's bill is voted on, the Senate can then go into executive session?

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. That is perfectly agreeable to me, if it is to other Senators.

Mr. BURTON. I wish to state this in a little different form. I request that this bill be taken up at 2.30 o'clock and be continuously considered until 8 o'clock.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Suppose the Senate should dispose of it before that time or should be ready to dispose of it before that time?

Mr. SMOOT. If we are going to take this bill up at 2.30 o'clock and have a continuous discussion of it, I can not see——

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Suppose we say "a continuous discussion until 8 o'clock, unless sooner disposed of"?

Mr. SMOOT. I think that would be too long.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. "Unless disposed of" is not too long. That cuts it off.

Mr. SMOOT. The Senator from Ohio says that three hours is all that he desires.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. "Unless sooner disposed of."

Mr. SMOOT. Give four hours. That will bring a vote at 6.30.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. We should like to hear the colloquy that is going on between Senators.

Mr. ASHURST. We also should like to be taken into their confidence over here.

Mr. SMOOT. I think the Senator has heard every word I have said.

Mr. STONE. Do you want speeches or do you want to pass the bill?

Mr. FALL. There was a conference report submitted this morning or some time yesterday on the Indian appropriation bill, with notice that that would be called up at 2 o'clock. I suggest that that conference report will undoubtedly be debated.

Mr. BURTON. A parliamentary inquiry, Mr. President. The seamen's bill is the unfinished business, is it not?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The seamen's bill was displaced by a motion; but the Chair will make a liberal ruling, and rule that it is the unfinished business.

Mr. BURTON. Then I give notice that when we convene at the expiration of the recess I shall seek immediately to call up that bill.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I ask to have the unanimous-consent proposal submitted.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the unanimous consent asked for by the Senator from Wisconsin?

Mr. BRISTOW. If the Senator from Wisconsin will add that immediately after this bill is disposed of, the Senate shall then go into executive session I shall not object.

Mr. SMOOT. Then I would have to object.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Why not leave that to be controlled by the action of the Senate at that time?

Mr. BRISTOW. Very well.

Mr. BURTON. Mr. President, at what time do I understand the seamen's bill comes up for consideration?

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. At 2 o'clock.

Mr. BURTON. Am I to understand that all other subjects can be excluded, except by unanimous consent, until 8 o'clock, or until the bill is disposed of?

Mr. SMOOT. If that is the case, and everything else is to be excluded, I will insist that the discussion end not later than 6 o'clock.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator could at any time move to take up the bill if it remains on the calendar. If the Senator from Ohio will indulge the Chair, the Senator from Ohio inquired as to when the seamen's bill would come up. It being the unfinished business, ordinarily it would come up automatically two hours after the meeting of the Senate. If the Senate met at 10 o'clock, the unfinished business would be taken up at 12 o'clock. It would be within the competency of the Senator at any time previous to that, however, to move that it be taken up for consideration, if the Senator desired to do so. The Senator from Wisconsin has submitted a request for unanimous consent, which, having been modified two or three times, the Chair thinks ought to be again stated.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I do not recall that I have modified it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If there is no modification of it, the Chair will again put the request. Is there objection to the request for unanimous consent asked by the Senator from Wisconsin?

Mr. BURTON. I should like to have an understanding as to the share of the time that is to be given to the friends of the bill as reported by the Senate committee and what time is to be given to its opponents. If it is to be taken up at 2 o'clock and disposed of not later than 8 o'clock and there is an equal division of time, I have no objection; but I do not want to have the time taken altogether by the opponents of the bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the request?

Mr. WARREN. Let the request be stated.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The proposed agreement will again be stated.

The Secretary read as follows:

It is agreed by unanimous consent that at not later than 2.30 a. m., March 2, 1913, the Senate will vote, without further debate, upon the motion to agree to the conference report upon H. R. 28180, the rivers and harbors bill; and further, that at not later than 8 o'clock p. m. on said day the Senate will proceed to vote, without further debate, upon any amendment that may be pending, any amendments that may be offered, and upon the bill H. R. 23673, the seamen's bill, so called, through the regular parliamentary stages to its final disposition, the time for debate to be divided equally between the proponents and opponents of the bill.

Mr. BURTON. I have no objection to that if the friends of the bill as reported to the Senate will be allowed half the time.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection?

Mr. BURTON. I object unless that reservation is made.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. What time do we meet—at 2 or half past 2 o'clock to-morrow?

Mr. SMOOT. At 2 o'clock.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. What is proposed to be done in the half hour before the bill is taken up, if it is not taken up until 2.30 p. m.?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the request made by the Senator from Wisconsin?

Mr. BURTON. I object.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Ohio objects.

Mr. BURTON. I will state my reason. It is because I think the friends of the bill, those who reported it, are entitled to half the time, and the agreement as read is not satisfactory.

Mr. NELSON. I trust the Senator from Wisconsin will agree to an equal division of time.

Mr. SMOOT. The Senator from Wisconsin has apparently left the Chamber.

Mr. NELSON. Divide the time until 8 o'clock equally.

Mr. BURTON. Mr. President——

Mr. SWANSON. As the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LA FOLLETTE] is not now in the Chamber I will take the liberty of submitting the request with the modication that the time for debate shall be equally divided, as desired by the Senator from Ohio [Mr. BURTON].

Mr. BURTON. I am perfectly willing to agree to that.

Mr. WARREN. Mr. President, how much time is to be allowed? This matter of dividing time in the Senate is entirely new to me. I should like to know when the matter is to be taken up and when it is to be ended?

Mr. NELSON. The Senate meets at 2 o'clock.

Mr. WARREN. At 2 o'clock in the afternoon, and the debate will run until 8 in the evening?

Mr. NELSON. Yes, sir.

Mr. WARREN. And during those six hours no conference report or other business can be received?

Mr. NELSON. It may be received, but not debated.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and the agreement is entered into.

AGRICULTURE EXTENSION DEPARTMENTS.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I desire to present an order the adoption of which I shall move at the session of the Senate on Monday morning.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Georgia submits an order, which will be read.

The Secretary read as follows:

That the conferees on the part of the Senate upon H. R. 22871 are hereby discharged

That the Senate recede from the Senate substitute and agree to the House bill.

Mr. SMOOT and Mr. STONE. What is that bill?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. It is the agricultural extension bill. It will not come up, of course——

Mr. SMOOT. It is merely a notice that the Senator gives?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Merely a notice.

POST OFFICE APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. BOURNE submitted the following report:

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. JONATHAN BOURNE,
BOIES PENROSE,
J. H. BANKHEAD,
Managers on the part of the Senate.

JOHN A. MOON,
DAVID E. FINLEY,
JOHN W. WEEKS,
Managers on the part of the House.

The report was agreed to.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate the action of the House of Representatives agreeing to the report of the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 27148) making appropriations for the service of the Post Office Department for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1914, and for other purposes, and receding from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate No. 25 and agreeing to the same with an amendment, insisting upon its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate No. 26 and requesting a further conference with the Senate on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon.

Mr. BOURNE. I move that the Senate concur in the amendment of the House of Representatives to the amendment of the Senate numbered 25.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Oregon moves that the Senate concur in the amendment of the House of Representatives to the amendment of the Senate, which the Secretary will read.

The SECRETARY. Insert at the end of said amendment the following:

Which shall be made on or before March 4, 1914.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on concurring in the amendment of the House to the amendment of the Senate.

The amendment of the House to the amendment of the Senate was concurred in.

Mr. NEWLANDS. Mr. President, the vote on the conference report on the river and harbor bill is fixed for half past 2. We commenced the discussion at 10 minutes of 2, but almost all the time has been taken up with other matters, and we will not have any time to debate the conference report. I suggest that other matters go over.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The conference report is now before the Senate.

Mr. BOURNE. I move that the Senate further insist upon its amendment numbered 26, disagreed to by the House of Representatives; agree to the amendment of the House to the amendment of the Senate numbered 25; agree to the further conference asked for by the House on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon; and that the conferees on the part of the Senate be appointed by the Chair.

The motion was agreed to; and the President pro tempore appointed Mr. BOURNE, Mr. PENROSE, and Mr. BANKHEAD conferees on the part of the Senate.

RIVERS AND HARBORS BILL CONFERENCE REPORT.

The Senate resumed the consideration of the report of the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the bill (H. R. 28180) making appropriations for the construction, repair, and preservation of certain public works on rivers and harbors, and for other purposes.

Mr. NEWLANDS. Mr. President, I have opposed the adoption of the conference report regarding the river and harbor bill not because I wish to defeat the bill, but because I wish to secure a disagreement in order to compel the House conferees to present to the House itself two amendments offered by myself and adopted by the Senate without a dissenting vote, embodying a policy which has been declared for in all the party platforms. I never intended to press the discussion to a point where the life of the bill would be endangered, and therefore I have assented to this arrangement regarding a vote at half past 2. I do not wish to take up the time of the Senate with the discussion, but I urge the Senate to disagree to this report, and thus compel the conferees of the House, who are acting as the servants of the House, to submit to that body the consideration of this important question, which, as yet, the House has not had an opportunity to act upon.

Mr. BURTON. Mr. President, I say with some reluctance that I can not vote for the adoption of this report. The bill contains too many objectionable items. It is a part of the progress in the wrong direction which has been made in the last three or four years. There have been many excellent features in the management of our public works in that time. The engineers have made careful examinations, but we are going far away from business principles. We are making a great multitude of appropriations for numerous rivers and harbors and we are not pressing improvements to speedy completion.

Again, the selection of items here is too much made by favor. If there is any strong pressure behind an item, I do not care how objectionable it may be, it finds its way into this bill. I do not believe, Mr. President, that the infirmities and defects of legislative government have ever been more thoroughly illustrated than by the form which these bills have assumed. When a project is presented here the question is not will it help commerce, but does the locality want it? Does a Senator want it? Do a sufficient number of Representatives want it? While the proposition at first seemed to me startling—to leave these matters to a commission—I do not know but that I shall become a convert to that idea. It is impossible to resist a bill of this kind. It may be full of objectionable items; it may be said that a very large share of them will result in waste, and nothing but waste, but if there is sufficient support, if there are enough beneficiaries of this system, the bill goes through; and I think, Mr. President, it is high time that we should call a halt.

Two amendments, one of which was put on last year by the Senate and rejected by the House, and the other put on this year, are both in the right direction, because they look toward a more thorough and careful examination of and more discrimination in the selection of projects. I understand the main objection in the House to the amendment No. 77 was that it provides that the Secretary of War shall cause the Chief of Engineers to make an examination of all projects heretofore adopted, the further improvement of which is not desirable or the expenditure upon which is out of proportion to the benefit to be derived therefrom. There is no doubt that if a searching examination were made, many of these projects would be abandoned. We must face that question, and there is no one who has a project in which he is interested but who should be willing to have it reexamined to determine whether further expenditure is desirable.

Mr. POINDEXTER. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Ohio yield to the Senator from Washington?

Mr. BURTON. I have finished. I only desired to say a few words.

Mr. POINDEXTER. Mr. President, the amendment No. 77, offered by the Senator from Nevada [Mr. NEWLANDS], provides for a general and systematic survey of proposed waterway improvements and regulation throughout the country. Amendment No. 78 provides for coordination of the various departments of the Government connected with or concerned in waterway development and the cooperation of the Government with the various other parties, public and private, who are interested or concerned in the improvement and control of rivers.

The statement which has just been made by the Senator from Ohio [Mr. BURTON] indicates very forcibly the merit of these proposed amendments to which the Senator from Ohio says he has heretofore been opposed, but which he is now inclined to favor. The appropriation of millions of dollars to build levees on the lower Mississippi, a great alluvial stream, for the purpose of preventing the destruction of hundreds of millions of dollars of farm property by floods, when those floods could be controlled, in all probability, with little net cost, by a coordination of the entire Mississippi River system, so far as its improvement is concerned, by storing the flood waters at the head of its tributaries, is like the old system of medicine, of treating the symptoms of the disease instead of eradicating its cause.

If a private concern were the trustee for a great work such as the United States is engaged in, of the improvement of the rivers over a great continental domain such as is ours, there is no modern business institution which would treat it as a series of innumerable units, composed of congressional districts or of municipalities, urging upon the Representative from each district the improvement of some particular project, but the whole would be systematized. The experience of modern private business indicates that upon such a system and comprehensive coordination the capitalization could be increased 100 per cent in the saving, in economy of administration, and in the increased results of the work.

Mr. President, I am in favor of the passage of the bill, and, consequently, I expect to vote for it, regardless of the adoption or rejection of these amendments; but I take this occasion to say that I approve the amendments, and should like to see them adopted. I trust the Senator from Nevada will continue at every opportunity in the future, as he has with so much persistency in the past, to urge this great business reform in the conduct of the waterway interests of the Government.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, I do not intend to vote for the bill, but my opposition to it is based upon the error in what I believe to be the system itself. I do not believe that there ought to be any appropriation bill which combines appropriations for harbors and rivers. The problem of the development or maintenance of our harbors and the problem of improving the navigation or the commerce upon our rivers are different problems. I do not believe there ought to be money expended in the improvement of any river until a plan has been made and presented to Congress that will show that when the improvement is completed there can be and will be such cooperation—enforced cooperation, if you please—between the traffic upon the river and the traffic upon the land as will warrant the expenditure proposed.

The business to be done upon our inland rivers will never justify the appropriations we are making for their improvement, unless the plan includes the transfer of freight from the river bank to the railway station. It is utterly impossible to create great traffic upon our rivers unless this commerce can extend into the interior; and I, for one, do not believe in pouring out our money for the improvement of a river, the deepening of its channel, until it is known that the commerce that floats upon the river can find its way to the interior points over the railways of the country. We have never reduced these improvements to that system.

I believe in the amendment proposed by the Senator from Nevada [Mr. NEWLANDS]. The only objection I have to his amendment is that it does not go far enough. I think that there ought to be an intelligent consideration of the whole question; that river by river should be taken up, and that when we begin the improvement of a river we ought to know that the work will go constantly forward to its completion, without waiting upon the temper of Congress from session to session.

I can not give my support to this bill for the reasons I have stated. I do not criticize the individual appropriations, because I do not know whether or not they are warranted by the practice heretofore prevailing. My complaint is against the practice itself.

Mr. CLAPP. Mr. President, I merely want to say a word of congratulation to the Senator from Nevada [Mr. NEWLANDS]. It is true his amendment has not been kept in this bill, but I believe in the last few weeks he has made more progress with this work than he has in the two or three years preceding this session, and I believe he is to be congratulated.

Mr. JONES. Mr. President, I desire to say only a word. I am in favor of the substantial features of the amendment of the Senator from Nevada, but I do not feel justified in voting against the bill because they are not included in this conference report.

Mr. KENYON. Mr. President, I voted against the public buildings bill, and I shall vote against this bill, not only because it should embrace the amendments of the Senator from Nevada, and does not do so, but I think both bills are a bad example of the "pork-barrel" method of appropriation, and I am going to vote against such methods so long as I remain in the Senate.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Mr. President, there was a matter of very deep interest to me put on this bill in the Senate. It is on the bill no longer; but I am not the kind of a man who wants to deprive other people of having the benefits of the bill. I shall vote for the bill. I hope the next river and harbor bill, or some other legislation outside of the river and harbor bill, will contain something analogous to the proposition proposed by the Senator from Nevada. I think that will be better for the country, as I stated when I voted for his amendment.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President, I merely want to say that I heartily concur in every word and every sentence just expressed by the junior Senator from Iowa [Mr. KENYON].

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The hour of 2.30 o'clock having arrived, the vote will be taken. The question is on agreeing to the conference report.

Mr. CUMMINS. I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. NEWLANDS. Is it in order for me to move as a substitute that the report be disagreed to, and that these two amendments——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The only question before the Senate is, Will the Senate agree to the conference report? It can not be amended under the rule of the Senate.

The Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. BRIGGS (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the junior Senator from West Virginia [Mr. WATSON]. I transfer that pair to the junior Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. LIPPITT] and will vote. I vote "yea."

Mr. CHILTON (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the Senator from Illinois [Mr. CULLOM]. I transfer that pair to the senior Senator from Texas [Mr. CULBERSON] and will vote. I vote "yea."

Mr. DILLINGHAM (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the senior Senator from South Carolina [Mr. TILLMAN]; but I am informed that on this question, if present, he would vote "yea." Therefore I feel at liberty to vote. I vote "yea."

Mr. KERN (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the junior Senator from Kentucky [Mr. BRADLEY]. I transfer that pair to the Senator from Arizona [Mr. SMITH] and will vote. I vote "nay."

Mr. PAYNTER (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the senior Senator from Colorado [Mr. GUGGENHEIM]. In his absence, I transfer that pair to the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. OVERMAN] and will vote. I vote "yea."

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the Senator from Delaware [Mr. RICHARDSON]. I understand that if he were present he would vote as I will vote. I vote "yea."

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I have a general pair with the junior Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. CRANE]; but I am advised that if he were present he would vote "yea," so I will vote. I vote "yea."

Mr. SWANSON. I desire to announce that my colleague [Mr. MARTIN] is paired with the Senator from Utah [Mr. SUTHERLAND]. If he were present, he would vote "yea."

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

SATURDAY, March 1, 1913.

The House met at 10.30 o'clock a. m.

The Chaplain, Rev. Henry N. Couden, D. D., offered the following prayer:

Almighty God, our heavenly Father, let Thy spirit come mightily upon us to illumine our minds and cleanse our hearts from guile, that we may be with Thee in thought and purpose and have our portion with those who love God and their fellow men; that all our ways may be ways of pleasantness, and all our paths be paths of peace; for Thine is the kingdom, and the power, and the glory forever. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

Mr. HARDWICK. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of order that there is no quorum present.

The SPEAKER. The Chair hopes the gentleman will withhold that for a moment.

Mr. HARDWICK. All right, I will withhold it.

INTERSTATE SHIPMENT OF INTOXICATING LIQUORS—VETO MESSAGE.

Mr. CLAYTON. Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER. The Chair recognizes the gentleman from Alabama to call up the President's veto message.

Mr. CLAYTON. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House, on reconsideration, pass the bill (S. 4043) divesting intoxicating liquors of their interstate character in certain cases, the objections of the President to the contrary notwithstanding. I move the present consideration and passage of the bill.

Mr. HARDWICK. I make the point of order that that is not in order. The House does that automatically; but I make the point of order that there is no quorum present.

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. Mr. Speaker, I endeavored to get recognition when the question of the approval of the Journal was up, for the purpose of calling attention to an error in a roll call.

The SPEAKER. But the gentleman did not get recognition.

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. I ask unanimous consent.

The SPEAKER. The House can not do anything without a quorum when the point is raised.

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. Perhaps the gentleman will withhold his point.

Mr. HARDWICK. This will be in order as soon as we get a quorum.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Georgia makes the point that there is no quorum present. The Chair will count. [After counting.] One hundred and fifty-seven Members present, not a quorum.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Speaker, I move a call of the House.

The motion was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. A call of the House is ordered. The Doorkeeper will lock the doors, the Sergeant at Arms will notify absentees, and the Clerk will call the roll.

The Clerk proceeded to call the roll, when the following Members failed to answer to their names:

Aiken, S. C.	Ellerbe	Lever	Needham

The SPEAKER. Three hundred and eleven Members have answered to their names—a quorum.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Speaker, I move to dispense with further proceedings under the call.

The motion was agreed to; and the Doorkeeper was directed to open the doors.

STATEMENT OF VOTES.

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. Mr. Speaker, yesterday I was necessarily absent from the House attending the conference on the Indian appropriation bill, which lasted until after midnight last night. On page 4408 of the RECORD it shows that I was paired with the gentleman from Texas [Mr. STEPHENS] against the question of suspending the rules and disagreeing to the amendments of the Senate to the Agriculture appropriation bill. I want to say that if I had voted I would have voted for the motion, and that I was in favor of the Senate amendment in relation to migratory game birds.

On the motion of the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BURLESON] to suspend the rules on the District of Columbia appropriation bill and disagree to the Senate amendments with an amendment, the RECORD shows that I was paired as being opposed to the motion. That is correct. Had I been present, I would have voted against it. It shows the gentleman from Texas [Mr. STEPHENS] as being paired for the motion, and I understand he would have voted against it had he been present.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. Mr. Speaker, I indorse what the gentleman from South Dakota has said. Had I been present, I should have voted against the amendment offered by the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BURLESON].

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. Stuart, one of its clerks, announced that the Senate had insisted upon its amendments to the bill (H. R. 28775) making appropriations for sundry civil expenses of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1914, and for other purposes.

The message also announced that the Senate had passed with amendments bills of the following titles in which the concurrence of the House of Representatives was requested:

H. R. 28699. An act making appropriations for the support of the Military Academy for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1914, and for other purposes;

H. R. 27475. An act granting pensions and increase of pensions to certain soldiers and sailors of the Civil War and certain widows and dependent children of soldiers and sailors of said war; and

H. R. 28282. An act granting pensions and increase of pensions to certain soldiers and sailors of the Civil War and certain widows and dependent children of soldiers and sailors of said war.

The message also announced that the Senate had agreed to the report of the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 22526) to amend section 8 of an act entitled "An act for preventing the manufacture, sale, or transportation of adulterated or misbranded or poisonous or deleterious foods, drugs, medicines, and liquors, and for regulating traffic therein, and for other purposes," approved June 30, 1906.

The message also announced that the Senate had agreed to the amendments of the House of Representatives to the bill (S. 271) to authorize the collection of the military and naval records of the Revolutionary War with a view to their publication.

The message also announced that the Senate had passed the following resolution, in which the concurrence of the House of Representatives was requested:

S. J. Res. 164. Joint resolution stopping traffic and preventing interference with the suffrage procession.

DIVESTING LIQUORS OF THEIR INTERSTATE CHARACTER.

The SPEAKER. The Chair lays before the House the veto message of the President of the United States on the bill (S. 4043) to divest intoxicating liquors of their interstate character in certain cases.

The Clerk read the veto message.

[For veto message, see Senate proceedings of February 28, 1913.]

The SPEAKER. The Chair also lays before the House the resolution of the Senate.

The Clerk read as follows:

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES,
February 8, 1913.

The Senate having proceeded, in pursuance of the Constitution, to reconsider the bill entitled "An act to divest intoxicating liquors of their interstate character in certain cases," returned to the Senate by the President of the United States with his objections and sent by the Senate to the House of Representatives with the message of the President returning the bill.

Resolved, That the bill do pass, two-thirds of the Senate agreeing to pass the same.

Mr. HARDWICK. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. HARDWICK. Would it now be in order to have the opinion of the Attorney General read in connection with this?

The SPEAKER. It would not.

Mr. HARDWICK. Then I ask unanimous consent.

Mr. CLAYTON. I object.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Alabama objects.

Mr. CLAYTON. Mr. Speaker, I move on reconsideration to pass the bill S. 4043, the objections of the President to the contrary notwithstanding, and upon that I demand the previous question.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Alabama moves that on reconsideration the House shall agree to pass the bill S. 4043, the objections of the President to the contrary notwithstanding, and on that motion he moves the previous question.

Mr. BARTLETT. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. BARTLETT. If the previous question is ordered, will there be debate?

The SPEAKER. There will be 40 minutes debate, 20 minutes on a side.

The previous question was ordered.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Alabama has 20 minutes and the gentleman from Louisiana [Mr. DUPRÉ], the ranking member in opposition on the committee, will have 20 minutes.

Mr. CLAYTON. Mr. Speaker, I shall not undertake to say very much at this time on this subject. The debate on this important measure has been long and has been had, not only in the House, but in the Senate and in the committee rooms for years. This body quite understands the question from every viewpoint. Of course, Mr. Speaker, at this time no speech that any Member could make here would change a single vote. Everybody knows that. There is hardly any necessity now for any time to be given to debate.

Mr. Speaker, the President in his message admits, as I understand, from having heard it read, that the Supreme Court has never decided adversely to a measure like this, but many able lawyers think decisions made by that august tribunal from time to time can be quoted to sustain the constitutionality of the pending bill.

One of the latest utterances by the Supreme Court on the power to regulate interstate commerce, consistent with the contention of the friends of this measure that it is constitutional, is the case of Hoke against the United States, decided February 24, 1913.

As I view this question the bill is simply to allow the States to enforce their own police regulations. It is to go back to the ancient doctrine announced in Pierce versus New Hampshire more than 50 years ago, holding that under the police power of the State the State could regulate and control the matter of traffic in intoxicating liquors, according to the sovereign will of the State. That stood as the law of this country for nearly 50 years, and until the case of Leisy versus Hardin was decided, which specifically overruled it. That case led to the enactment of what is known as the Wilson law, and ever since the Wilson law was emasculated the effort has been made by the States, in furtherance of their police power, to let the State have the right to control the liquor whenever it reached the boundary of the State.

Mr. Speaker, while they talk about the history of the commerce clause of the Constitution, and that such clause of the Constitution was the result of a compromise between the States, and was one of the reasons for the formation of the Federal Union under the Constitution, let us not forget that the police power of the State is an older power than the commerce power of Congress, and that the States intended to reserve their police power. That this was intended is manifest from the Constitution, the dual scheme of government, and by the amendments adopted shortly after the ratification of the Constitution itself.

Mr. Speaker, the question here is, Shall this House—and I take it that this House will—pass this particular measure simply further to "remove (quoting the language of Chief Justice Fuller) the impediment to the enforcement of State laws in respect to imported packages in the original condition in the absence of specific utterances on the part of Congress," by now making a specific utterance that the importation of liquor into a State for illegal purposes is prohibited? Let those who believe that each State has a right to regulate its domestic affairs, to carry out its own internal policy, cast their vote for this measure, whereby the Federal Government is to take its protection away from those engaged in the wrongful traffic of selling liquor contrary to the law of the State.

It will be observed that in this case to which I referred, Hoke versus United States, the commerce clause was considered, and the Supreme Court said:

Congress is given power "to regulate commerce with foreign nations and among the several States." The power is direct; there is no word of limitation in it, and its broad and universal scope has been so often declared as to make repetition unnecessary. And, besides, it has had so much illustration by cases that it would seem as if there could be instance of its exercise that does not find an admitted example of some one of them. Experience, however, is the other way, and in almost every instance in the exercise of the power differences are asserted from previous exercises of it and made a ground of attack. The present case is an example.

This was a white-slave traffic case, and the act forbidding the traffic in white slavery was upheld. It was upheld under the commerce clause of the Constitution. It was decided that the transportation for illegal purposes of women by the interstate railroads was a violation of this law, and that the law was constitutional as a proper means for regulating such interstate traffic even to the extent of prohibiting such transportation of women for such purposes.

I quote further from this opinion:

There, in emphasis of the purpose of the law, we denominated adulterated articles as "outlaws of commerce" and said that the confiscation of them enjoined by the law was appropriate to the right to bar them from interstate transportation and completed the purpose of the law by not merely preventing their physical movement but preventing trade in them between the States.

And the same doctrine was announced in sustaining the pure-food law and the act regulating the transportation of nitroglycerine, the act forbidding the transportation of game birds, the quarantine act against diseased cattle, the act outlawing lottery tickets, and in other acts where Congress has legislated under the commerce clause of the Constitution. The power of Congress is ample in this respect, and here it is. Congress is asked here to say that it withholds the protection afforded by the commerce clause from intoxicating liquors imported into a State to be used in violation of the laws of that State. Will anybody deny that it is a good State rights doctrine to maintain that idea, and will anybody deny that the States in asking this legislation are asking legislation that will enable them to further protect the morals and the health of their citizens according to the ideas and law of each sovereign State?

Mr. Speaker, some gentlemen are very insistent that those who oppose this legislation possess all the reverence for the Constitution. Those of us who support this measure have as much respect for that great instrument as those gentlemen have. The reserved rights of the State are of as much constitutional concern or as much under the protection of the Constitution as the powers delegated to Congress. The tenth amendment of the Constitution says:

The powers not delegated to the United States by the Constitution, nor prohibited by it to the States, are reserved to the States, respectively, or to the people.

I reserve the balance of my time.

Mr. DUPRÉ. Mr. Speaker, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. STANLEY]. [Applause.]

Mr. STANLEY. Mr. Speaker, this bill is designed to prevent the shipment of alcoholic liquors into certain States and localities which have forbidden their importation or sale. To accomplish this purpose it is proposed that Federal control over such commodities shall cease and that they shall lose their status as articles of interstate commerce at the boundary lines of such States as have previously interdicted traffic in them, and that thereafter they shall be, while in transit as well as in the hands of the consignee, under the exclusive control of State or local authorities.

To do this it is necessary that the Federal Government shall be divested of the power to regulate such commerce and that the State governments be invested with the jurisdiction formerly exercised by Federal authority.

In so far as interstate commerce in alcoholic liquors is concerned, it will be subject not to any uniform regulation by Congress, but will be forced upon crossing State lines to comply with such conditions as 48 States are pleased to impose.

We are not left to conjecture, as to the effect upon interstate commerce of this delegation to the several States of the power to make their boundary lines barriers to commerce between them, and investing these Commonwealths with the power to halt and inspect such commerce at their borders for the purpose of excluding or confiscating articles considered injurious to the moral or physical well-being of their citizens.

This is not a matter of speculation, but of history. The States originally possessed this power, and only surrendered it after a long and sad experience in its exercise.

The Colonies having declared their independence became separate and distinct sovereignties, acknowledging no allegiance to the mother country and no binding or indissoluble bond among themselves.

The presence of a common enemy and a common danger compelled the formation of a loose league between these States and the organization of a central authority authorized to maintain an Army and Navy, to send and receive ambassadors, to coin money and regulate the value thereof, to establish a standard of weights and measures, and to exercise other functions now delegated to the Federal Government. This alliance, offensive and defensive, provided for the exigencies of war, but it failed to meet the demands of peace.

The Articles of Confederation centralized political power, but made no provision for industrial or commercial cooperation. Each State was free to exercise full and absolute control over trade and commerce within its borders. Embargo provoked embargo, and the industrial development of a Commonwealth was circumscribed by its boundaries. States industrially hostile could not in the nature of things long remain politically united.

In the language of Justice Johnson—

> "For a century the States had submitted with murmurs to the commercial restrictions imposed by the parent State; and now, finding themselves in the unlimited possession of those powers over their own commerce which they had so long been deprived of, and so earnestly coveted that selfish principle which, well controlled, is so salutary, and which, unrestricted, is so unjust and tyrannical, guided by inexperience and jealousy, began to show itself in iniquitous laws and impolitic measures, from which grew up a conflict of commercial regulations, destructive of the harmony of the States and fatal to their commercial interests abroad. This was the immediate cause that led to the forming of a convention." (Gibbons v. Ogden, 9 Wheat., 224.)
> "It was the want of any power to regulate commerce as between the States themselves and with foreign nations which as much—and I am not sure but I am justified in saying more—than any one thing forced the States to form the present Constitution in lieu of the Articles of Confederation, under which they had won their freedom and established their independence." (Justice Miller's Lectures on the Constitution, p. 433.)
> "It is a matter of history that one of the great objects of the formation of the Constitution was to secure uniformity of commercial regulations, and thus put an end to restrictive and hostile discriminations by one State against the products of other States and against their importation and sale." (Bowman v. Chicago, etc., Railway Co., 125 U. S., 508.)
>
> "The oppressed and degraded state of commerce previous to the adoption of the Constitution can scarcely be forgotten"—

Says Chief Justice Marshall—

> "* * * Those who felt the injury arising from this state of things and those who were capable of estimating the influence of commerce on the prosperity of nations perceived the necessity of giving the control over this important subject to a single government. It may be doubted whether any of the evils proceeding from the feebleness of the Federal Government contributed more to that great revolution which introduced the present system than the deep and general conviction that commerce ought to be regulated by Congress. It is not, therefore, a matter of surprise that the grant should be as extensive as the mischief and should comprehend all foreign commerce and all commerce among the States." (Brown v. Maryland, 12 Wheat., 446.)
> "Few things are better known"—

Says Daniel Webster—

> "than the immediate causes which led to the adoption of the present Constitution; and he thought nothing clearer than that the prevailing motive was to regulate commerce, to rescue it from the embarrassing and destructive consequences resulting from the legislation of so many different States and to place it under the protection of a uniform law. The great objects were commerce and revenue; and they were objects indissolubly connected. By the Confederation divers restrictions had been imposed on the States, but these had not been found sufficient. No State, it was true, could send or receive an embassy nor make any treaty, nor enter into any contract with another State or with a foreign power, nor lay duties interfering with treaties which had been entered into by Congress. But all these were found to be far short of what the actual condition of the country required. The States could still, each for itself, regulate commerce, and the consequence was a perpetual jarring and hostility of commercial regulation. * * * The resolutions of Virginia, in January, 1786, which were the immediate cause of the convention, put forth this same great object. Indeed, it is the only object stated in those resolutions. There is not another idea in the whole document. The entire purpose for which the delegates assembled at Annapolis was to devise means for the uniform regulation of trade. They found no means but in a general government, and they recommended a convention to accomplish that purpose. Over whatever other interests of the country this Government may diffuse its benefits and its blessings it will always be true, as a matter of historical fact, that it had its immediate origin in the necessities of commerce and for its immediate object the relief of those necessities by removing their causes and by establishing a uniform and steady system. * * *
> "We do not find in the history of the formation and adoption of the Constitution that any man speaks of a general concurrent power in the regulation of foreign and domestic trade as still residing in the States.
>
> "The very object intended, more than any other, was to take away such power. If it had not so provided, the Constitution would not have been worth accepting." (From Webster's argument in Gibbons v. Ogden, 9 Wheat., pp. 11–13.)
> "If there was any one object riding over every other in the adoption of the Constitution, it was to keep the commercial intercourse among the States free from all invidious and partial restraints." (Gibbons v. Ogden, p. 231.)

The Articles of Confederation created a dead political bond between States politically united but industrially divided. There was no autonomy, no industrial union. Each State had the right to levy such imposts and prescribe such conditions as pleased it upon commerce entering its borders. The boundary lines of the States became impenetrable barriers to the course of trade. In order that we might have a vital industrial and commercial Union, in order that the States might be united in aspiration and in interest as well as in political destiny, the Constitution of the United States was ordained and established. First of all, to Congress, and to Congress alone, was given the absolute, supreme, and exclusive control and direction of commerce between the several States and foreign nations. That, Mr. Speaker, was the keystone of the arch; yea, more, it was the arch itself. Around the interstate-commerce clause of the Constitution cluster all other provisions, and, as we have seen, the Supreme Court decisions are replete with references to the fact that the Constitution itself was ordained, that the convention at Annapolis was called for one purpose, one all-compelling purpose, and that was forever to obliterate, forever to remove from the course of commerce any and every barrier that any State might attempt to erect.

To erect State barriers to interstate commerce, to impede and harrass it by hostile and conflicting regulations, is to return to the very condition which prevailed prior to the adoption of the Constitution, to restore the ills that great instrument was ordained to cure, and to reestablish the conditions it was designed to destroy.

Mr. Speaker, this is not the first time Congress has been asked to reinvest the States with powers delegated by them to the Federal Government. It is exceptional only in this, that in recent years only has such a proposal found serious or favorable consideration by men mindful of their duty to obey and sustain the Constitution of the United States, and to preserve and safeguard the freedom of commerce between the States.

A measure identical in purpose and character was offered by Calhoun in the Twenty-fourth Congress. On June 8, 1836, he introduced in the Senate a bill providing that there should not thereafter be transported into any State any book or paper of an incendiary character touching the question of chattel slavery, and that it should be unlawful, knowingly, to deliver to any person whatever any pamphlet, newspaper, handbill, or other printed paper or pictorial representation touching the subject of slavery "when by the laws of said State, District, or Territory, their circulation was prohibited."

The manifest unconstitutionality of this attempt to turn over to the States the exercise of the control of commerce or the mails, previously exclusively vested in Congress, was earnestly maintained by Benton, Davis, Webster, and Clay.

Henry Clay in the course of a fierce assault upon such legislation, which he characterized as "unauthorized" and "dangerous," declared:

> "But he wanted to know whence Congress derived the power to pass this law. It was said that it was to carry into effect the laws of the States. Where did they get such authority? He thought that their only authority to pass laws was in pursuance of the Constitution; but to pass laws to carry into effect the laws of the States was a most prolific authority, and there was no knowing where it was to stop; it would make the legislation of Congress dependent upon the legislation of 24 different sovereignties. He thought the bill was of a most dangerous tendency. The Senator from Pennsylvania asked if the post-office power did not give them the right to regulate what should be carried in the mails. Why, there was no such power as that claimed in the bill; and if they passed such a law it would be exercising a most dangerous power. Why, if such doctrine prevailed the Government might designate the persons or parties or classes who should have the benefit of the mails, excluding all others."

Mr. Speaker, were it possible to turn over to the States the arbitrary control of commerce in one commodity and to reserve to the Federal Government the unimpaired power to regulate it in all others, I might waive my inveterate opposition to this measure, but in the words of Henry Clay:

"There is no knowing where it is to stop"—

Or of Portia—

> "'Twill be recorded for a precedent,
> And many an error by the same example
> Will rush into the State."

In the language of Chief Justice Fuller in the Knight case:

> "Acknowledged evils, however grave and urgent they may appear to be, had better be borne than the risk be run in the effort to suppress them of more serious consequences by resort to expedients of even doubtful constitutionality."

If a State, by virtue of an act of Congress, can assume control over one article of commerce, can at its will confiscate or exclude it, then it can by the same means assume control or prescribe regulations for the exclusion of any other article.

The one vital question is, Can Congress refuse to exercise a uniform control over any article of interstate commerce? Can it remove its protection from any part? If so, then it can remove it from every part.

It is idle to assert to any lawyer that you can intrust to a State the right to exclude one commodity for a good purpose while withholding from it the power to exclude another for a bad purpose.

"Of course"—

Says Daniel Webster—

> "there is no limit to the power to be derived from the purpose for which it is exercised. If exercised for one purpose, it may be exercised for another. No one can inquire into the motives which influence sovereign authority." (Gibbons v. Ogden, 9 Wheat., 23.)

"Questions of power"—

Says Chief Justice Marshall—

> "do not depend on the degree to which it may be exercised. If it may be exercised at all, it must be exercised at the will of those in whose hands it is placed. * * * It will not meet this argument to say * * * that the good sense of the States is a sufficient guaranty against it. The Constitution has not confided this subject to that good sense. It is placed elsewhere. The question is, Where does the power reside? Not, How far will it probably be abused?" (Brown v. Maryland, 12 Wheat., 433–447.)

If one State can exclude articles containing alcohol, another can prohibit articles containing nicotine, and so on.

As stated in West v. Kansas Gas Co. (221 U. S., 229):

> "If one State has such a right, all States have it. Embargo may be retaliated by embargo, and commerce will be halted at State lines. And yet we have said that in matters of foreign and interstate commerce there are no State lines. * * * This was the purpose, as it is the result, of the interstate-commerce clause of the Constitution of the United States."
> "Can it be supposed"—

Says Justice Matthews—

> "that by omitting any express declarations on the subject, Congress has intended to submit to the several States the decision of the question in each locality of what shall and what shall not be articles of traffic in the interstate commerce of the country? If so, it has left to each State, according to its own caprice and arbitrary will, to discriminate for or against every article grown, produced, manufactured, or sold in any State and sought to be introduced as an article of commerce into any other. If the State of Iowa may prohibit the importation of intoxicating liquors from all other States, it may also include tobacco, or any other article, the use or abuse of which it may deem deleterious. It may not choose even to be governed by considerations growing out of the health, comfort, or peace of the community. Its policy may be directed to other ends. It may choose to establish a system directed to the promotion and benefit of its own agriculture, manufactures, or arts of any description, and prevent the introduction and sale within its limits of any or of all articles that it may select as coming into competition with those which it seeks to protect. The police power of the State would extend to such cases as well as to those in which it was sought to legislate in behalf of the health, peace, and morals of the people. In view of the commercial anarchy and confusion that would result from the diverse exertions of power by the several States of the Union, it can not be supposed that the Constitution or Congress have intended to limit the freedom of commercial intercourse among the people of the several States. 'It can not be too strongly insisted upon,' said this court in Wabash, etc., Railroad Co. v. Illinois (118 U. S., 557, 572), 'that the right of continuous transportation from one end of the country to the other is essential in modern times to that freedom of commerce from the restraints which the States might choose to impose upon it that the commerce clause was intended to secure. This clause giving to Congress the power to regulate commerce among the States and with foreign nations, as this court has said before, was among the most important of the subjects which prompted the formation of the Constitution.' (Cook v. Pennsylvania, 97 U. S. 566, 574; Brown v. Maryland, 12 Wheat., 419, 446.) And it would be a very feeble and almost useless provision, but poorly adapted to secure the entire freedom of commerce among the States, which was deemed essential to a more perfect union by the framers of the Constitution, if at every stage of the transportation of goods and chattels through the country the State within whose limits a part of the transportation must be done could impose regulations concerning the price, compensation, or taxation, or any other restrictive regulation interfering with and seriously embarrassing this commerce." (Bowman v. Chicago & North Western R. R. Co., 125 U. S. 493.)

FEDERAL CONTROL OF INTERSTATE COMMERCE SUPREME, EXCLUSIVE, AND INDIVISIBLE.

The transportation of a commodity from the consignor in one State to the consignee in another is one transaction and subject to the sole and exclusive control of the Federal Government.

The shipment may traverse 2 States or 10, but so long as any part of it is interstate every part preserves that status. In the nature of things, all commerce between the States is at some time commerce within a State.

If each State can subject commerce entering its territorial limits to the same restrictions as commerce originating and ending within them, then there is left no such thing as interstate commerce.

"If"—

Says Marshall—

"Congress has power to regulate it, that power must be exercised whenever the subject exists. * * * This principle is, if possible, still more clear when applied to commerce 'among the several States.' They either join each other, in which case they are separated by a mathematical line, or they are remote from each other, in which case other States lie between them. What is commerce 'among' them, and how is it to be conducted? Can a trading expedition between two adjoining States commence and terminate outside of each? * * * The power of Congress, then, whatever it may be, must be exercised within the territorial jurisdiction of the several States." (Gibbons v. Ogden, 9 Wheaton, p. 196.)

A State's control of that part of interstate commerce which may chance to be within her territorial limits is no greater and no less than it is over any other part of it. It is true that a State may in the exercise of its police power exclude from its territorial limits certain harmful or unwholesome articles, but, as will be seen, such things are prohibited because, and only because, they are not interstate commerce and form no part of it.

The character and extent of the Federal power over interstate commerce was exhaustively analyzed and defined by Chief Justice Marshall in the first great decision rendered upon this subject.

The State of New York had granted to Robert Fulton and Robert R. Livingston an exclusive right to license vessels propelled by steam upon waters within the boundaries of that State. The importance of the grant and the illustrious character of the litigants alike attracted the widest attention. Both parties to the controversy were represented by the ablest jurists of that day. Wirt wrote to his friend Judge Carr:

"About to-morrow week will come on the great steamboat question from New York. Emmett and Oakley are on one side, Webster and myself on the other. Come down and hear it. Emmett's whole soul is in the case, and he will stretch all his powers. Oakley is said to be one of the first logicians of the age, as much a Phocian as Emmett is a Themistocles, and Webster is as ambitious as Cæsar. He will not be outdone by any man if it is within the compass of his power to avoid it. It will be a combat worth witnessing."

Every argument which has been advanced by the proponents of this bill—claiming for a State the constitutional right to regulate or control commerce within its borders—was elaborated by learned and ingenious counsel in this case. It was claimed that the State of New York could regulate the use of steam upon vessels operated entirely within the territorial boundaries of that State; that since this agency was dangerous to human life and property that, under her inspection and police powers, the State might determine what vessels and upon what conditions steam might be applied as a motive power; that the use of this new and perilous agency was controlled by State regulations binding upon all the citizens of that State, and that Congress could not confer greater powers upon persons living without the State of New York than were enjoyed by her own citizens; that there was no interference with interstate commerce, since there was no regulation of such vessels until after they were entirely within the jurisdiction of the State. It was a novel question then. This vital clause of the Constitution was for the first time to be exhaustively interpreted and the whole range of trade and commerce for the coming empire was swept by the wide and prophetic vision of the great justice.

"The opinion in this case is regarded as one of his (Chief Justice Marshall's) greatest judicial utterances. The path before him was untrodden by any Federal decision save his own in the Brig Wilson case, and the questions presented were of the most vital importance. His opinion, in which no authority was cited, was so able, so profound and masterful, that it announced the principle which all future decisions have followed." (Watson On the Constitution, vol. 1, p. 470.)

"We are now"—

Said the court—

"arrived at the inquiry, 'What is this power?' That question has been raised in the Supreme Court more than a thousand times since then, but the definition of John Marshall still remains unquestioned, complete and conclusive: 'It is the power to regulate. That is, to prescribe the rule by which commerce is to be governed. This power, like all others vested in Congress, is complete in itself, may be exercised to its utmost extent, and acknowledges no limitations other than are prescribed in the Constitution. * * * The power over commerce with foreign nations and among the several States is vested in Congress as absolutely as it would be in a single government, having in its constitution the same restrictions on the exercise of the power as are found in the Constitution of the United States.'" (Gibbons v. Ogden, 9 Wheat., p. 197.)

After a lapse of more than half a century Justice Lamar, in reviewing this great decision, declared:

"This line which separates the province of Federal authority, over the regulation of commerce, from the powers reserved to the States has engaged the attention of this court in a great number and variety of cases. * * * The decisions in these cases have almost uniformly adhered to the fundamental principles which Chief Justice Marshall, in the case of Gibbons v. Ogden, laid down as to the nature and extent of the grant of power to Congress on this subject and also of the limitations, express and implied, which it imposes upon State legislation with regard to taxation and to the control of domestic commerce and to all persons and things within its limits of purely internal concern. According to the theory of this great opinion, * * * the power expressly conferred upon Congress to regulate commerce is absolute and complete in itself with no limitations other than are proscribed in the Constitution; is to a certain extent exclusively vested in Congress, so far free from State action; is coextensive with the subject on which it acts and can not stop at the internal boundary of the State but must enter the interior of every State whenever required by the interests of commerce with foreign nations or among these several States." (Kidd v. Pearson, 128 U. S., p. 16.)

"It is"—

Said Justice Bradley—

"over the whole subject unimpeded and unembarrassed by State lines or State laws, and in this matter the country is one, and the work to be accomplished is national; State interests, States' jealousies, and State prejudices do not require to be considered. In matters of foreign and interstate commerce there are no States." (Stockton v. Baltimore, 32 Fed. Rep., p. 9; Lacy v. Hardin, 135 U. S., p. 108.)

This power was not only absolute and supreme but it was exclusive, to be exercised uniformly and universally, and to be exercised by the Federal Government alone.

No State can assume control over interstate commerce without exercising a forbidden and Federal prerogative.

"When a State proceeds to regulate commerce with foreign nations or among the several States, it is"—

Says Justice Marshall—

"exercising the very power that is granted to Congress and doing the very thing which Congress is authorized to do. * * * The sole question is, Can a State regulate commerce with foreign nations and among the States while Congress is regulating it? * * * The verb 'to regulate' implies in its nature full power over the thing to to be regulated. It excludes, necessarily, the action of all others that would perform the same operation on the same thing. That regulation is designed for the entire result, applying to those parts which remain as they are as well as to those which are altered, it produces a uniform whole, which is as much disturbed and deranged by changing what the regulating power designs to leave untouched as that on which it has operated." (Gibbons v. Ogden, 9 Wheat., 99, 200, and 209.)

"Whenever the law of the State amounts essentially to the regulation of commerce with foreign nations or among the States, as it does when it inhibits directly or indirectly the receipt of an imported commodity or its disposition before it has ceased to become an article of trade between one State and another, or another country and this, it comes in conflict with the power which in this particular case has been exclusively vested in the General Government, and is therefore void." (Leisy v. Hardin, 135 U. S., p. 123.)

"The interstate-commerce clause of the Constitution guarantees the right to ship merchandise from one State into another and protects it until the termination of the shipment by delivery at the place of consignment." (Heyman v. Southern Railway Co., 203 U. S., p. 244.)

The gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. WEBB] argues that the vesting in Congress of the control of all articles of interstate commerce necessarily implies the right to exercise so much of that control as it chooses, and that from the nature of the grant it can, with or without cause, "arbitrarily" withdraw its protection from any commodity that a State may choose to confiscate or exclude.

"If"—

Says the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. WEBB]—

> "Congress can arbitrarily prohibit the interstate transportation of all intoxicating liquors, then most certainly can Congress prohibit the shipment of any less portion of liquor or any kind or class of liquor for whatever reason it chooses to assign, or without giving any reason whatever. The larger power necessarily includes the smaller."

The gentleman attributes to Congress a kind of power never mentioned in the Constitution and never possessed or delegated by any State. He assumes without warrant of law or fact that because Congress has the supreme and exclusive power over interstate commerce, it has arbitrary power, and his whole argument is based upon this unwarranted assumption. If Congress possessed "arbitrary" power, and chose to exercise it arbitrarily, it could, I admit, make a commodity commerce in one State and contraband in another. It could exercise the whole or any part of the powers delegated, and exercise them directly or by proxy. Such a use or abuse of power is in its essence arbitrary. Arbitrary power was never invested in Congress by the Constitution, and arbitrary power can never be delegated by it to the States. The powers conferred upon Congress may be supreme or limited, exclusive or concurrent, but they are not arbitrary. Every power vested in the Federal Government is clearly defined by the organic law. It must be exercised as conferred, and not at the caprice of either the executive or the legislative branches of the Government. Arbitrary power may be exercised regularly or irregularly, uniformly or partially, upon the whole of the country's industries or any part; it may apply impartially to all citizens, or be made to operate as a bounty to a favored few and an intolerable burden to the numberless masses. Arbitrary power is the distinctive mark of the tyrant and of tyranny. "Life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness" and the security of property are guaranteed to the citizen only by the assurance that all the powers, great or small, vested in Congress must be exerted fairly, uniformly, impartially, and that neither in the Federal nor in the State Government is there one hint of any authority which may be exercised arbitrarily at the caprice either of any President, Congress, governor, or legislature.

Further elaborating the varied and irregular operation of this law, the gentleman from North Carolina says:

> "If a man has the right to cut down an entire tree, he has the right to remove a few limbs. * * * If Congress can arbitrarily prohibit the interstate transportation of all intoxicating liquors, then most certainly can Congress prohibit the shipment of any less portion of liquor. * * * The larger power necessarily includes the smaller."

That is to say, exclusive jurisdiction includes concurrent. The right to prescribe for a just and uniform regulation over the entire field of interstate commerce implies the power to exercise a partial and irregular control over the same territory cut by State lines into segments and unrelated units.

"But"—

Says Webster—

> "what is it that is to be regulated? Not the commerce of the several States, respectively, but the commerce of the United States. Henceforth the commerce of the States was to be a unit, and the system by which it was to exist and be governed must necessarily be complete, entire, and uniform. Its character was to be described in the flag which waved over it, E pluribus unum. Now, how could individual States assert a right of concurrent legislation in a case of this sort without manifest encroachment and confusion?"

All the great powers enumerated in the Constitution must be exercised uniformly or not at all. A partial exercise, a partial enforcement, is a perversion of the law, as illegal and as unauthorized as the assumption of authority for which there is no warrant whatever. Congress has power to levy taxes, but it can not tax one State and exempt another. It has power to coin money and regulate the value thereof, but it can not by virtue of this power coin one metal in one State and another in another, make gold a legal tender in one State and silver or copper in another, or delegate to the States the right to do so. Congress has full power over the naturalization of all citizens, but it does not follow that it can naturalize a part of the citizens upon one condition and another part of the citizens, alike in all respects, upon another condition. It can not make one person a citizen after five years' residence in Texas and naturalize another after two years' residence in New York. Congress can exclude obscene matter from the mails, but it can not make the same matter decent in Maine and indecent in Florida, any more than it can make alcohol a legitimate article of commerce in Ohio and contraband in Kentucky. The uniform exercise of a power is an essential, inherent, indestructible part of that power, and when you destroy its uniformity, when you destroy the fairness and equality of its operation, the power itself is void.

> "So long as the State legislature continues to recognize wines, beer, and spirituous liquors as articles of lawful consumption and commerce, so long must continue the duty of the Federal courts to afford such use and commerce the same measure of protection under the Constitution and laws of the United States as is given to other articles." (Scott v. McDowell, 165 U. S., 91.)

Congress can no more protect a given article as a legitimate subject of commerce in one State and declare it contraband and defenseless in another than it can protect the integrity of its coin in one State and not in another or the enforcement of one standard of weights and measures in one State and not in another. The great powers of Congress can not be cut into segments. They are units. Their indissolubility, their uniformity, is their essence. To dissever is to destroy them.

> "The subjects upon which Congress can act under this power are of infinite variety. Some of them are national in their character and admit and require uniformity of regulation affecting all the States. In this class is included all that operation of commerce with foreign countries or between the States which consists in the transportation, purchase, sale, and exchange of commodities. Here there can of necessity be only one system or plan of regulation and that Congress alone can prescribe. * * * There would otherwise be no security against conflicting regulations of different States, each discriminating in favor of its own products and citizens and against the products and citizens of other States. And it is a matter of public history that the object of vesting in Congress the power to regulate commerce with foreign nations and among the States was to insure a uniformity of regulation against conflicting and discriminatory State legislation." (County of Mobile v. Campbell, 102 U. S., p. 697.)
> "The object of vesting the power to regulate commerce in Congress was to secure uniform regulations when such uniformity was practicable, against conflicting State legislation." (Western Telegraph Co. v. Pendleton, 122 U. S., 358.)
> "This power to regulate commerce was given to Congress in comprehensive terms, and it was thus given, so far as it relates to commerce between the States, with the obvious intent to place that commerce beyond interruption or embarrassment arising from the conflicting or hostile State regulations." (Steamship Co. v. Port Railways, 6 Wall., pp. 32–33.)
>
> "The commerce clauses of the Constitution had their origin in a wise and salutary policy. They were intended to secure harmony and uniformity in the regulations by which they should be governed. The confusions and mischiefs that would ensue if this restriction were removed are too obvious to require comment." (Inman Steamship Co. v. Tucker, 94 U. S., p. 245.)
> "The power to regulate commerce among the several States was vested in Congress in order to secure equality and fredom in commercial intercourse against discriminatory State legislation." (Railroad Co. v. Richmond, 19 Wall., p. 589.)

If it was manifest to John Marshall in the infancy of the Republic that the industrial development and welfare of the Nation was dependent above all other things upon the absolute freedom of commerce among the States and the justice and uniformity of its regulation, how infinitely more necessary is it now. Then there were 13 Colonies, sparsely populated, separated one from another by mountain ranges and the vast stretches of an unpeopled wilderness. The locomotive and the telegraph were unknown. Trade between these Commonwealths was confined to a few navigable streams or found its slow and tedious course over dirt roads and mountain trails. To-day these Commonwealths are ribbed by 200,000 miles of railroad, laced in every part by quivering fibers of copper and steel. We have articulated this exquisite system, intricate in its structure, vast in its extent, mighty in its power, embracing the land, the rivers, and the sea, riveted together these States by bolts of iron stronger than any political bond. These Commonwealths are and forever shall remain an industrial union, one in aspiration, in industry, and in commerce. To protect and develop that commerce we have deepened channels, bridged estuaries, dammed rivers, dredged harbors, dug canals across continents. This system is in its power and perfection a living, throbbing thing, and through its vast industrial arteries the produce of toiling millions and the necessaries and comforts of their daily life are borne swiftly to every part.

Now, we are told that the power to create implies the power to destroy, that they who were directed by the mandate of the Constitution to ordain and assemble this vast and splendid commerce were by the same instrument permitted at the caprice of any State to mutilate and dissever it, and that we may at will re-create and restore the very conditions the Constitution was ordained to inhibit and prevent. [Applause.] I do not believe that there is vested in Congress the right to cut the nerves this clause has created, to rend the sinews it has strengthened, to ligate the arteries now swollen and pulsating with the produce to 90,000,000 of people, the necessaries of their lives and the products of their toil [applause], and to consign to atrophy and decay the industrial energies of an empire. I do not believe that in that sense the whole is equal to all of its parts, that you can sever and dismember this thing and then call the mangled and disconnected remains the same symmetrical commercial body this clause has created. [Applause.]

We may not now under the hollow guise of State regulation divide and dissever the whole commercial structure without wrecking the uniform and harmonious creation designed by the fathers, described by Daniel Webster, and preserved by John Marshall. The interstate-commerce clause of the Constitution in its last analysis is something more than the sum total of a conglomeration of confused and conflicting State regulations, into which it can be dissected without injury to commerce or outrage to the law.

CONGRESS CAN NOT INVEST A STATE WITH FEDERAL POWER, MUCH LESS "PERMIT" THE ARBITRARY OR PARTIAL EXERCISE OF SUCH AUTHORITY.

But, says Mr. Dinwiddie:

> "The beauty about this law, as Mr. Webb expressed it to me the other day, is that it expands and contracts with the legislation of the State."

I can not comprehend the delight of the gentleman at the handiwork of the gentleman from North Carolina, who has succeeded in giving this chameleon-like quality to what I had considered a fixed and immutable clause of the Constitution of the United States, that instrument which was ordained to provide an impenetrable barrier to all legislation contrary to its provisions, now "contracts and expands" not at the will of Congress but at the whim of any State legislature which may choose to enlarge or restrict its powers. Mr. Dinwiddie shows an exact knowledge of the scope and operation of this law shared by few of my colleagues on this floor.

The gentleman from Alabama [Mr. CLAYTON] informs us:

> "The purpose (of this bill) is to take the protecting arm of the Federal Government, by virtue of the interstate-commerce clause of the Constitution, from around the illicit dealers in liquors, and is to allow the States, which have passed police regulations restricting or forbidding the sale of liquor to better enforce those regulations. * * * It will permit the State to seize such liquor, intended to be sold or otherwise used in violation of law, before it reaches the hands of the consignee."

If the Federal Government has no authority to control interstate commerce except by a uniform regulation, if it can not give to an article of interstate commerce one status in one State and another in another, it goes without saying that it can not delegate to a State a power which it could not itself have exercised. But even if Congress had, as the gentleman from South Carolina contends, "an arbitrary power" over interstate commerce, it could not delegate such power to a State. This law, in the language of the gentleman from Alabama, "permits" the States to do certain things. But Congress can not "permit" a State to do anything which requires the exercise of Federal power.

If Congress could "permit" the States to exercise one Federal function, it could another. It has the same warrant for "permitting" a State to maintain a navy, or to coin money, or to make a treaty as it has to "permit" it to regulate interstate commerce.

As stated by Mr. Chief Justice Taney in the License cases (5 How., 580):

> "But it is equally clear that as to all future laws by the States, if the Constitution deprives them of the power of making any regulations on the subject, an act of Congress could not restore it.
> "For it will hardly be contended that an act of Congress can alter the Constitution and confer upon a State a power which the Constitution declares it shall not possess. And if the grant of power to the United States to make regulations of commerce is a prohibition to the States to make any regulation upon the subject Congress could no more restore to the States the power of which they were thus deprived than it could authorize them to coin money, or make paper money a tender in the payment of debts, or to do any other act forbidden to them by the Constitution."

As stated by the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. CLAYTON], you "take the protecting arm of the Federal Government, by virtue of the interstate-commerce clause of the Constitution, from around" this commerce in order that the State may control a traffic formerly regulated by the Federal Government. But you can not "take away" any power vested in the Federal Government by the express terms of the Constitution, except by an amendment to that Constitution.

If the right is admittedly derived from the Constitution, it can not be affected by an act of Congress. The Constitution would indeed be a "rope of sand" if powers solemnly delegated by it to the Federal Government were secure only so long as it did not happen to please Congress to "take them away."

But you propose more than that. After this power is "taken away" from the Federal Government it is to be conferred upon the State, and the State is to be "permitted" to take control of commerce about which the Federal Government alone had thrown "its protecting arm" by virtue of a complete and exclusive jurisdiction exercised by virtue of an express provision of the Constitution itself.

> "It will hardly be contended that an act of Congress can alter the Constitution and confer upon the State power which the Constitution declares it shall not possess." (Chief Justice Taney in the License cases, 5 How., 580.)

The very statement of the case demonstrates its manifest and absolute unconstitutionality. As stated in Hall v. De Cuir (95 U. S., 57):

> "That power [over interstate commerce] is by the Constitution vested exclusively in Congress, as appears by the Constitution itself, and by an unbroken course of decisions of this court covering a period of more than half a century."
> "Now, it is a principle which can not be too often brought into view or enforced, that Congress can not delegate to State legislatures the exercise of powers which were given to it exclusively." (Argument of Emmett in Gibbons v. Ogden, 9 Wheat., 117.)

The State can not take such control until, by virtue of the "permission" given in this bill its power over interstate commerce has been enlarged. Yet the Supreme Court has emphatically declared:

> "It does not admit of argument that Congress can neither delegate its own powers nor enlarge those of a State." (In re Rahrer, 140 U. S., 560.)

INTERSTATE COMMERCE IN ALCOHOLIC LIQUORS NOT SUBJECT TO THE POLICE POWERS OF A STATE.

It is asserted that intoxicating liquors are injurious to the citizen morally and physically, and that a State in the proper exercise of its police powers can prevent the introduction of an article productive of disorder, disease, and pauperism. Or as stated by the gentleman from Texas [Mr. HENRY]:

> "The States of the Union may exercise their sovereign power—the power they never surrendered. They retained the right to control the liquor traffic and to all matters of domestic concern within the scope of police powers."

Now, if it be true that a State, in the exercise of its reserved police powers, can take possession and control of liquors while in transit from a point in one State to their destination in another, then this law is unnecessary. The police power of a State is not determined by Federal legislation. Congress can neither enlarge nor restrict it. Such power as the gentleman suggests was reserved, inherent. Never having been delegated to the Federal Government, it can not be conferred by it. In the nature of things it is absurd and impossible to attempt by an act of Congress to strengthen a power inherent in a State or to "permit" the State to exercise it.

As stated by Chief Justice Fuller (in re Rahrer, 140 U. S., 554):

> "The power of the State to impose restraints and burdens upon persons and property in conservation and promotion of the public health, good order, and property, is a power originally and always belonging to the States, not surrendered by them to the General Government nor directly restrained by the Constitution of the United States and essentially exclusive."

There is no conflict of authority between the police power of a State to protect its citizens from unwholesome substances or objects liable to spread contagious disease and the power of Congress to regulate commerce. The confusion of ideas and apparent conflict of authority is entirely due to a failure to clearly define the term "commerce." Many things may be transported from one place to another by an interstate carrier which are not commerce, and are not exempt from State supervision and control. Commerce between the States is confined to commodities of value legitimately subject to barter and sale, to property in some form.

If the thing carried is not property, is not intended or suitable for barter or sale, it is not commerce. Decayed meats, putrid and wholesome foodstuffs, vermin, noxious insects, rags infected with disease or poisonous germs are not legitimate subjects of barter and trade, are not property, and can not claim any protection as such in the channels of interstate or foreign commerce. Wild animals, such as birds killed out of season, can not be reduced to the status of property and are not articles of commerce. All such things are subject to the police power of the State, and the fact that they may happen to be on the cars or boats or in the possession of a carrier engaged in commerce among the States does not affect or lessen in any degree the State's jurisdiction over them.

In determining whether or not a State can seize a given thing at its border or exclude it from interstate commerce, we are met by a simple question not of law, but of fact.

If it is not a legitimate article of commerce, the State authorities can confiscate or destroy it. If it is such an article, it is exempt from such police power and beyond its control.

FEDERAL LIMITATIONS UPON POLICE POWER.

The determination of this question of fact must in the nature of things be left to the final determination of the Federal Government. Were the State vested with the unlimited and arbitrary discretion to declare what articles should be subject to its police powers and those powers in turn free from any limitation or control by the Federal Government, then the State could necessarily exclude any and all articles from interstate commerce which were in any way objectionable.

> "Can this exclusive State power be made to rest not on the fact of the state or condition of the article, nor that it is property usually passing by sale from hand to hand, but on the declaration found in the State laws and asserted as part of the State policy that it shall be excluded from commerce? * * * Can they declare that ardent spirits and wines are deleterious to morals and health and cease to be commercial commodities? * * * If this be the true construction of the constitutional provision, then the paramount power of Congress to regulate commerce is subject to a very material limitation, for it takes from Congress and leaves with the States the power to determine the commodities or articles of property which are the subjects of lawful commerce. Congress may regulate, but the States determine what shall or shall not be regulated. Upon this theory the power to regulate commerce, instead of being paramount over the subject, would become subordinate to the State police power. * * * The same process of legislation or reasoning adopted by the States and their courts could bring within the police power any article of consumption that the States wish to exclude, whether it might apply to that which was drunk or to food and clothing. * * * And it would be but another step to regulate real or supposed extravagance on goods and clothing." (Bowman v. Chicago, etc., R. R. Co., 125 U. S., 490.)

As stated by Mr. Justice Catron in the License cases (5 How., 576–577):

> "It has, indeed, been suggested that if a State deems the traffic in ardent spirits to be injurious to its citizens and calculated to introduce immorality, vice, and pauperism into the State it may constitutionally refuse to permit its importation, notwithstanding the laws of Congress; and that a State may do this upon the same principles that it may resist and prevent the introduction of disease, pestilence, or pauperism from abroad. But it must be remembered that disease, pestilence, and pauperism are not subjects of commerce, although sometimes among its attendant evils. They are not things to be regulated and trafficked in, but to be prevented, as far as human foresight or human means can guard against them. But spirits and distilled liquors are universally admitted to be subjects of ownership and property, and are therefore subjects of exchange, barter, and traffic like any other commodity in which a right of property exists."

This simple distinction between the things which are subject to the police power of the States and those which are not is clearly drawn in Bowman v. Chicago, etc., Railroad Co. (125 U. S., 490):

> "It has never been regarded as within the legitimate scope of inspection laws to forbid trade in respect to any known article of commerce, irrespective of its condition and quality, merely on account of its intrinsic nature and the injurious consequences of its use or abuse. * * * Doubtless States have the power to provide by law suitable measures to prevent the introduction into the States of articles of trade which, on account of their existing condition, would bring in the spread of disease, pestilence, and death, such as rags or other substances infected with the germs of yellow fever or the virus of smallpox or cattle or meat or other provisions that are diseased or decayed or otherwise, from their condition or quality, unfit for human use or consumption. Such articles are not merchandise; they are not legitimate subjects of trade and commerce. They may be rightly outlawed as intrinsically and directly the immediate sources of destruction to human health and life. * * * And here is the limit between the sovereign power of the State and the Federal power. That is to say that which does not belong to commerce is within the jurisdiction of the police power of the State, and that which does belong to commerce is within the jurisdiction of the United States, and to this limit must all the general views come."

If, then, alcoholic liquors are not legitimate objects of barter and sale under the laws of the United States, they can be excluded from interstate commerce without any further legislation; and if they are entitled to a status as property, and are so regarded by the Supreme Court, interstate traffic in them is not subject to the police power of a State, and this act can not make them subject, because Congress can not enlarge or extend in any way the police powers of any State.

But this question of fact is no longer left to our determination, if it ever was. The status of alcoholic liquors as legitimate commodities in interstate trade has been conclusively and repeatedly determined by the Supreme Court:

> "That ardent spirits, distilled liquors, ale, and beer are subjects of exchange, barter, and traffic, like any other commodity in which a right of traffic exists, and are so recognized by the usages of the commercial world is not denied." (Leisy v. Hardin, 135 U. S., 110.)

On November 13, 1911, Justice Lurton, in an exhaustive opinion, in which he discussed this exact question, i. e., the power of the State of Kentucky in the exercise of its police power to exclude or prevent the importation of alcoholic liquors into "dry" territory in that State, declared:

> "By a long line of decisions, beginning even prior to Leisy v. Hardin (135 U. S., 100), it has been indisputably determined:
>
> "a. That beer and other intoxicating liquors are recognized and legitimate subjects of interstate commerce.
> "b. That it is not competent for any State to forbid any common carrier to transport such articles from a consignor in one State to a consignee in another.
>
> "c. That until such transportation is concluded by delivery to the consignee, such commodities do not become subject to State regulation, restraining their sale or disposition.
> "The Wilson Act, which subjects such liquors to State regulation, although still in the original packages, does not apply before actual delivery to such consignee, where the shipment is interstate. Some of the many later cases in which these matters have been so determined and the Wilson Act construed, are: Rhodes v. Iowa (170 U. S., 412), Vance v. Vandercook Co. (170 U. S., 438), Heyman v. Southern Railway (204 U. S., 270), Adams Express Co. v. Kentucky (214 U. S., 218).

"Valid as the Kentucky legislation undoubtedly was as a regulation in respect to intrastate shipments of such articles, it was most obviously never an effective enactment, in so far as it undertook to regulate interstate shipment to dry points. Pending this very litigation, the Kentucky court of appeals, upon the authority of the line of cases above cited, reached the same conclusion. (C. & N. O. Ry. v. Kentucky, 126 Ky., 563.)

"The obligation of the railroad company to conform to the requirements of the Kentucky law, so far as that law prohibited intrastate shipments, is clear, and to this extent its circular notification was commendable. But the duty of this company, as an interstate common carrier for hire, to receive for transportation to consignees upon its line in Kentucky from consignors in other States any commodity which, in an ordinary subject of interstate commerce, and such transportation, could not be prohibited by any law of the State of such consignee, inasmuch as any such law would be an unlawful regulation of interstate commerce not authorized by the police power of the State."

LEGISLATORS CAN NOT VIOLATE THE CONSTITUTION OF THE UNITED STATES UNDER THE SPECIOUS PLEA THAT THE SUPREME COURT WILL RIGHT THE WRONG.

It is not surprising, Mr. Speaker, that able jurists supporting this measure have expressed grave doubts as to its constitutionality. In discussing this bill in the Senate, on February 10, Senator BORAH said:

"I do not believe the second section of the bill is constitutional. * * * But I want to say, while I am on my feet, just a word in regard to the first section, and why I think in a general way it is not subject to the inhibition of the Constitution. It may not be and perhaps it is not wholly free from doubt, but I think the doubt should be resolved in favor of the bill, in view of the fact that it promotes wholesome legislation. In fact, if it were not for certain decisions of the Supreme Court I might have arrived at a conclusion that it would also be unconstitutional.

I can not subscribe to the doctrine that because so many good and sincere people favor this measure, believing it to be constitutional and actually calculated to prevent the illicit vending of intoxicating liquors, that I am justified in supporting it. This bill is the deliberate act of every man who votes for it. Can or will any Member of this House swear to support the Constitution of his country and then do a thing which may undermine and violate it, in the hope that subsequently it may fall into the hands of men less fearful of popular clamor and more vigilant and courageous in the discharge of their duties, who will undo the work we have done to-day? Are our oaths less binding, our duties less imperative, our responsibilities less grave, than those of a justice of the Supreme Court?

Mr. Speaker, the Chief Justice of the United States can with better grace mangle and surrender the Constitution of his country, at the command of good but misguided men, than can we. Every man is supposed to know the nature and effect of his own acts. We are here to pass laws which are calculated to preserve the Constitution, not those which may probably violate it. We are presumed to understand the organic law of the land, and we are sworn to obey it. An act of Congress is presumed to be constitutional, because it is not to be supposed that high officials will enter that foggy legislative domain which leaves them in doubt as to whether they are performing a sworn duty or just passing a very popular bill, the Constitution to the contrary notwithstanding. The deliberate assent by a legislator to a measure of doubtful constitutionality is in the nature of treason to the security and liberty of his countrymen. The Constitution is the palladium of the safety, freedom, and happiness of all. Better, far better, to heed the sage and solemn warning of Judge Cooley:

"Legislators have their authority measured by the Constitution; they are chosen to do what it permits and nothing more, and they take solemn oath to obey and support it. When they disregard its provisions, they usurp authority, abuse their trust, and violate the promise they have confirmed by an oath. To pass an act when they are in doubt whether it does not violate the Constitution is to treat as of no force the most imperative obligations any person can assume. A business agent who would deal in that manner with his principal's business would be treated as untrustworthy; a witness in court who would treat his oath thus lightly and affirm things concerning which he was in doubt would be held a criminal. Indeed, it is because the legislature has applied the judgment of its members to the question of its authority to pass the proposed law, and has only passed it after being satisfied of the authority, that the judiciary waive their own doubts and give it their support."

It was upon the assumption that no Congress would ever dare to favor any act of doubtful constitutionality, no matter how much it might be supposed to "promote wholesome legislation," that Chief Justice Marshall declared:

"It has been truly said that the presumption is in favor of every legislative act, and that the whole burden of proof is upon him who denies its constitutionality." (Brown v. Bowman, 12 Wheat., 436.)

There is more excuse for the timerous or corrupt judge, who, disregarding his oath, takes a chance on the violation of the constitution of his country, than for a Member of this body. The Supreme Court may assume that you have acted with a clear apprehension of the limitations of the Constitution. You are required to resolve all doubts against not in favor of the legality of your own acts. If you doubt the constitutionality of a measure you should so amend it as to remove that doubt, and if you can not so amend it you can not sanction it. You are sworn to preserve the Constitution, not to so legislate that you are probably supporting it. You are acting under the most sacred oath, you are discharging the most momentous and solemn obligation ever imposed upon mortal man. The "ark of the covenant" is in your keeping; disregard the stern inhibitions of that great instrument, and free government, self-government, has ceased to exist.

In what contempt do you hold a witness who under oath makes a statement while doubting its truth, in the hope that he may secure a judgment which will have a wholesome effect upon the community? Will you assume that by disregarding or destroying the constitutional limitations set upon the powers of the State or Federal Government you can write laws more wholesome than the Constitution itself? If you entertain any such delusion you are sworn not to indulge it.

Who can contemplate that great instrument without a feeling of reverence, of awe? In obedience to its sage provisions the fathers erected the most exquisite, the most perfect, and, may it please God, enduring edifice ever designed by the wisdom of man or dedicated to the liberties of his kind. It has maintained and preserved in concrete form the freedom proclaimed by the Declaration of Independence. Its authors translated the philosophy of Jefferson into law.

The sage of Monticello, with the audacity of genius, turned his back upon all the precedents and finespun fallacies of 4,000 years of civilization. He took a man, a simple citizen, endowed him with inherent and inalienable rights, clothed him with all power and authority, crowned him with a ballot, and the trembling monarchs of the world cowered before the towering creation of this mighty American.

An organized society was formed by having this citizen confer certain authority upon officers of the law, his servants, not his masters, commissioned for a fixed time to discharge specific duties necessary to protect and secure him in possession of property and the enjoyment of life and liberty. The total of the authority thus conferred became the Commonwealth when these Commonwealths, for the sake of mutual protection, "formed a more perfect union," the aggregate of the powers expressly delegated by the States, formed the Federal Government. The individual was surrounded by the precinct or township, the county, the State, the Nation, like so many concentric circles, and each in proportion of its nearness to the citizen was invested with the greatest possible jurisdiction. Each served a double purpose. It prevented the encroachment of one citizen upon the rights of another and presented between all and the ambition of a tyrant a series of stubborn barriers, each of which must be demolished before the liberties of a people could be engulfed in a compact Federal despotism.

This plan, original and sublime in its severe simplicity, crystallized into law, became the priceless legacy of succeeding generations, "the sheet anchor of our liberties," the Constitution of the United States.

Other lands may boast more fertile fields, richer mines, greater wealth, loftier mountains, and a wider domain. The happiness and the liberties of my country depend upon no material thing. Exile Americans from America, and again they will redeem the wilderness and erect a new Arcadia, if they still reverently bear beyond the seas inviolate and secure this immortal guaranty of their liberties. Violate it, trample under foot the Constitution of your country, and all your wealth; your mills and mines; your fields of cotton, corn, and grain; your great highways; your proud and populous cities; your vaunted and martial array upon the land and the sea will not save you from misery and oppression.

The Constitution is the only enduring barrier to the ambition of rulers, the arrogance of courts, the excesses of popular assemblies swayed by the passions and prejudices of the hour. It is the sanctuary to which endangered liberty must flee; and we, above all, are the sworn—yea, the solemnly ordained—priests in this sacred temple. It can not be endangered by bayonet thrust or cannon shot. It is preserved not by valor but by obedience. It is endangered not by violence but by perfidy. It is dependent upon the intelligence, the integrity, and the lofty patriotism of legislators sworn to protect and preserve inviolate the provisions of the organic law of the land.

For one, I will not give my assent to this thing which so many of you admit may deface or desecrate this holy temple. As for myself, Mr. Speaker, there is no uncertainty. I do not doubt, I do not suspect, I do not fear—I am assured of the unconstitutionality of this hybrid piece of congressional advice, half Federal and half State, so vague and flimsy in its provisions that its authors dare not give it strength and force by the imposition of a penalty, the one thing, according to Blackstone, which entitles any legislative act to the dignity of law, to obedience, or respect. And yet we are advised to close our eyes to its glaring defects, to shirk our high obligation, and let the Supreme Court pass upon this measure; that this is no concern of ours.

Mr. CLAYTON. Who said such a thing?

Mr. STANLEY. The gentleman from Alabama is too good a lawyer to voice such a sentiment, but we have heard it intimated in this House, and the sneering intimation is more contemptible than the bold assertion. [Applause.]

I say, sir, it is preposterous that we should delegate to another power, to another branch of this Government, the duty of determining the legality of our own acts. It is the code of a coward and the philosophy of a fool.

No sailor is permitted to tread the deck of a ship, no soldier to shoulder a musket, no officer of the law can be invested with authority until, solemnly and with uncovered head and uplifted hand, he has called God to witness that he will support and defend the Constitution of the United States. [Applause.]

I know the courage and the sacrifice of conscientious jurists here who vote against this measure. I know you will be exposed to the tender mercies of shrewd demagogues, who will denounce you as the apostles of lawlessness and debauch. But for one, Mr. Speaker, I am not prepared to commit perjury because it is popular. [Applause.] Not for all the honors and emoluments of office will I endure this pitiless self-abasement, go out into the solitude of the night and gaze into my own timorous and shrinking soul, knowing full well that in order to hold office, I have ceased to deserve it—in order to a little longer serve my country I have basely betrayed it. I am here prepared to do my duty as I see it and to sustain the veto of the President of the United States. [Applause.]

Mr. CLAYTON. Mr. Speaker, I now yield to the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. KENDALL]. [Applause.]

Mr. KENDALL. Mr. Speaker, I shall vote to pass this bill over the presidential veto, but I intend by that action no disparagement of the Chief Executive of the United States. I have heard it suggested by gentlemen on this floor that while they agreed to this measure when it was originally before the House, and while they still believe that the legislation it embodies is meritorious, they are now disinclined to array themselves in opposition to Mr. Taft. In my opinion, that position is too illogical to command serious attention. In withholding acquiescence in this bill, the President has discharged his duty as he conceives it. In favoring its enactment into law, his objections to the contrary notwithstanding, we are discharging our duty as we conceive it. [Applause.] I support this bill not alone because of the abuses it will prohibit, but because of the friends who have volunteered to advocate it, and the enemies who have appeared to antagonize it. I am not deceived as to its limitations. It will not effectuate all the reform that its sponsors hope, nor all the restraint that its critics fear. But I believe it will fasten another shackle upon the illicit traffic in intoxicating liquors, and that is sufficient for my purpose. It will not fatally cripple that traffic, but it will materially embarrass it, and I shall not allow the occasion to go unembraced to accomplish a result so salutary.

It is significant, Mr. Speaker, that in all the perfervid oratory which has been indulged, in all the insidious literature which has been circulated, in all the voluminous advertisement which has been negotiated, nobody has ventured to extenuate the saloon except as an agency of evil too formidable to be overthrown. This circumstance is not remarkable. As a national institution it is all liability and no asset. As a local enterprise it is all burden and no benefit. The American dramshop can not be defended upon any principle which appeals to the moral sensibility or the business intelligence of the community. It is a rebel against good government. It dictates nominations, purchases elections, corrupts the ballot, and falsifies the returns. It smirches the legislature, soils the executive, and stains the judiciary. It is the foe of organized society. It overawes the pulpit, undermines the platform, and subsidizes the press. It discredits the Constitution, despises the statutes, denounces the Congress, and derides the courts. It is the destroyer of domestic happiness. It brutalizes the husband, desolates the wife, debauches the son, and betrays the daughter. It is without concern for truth, without regard for honor, without reverence for virtue. It has no tolerance for church, no interest in school, no consideration for home, no expectation of heaven, no apprehension of hell. The patience of America is exhausted, and we shall temporize with the infamy no longer. All the manifold forces of sobriety, of decency, of respect for order, of loyalty to law, of love for mankind, are marshaling in invincible phalanx to pulverize the rum power. And they will eventually triumph, because their righteous warfare is sustained by the fervent hopes of all good men and sanctified by the holy prayers of all good women. I regret exceedingly to disagree with the President in the concluding hours of his administration. Upon all political issues I am disposed always to acknowledge allegiance to the leader of my party; but upon a moral question such as this I refuse to surrender my convictions to him or to any other man. [Applause.]

This measure has had elaborate examination in the Senate and in the House. It was discussed in both bodies or hours. Numerous amendments were proposed, some of which were adopted and some of which were rejected. There was no effort manifested to stifle debate, and the most abundant opportunity was afforded its opponents to demonstrate the inexpediency of the provision. It passed the House by a vote of 239 to 64 and the Senate by a vote of 61 to 23. It was transferred to the President and has been returned with his disapproval. It was reconsidered in the Senate and again received the sanction of that body by the decisive vote of 63 to 21. The sentiment of the country and of the Congress is overwhelmingly in favor of this legislation. [Applause.] The bill has failed of Executive indorsement because it has been condemned by the Attorney General as unconstitutional. Mr. Speaker, the day is approaching, and approaching rapidly, when the President of the United States will be stripped of the power to overrule the deliberate judgment of the people's representatives upon that venerable pretext. If this measure is of uncertain validity, there is a suitable tribunal organized and maintained to determine the fact—a tribunal before whose arbitrament every patriotic citizen of the Republic submits with absolute unreserve. If it offends against the organic law of the land, let the Supreme Court so declare. [Applause.]

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. KENDALL] has expired.

Mr. CLAYTON. Mr. Speaker, I now yield to the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. STEPHENS].

Mr. STEPHENS of Mississippi. Mr. Speaker, the President has vetoed the bill entitled "An act divesting intoxicating liquors of their interstate character in certain cases."

The text of the bill is as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the shipment or transportation, in any manner or by any means whatsoever, of any spirituous, vinous, malted, fermented, or other intoxicating liquor of any kind, from one State, Territory, or District of the United States, or place noncontiguous to, but subject to the jurisdiction thereof, into any other State, Territory, or District of the United States, or place noncontiguous to, but subject to the jurisdiction thereof, or from any foreign country into any State, Territory, or District of the United States, or place noncontiguous to, but subject to the jurisdiction thereof, which said spirituous, vinous, malted, fermented, or other intoxicating liquor is intended by any person interested therein, to be received, possessed, sold, or in any manner used, either in the original package, or otherwise, in violation of any law of such State, Territory, or District of the United States, or place noncontiguous to, but subject to the jurisdiction thereof, is hereby prohibited.

The measure had my support when it was originally before the House, and I shall take pleasure in voting now to pass it "the objections of the President of the United States to the contrary notwithstanding."

The bill simply prohibits the shipment of liquors into certain territory and under certain conditions. When it was on its passage in the House an amendment was offered by the gentleman from West Virginia [Mr. DAVIS], for which I voted, believing that it would be materially strengthened if a penalty were prescribed for a violation of the law.

The amendment referred to is in the following language:

Amend by adding, on page 2, line 12, after the word "prohibited," the following:

"And whoever shall knowingly ship, transport, or deliver to any common carrier for shipment or transportation, or shall knowingly cause, induce, or procure to be shipped, transported, or delivered to any common carrier for shipment or transportation from one State, Territory, or District of the United States or place noncontiguous to, but subject to the jurisdiction thereof, to any other State, Territory, or District of the United States or place noncontiguous to, but subject to the jurisdiction thereof, or from any foreign country into any State, Territory, or District of the United States or place noncontiguous to, but subject to the jurisdiction thereof, any spirituous, vinous, malted, fermented, or other intoxicating liquor of any kind, with intent to receive, possess, sell, or use the same therein, or to cause, induce, or procure the same to be received, possessed, sold, or used therein, either in the original package or otherwise, in violation of the laws of such State, Territory, or District of the United States or place noncontiguous to, but subject to the jurisdiction thereof, shall be fined not less than $100 nor more than $5,000 or imprisoned not less than 30 days nor more than 2 years, or both."

The veto of the President is based on the ground of the unconstitutionality of the measure. There is a wide difference of opinion among strong lawyers on this question. I shall not take time to go into a discussion of the legal questions involved, but will say that, in my judgment, it is constitutional.

It is admitted, of course, that the Federal Government has exclusive jurisdiction and control over interstate commerce, and that the States have no right or power to interfere with commerce of that character. It is also true that liquors have been held to be an article of commerce and that the States have no right to interfere with its shipment.

This is an attempt to regulate interstate commerce by Federal law. It does not involve regulation or interference by any State law. Its purpose is to prescribe the termination of an interstate transaction.

Under the law as it now is, an interstate shipment is not completed until it reaches the consignee. If Congress has the power—and it does have it—to regulate interstate commerce, why does it not have the power to prescribe the limits within which an article may retain such character? The power to regulate certainly includes the power to define limits beyond which the article shall no longer be a legitimate article of commerce.

Each State has the right to make its own laws on the subject of prohibition so long as there is no interference with interstate commerce. This bill recognizes that right, and its purpose is to enable the States more completely to regulate the sale and use of intoxicating liquors.

Justice Harlan said, in the Bowman case:

If, consistently with the Constitution of the United States, a State can protect her sound cattle by prohibiting altogether the introduction within her limits of diseased cattle, she ought not to be deemed disloyal to that Constitution when she seeks by similar legislation to protect her people and their homes against the introduction of articles which are, in good faith and not unreasonably, regarded by her citizens as "laden with infection" more dangerous to the public than diseased cattle, or than rags containing the germs of disease.

And he further said:

Does the mere grant of the power to regulate commerce among the States invest individuals of one State with the right, even without the express sanction of congressional legislation, to introduce among the people of another State articles which by statute they have declared to be deleterious to their health and dangerous to their safety? In our opinion, these questions should be answered in the negative.

If the State is given the right to prohibit the shipment of diseased hogs, horses, and cattle into its territory, and also to prohibit persons having infectious diseases from coming into the State, then why not give the State the further right to prohibit the shipment of liquors under the conditions and in the manner attempted here?

The liquor traffic is detrimental to society; it is dangerous to public and private morals; it is injurious to public health; it endangers public safety; it affects the public peace and the good order of society; it produces idleness, disorder, pauperism, and crime; it degenerates and debases man; it destroys the moral sense; it brings woe and misery, poverty and want, heartaches and disgrace, and finally damns to eternal death.

I can use no stronger language in condemnation of the evils of liquor than was used by a former governor of our State in a message to the legislature, in which he said:

If I were called upon to name the one thing that has wrought the most harm in the world, causes more poverty, heartaches, blighted lives, frustrated ambitions, than all other agencies for evil combined, I should say the intemperate use of intoxicating liquors. Whisky taken immoderately is hurtful to man physically, spiritually, mentally, and financially. It is an evil without a mitigating incident. It is the deadly drug into which the jewels of the heart's best love are dissolved and poured into the mouths of men to madden the brain and destroy the soul.

I saw a young man in the morning of life, with the sunshine of hope radiant upon his brow, with the pulses of youthful spring bounding in his veins, in the midst of a world of promise. Life to him was a fair prospect and hope sprang eternal in his breast. I saw him enter the saloon, drawn there by the siren song of temptation. The first drink of the seductive drug passed his lips. I saw the sparkle in his youthful eye turn to a stupid, leaden gaze. He came back from day to day, until the love for the accursed stuff had become a gnawing disease, against whose cravings he was absolutely helpless. The sun of hope and happiness had passed behind the cloud of dissipation and death ere it reached the meridian.

And I said the cause of this man's downfall should be removed. Anything that encourages excessive drinking, which leads to this unhappy end, is an enemy to society and ought to be exterminated.

I have heard a thousand arguments in favor of closing the saloon and not one legitimate argument in favor of it keeping open. Its influence is hurtful in politics. The blear-eyed, soaked-brain, soul-quenched habitues of these dens of iniquity are easy victims for the ward rounder and political bribe giver. They vote for the men who will not enforce the law, but who, like themselves, hold the love of drink and lawless power above the interests of their country.

The saloon is the enemy of Christian religion; it is the destroyer of the happy home; it fills jails with criminals, the insane asylums with lunatics, and the world with idiots and paupers. In a word, it stands for everything that is bad and against everything that is good. It is verily the Circean vortex from whose voluptuous whirl come human swine, to scatter the seeds of sin and death, from which will surely spring the tares of sunless sorrow.

I have said that it will be a pleasure for me to vote for this legislation.

One of the true joys of living comes from good conscience and the knowledge that a substantial affirmative effort has been made to advance the best interests of our fellow men; and I do not believe that action can be taken on any subject that can give us this good conscience and gratifying knowledge in such a high degree as that coming from an effort to destroy the traffic in intoxicating liquors.

Each of us is under an imperative duty to enlist in the great work of lifting up the human race to a higher and better life, and nothing, in my judgment, will so promote this work as will the giving of relief from the evils that flow from the whisky traffic.

A republic, "a government by the people," can be no better than the average of the men and women who give it concrete existence; therefore it is right and proper that we, as legislators, having in view the best interests of our Nation, should remove as far as we can everything that debases, demoralizes, and depraves our citizenship.

In my short service here I have favored measures to reduce the tariff, because the people have been robbed by iniquitous laws in the interest of the few and against the many; a measure to restrict immigration, in order that the great hordes of foreigners who have no true conception of our form of government and who have not been trained to respect law, order, and the highest ideals of civilization and Christianity, should be kept from our borders; a measure to abolish the cotton exchanges engaged in gambling and making an illegitimate profit out of the sweat and toil of the people of the great section of a Nation; measures in the interest of economy, because I believe that it is wrong to withdraw anything more from the pockets of our citizens than is absolutely necessary to defray the expenses of the Government economically administered, and many others that look toward relief for the people of the Nation; but I do not believe that any measure before this Congress is as important as legislation looking to the overthrow of the whisky trade.

This legislation is but a step in the right direction. It is a national disgrace that our Government should be in partnership with the whisky interests. A large part of the revenue is derived from money paid by the men engaged in this traffic. Our revenue should be derived from some other source, and the Government should no longer countenance it as a legitimate business.

The end of all worthy struggle is to establish morality as the basis of individual and national life; to make righteousness prevail; to make justice reign; to spread beauty, gentleness, wisdom, and peace; to widen opportunity; to increase good will; to move in the light of higher thoughts and larger hope; to encourage science and art; to foster industry and thrift, education and culture, reverence and obedience, purity and love, honesty, sobriety, and disinterested devotion to the common good. This is the patriot's aim; this his ideal.

This ideal can never be reached so long as the Government is in league with such a hurtful business. Whisky crushes manhood, it defiles the imagination, and binds debasing fetters upon every faculty of man's being. The usurping demon of appetite and passion puts forth all its cruel might, and if its use is continued will finally destroy the man who uses it.

There is nothing that better suits the malice of the power of darkness in carrying out the purpose of destroying mankind.

I pray that God may speed the coming of the day when instead of being an article of commerce whisky will be declared contraband and that the Government will on longer issue licenses for the sale of whisky. Whenever this is done I believe that the city will be more orderly and healthful, the country more beautiful and productive, the fireside more cheery and bright, and all the rights of man be held more sacred.

I trust that in my day I may see this great change wrought, and then where there are now in many a home tears, sorrow, and sadness there will be in their stead laughter and songs and shouts of gladness.

I trust that the President's veto will be overridden. [Applause.]

Mr. CLAYTON. How many more speeches has the gentleman from Louisiana [Mr. DUPRÉ] on his side?

Mr. DUPRÉ. Three more.

Mr. CLAYTON. I have only two more, and I wish the gentleman would use some of his time.

Mr. DUPRÉ. I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN].

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I yield two minutes to the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. BARTHOLDT].

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Missouri [Mr. BARTHOLDT] is recognized for two minutes.

Mr. BARTHOLDT. Mr. Speaker, the lucid legal argument of the President makes it entirely plain to the membership of this House that we can not override his veto without at the same time overriding the Constitution of the United States. I am not a constitutional lawyer, Mr. Speaker, but if I were I would perhaps be more strongly inclined to support the President, because I would better understand and appreciate the reasons he gives why this bill is unconstitutional.

Mr. Dinwiddie and the lobby which is now crowding the corridors of this Capitol have not sworn by a solemn oath to support the Constitution. I have. The people at a greater distance who are clamoring for this legislation are not bound by an official oath to support the Constitution. I am. And, Mr. Speaker, it has been the proud boast of the naturalized citizens of this country, of whom I am one, and against whom Members have inveighed recently in discussing the immigration bill—it has been their proud boast that at all critical periods of our history they have been steadfastly loyal to the institutions of the country and to the Constitution. I would be unfaithful to that history if, upon this solemn occasion, I voted to violate the Constitution of the United States in spite of the official oath I have taken solemnly at the Speaker's desk. [Applause.]

It will be conceded, I trust, that it is now no longer a question of prohibition or no prohibition. The question is rather, Shall the Constitution of the country be upheld or not? To vote for the pending measure, the objections of the President to the contrary notwithstanding, means to put political considerations above the oath of office and above the Constitution of the United States. And I venture to say, whether the majority will agree with me or not, when Members, from whatever motives, are willing to adopt such a course, then a most dangerous stage of our history has been reached, namely, the point when the Constitution is no longer safe in the hands of those who have sworn to support and defend it and when a majority proceeds to set at naught the fundamental law of the country.

For one, Mr. Speaker, I propose to obey the injunction of the western poet, who says:

"Stand by the Constitution, men—
The Nation's Constitution—
It is our "Ark of Safety," men,
Our sacred institution.

In conclusion, permit me to read an editorial from to-day's New York World. It is as follows:

A RIGHTEOUS VETO.

The liquor bill which President Taft vetoed yesterday was a weak and cowardly measure. It was passed by Congress in response to a demand that the Nation come to the assistance of the States which have adopted prohibition. It was weak and cowardly, because practically every man who voted for it knew it was of dubious constitutionality and because, even if it were constitutional, it used the Federal power to bolster up State laws which most of those who passed them did not expect to obey.

Like the bill abolishing the Army canteen, it was supported by Members of Congress who did not have the courage to stand for the right. In this case Congress dodged the issue openly, in the belief that the President would meet a situation which it lacked the courage to face.

The boldness with which Mr. Taft killed this humbug shows that this confidence was not misplaced, but no credit attaches to anybody else.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman has expired. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] is recognized for three minutes.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, my distinguished friend from Alabama [Mr. CLAYTON] referred to the decisions of the Supreme Court in the white-slave case and in the pure-food case. I had the honor to draw the white-slave law, and, in the main, the pure-food law; but the principles involved in those laws are entirely different from the principle involved in the pending measure. Those laws provided for the General Government exercising its power over the commerce between the States. The pending proposition provides for the General Government refusing to exercise its power over that commerce and relegating it to the States.

I am in sympathy with the purposes, in the main, of the gentlemen who favor this measure. I voted for it when it passed the House. But it seems to me that the veto message of the President raises such grave constitutional questions, not merely as to the exercise by Congress of the power in this measure, but as to the future exercise of the power of Congress, under the commerce clause of the Constitution, as to all commerce between the States, that it ought to receive further deliberate consideration by a future Congress before Congress shall have determined what it may do under this commerce clause in depriving itself of the power to regulate commerce between the States and relegate that power to the States themselves.

I therefore shall vote to sustain the veto of the President. [Applause.]

I insert herewith, under leave, the opinion of the court on the Mann Act, as follows:

Supreme Court of the United States.

(No. 381.—October term, 1912.)

Effie Hoke and Basile Economides, Plaintiffs in Error, v. The United States. In error to the District Court of the United States for the Eastern District of Texas. February 24, 1913.

Mr. Justice McKenna delivered the opinion of the court.

Error to review a judgment of conviction under the act of Congress of June 25, 1910, entitled "An act to further regulate interstate and foreign commerce by prohibiting the transportation therein for immoral purposes of women and girls, and for other purposes." (36 Stat., 825.) It is commonly known as the white slave act.

The constitutionality of the act was assailed by demurrer, and as its sufficiency otherwise was not questioned a brief summary of its allegations is all that is necessary.

The charge against Effie Hoke is that she "did, on the 14th day of November, A. D. 1910, in the city of New Orleans and State of Louisiana, unlawfully, feloniously, and knowingly persuade, induce, and entice one Annette Baden, alias Annette Hays, a woman, to go from New Orleans, a city in the State of Louisiana, to Beaumont, a city in the State of Texas, in interstate commerce, for the purpose of prostitution," etc.

The charge against Basile Economides is that he "did unlawfully, feloniously, and knowingly aid and assist the said Effie Hoke to persuade, induce, and entice the said Annette Baden * * * to go in interstate commerce * * * for the purpose of prostitution," with the intent and purpose that the said woman "should engage in the practice of prostitution in the said city of Beaumont, Tex."

The second and third counts make the same charge against the defendants as to another woman, the one named in the third count being under 18 years.

The demurrers were overruled, and after trial the defendants were convicted and sentenced, each to two years imprisonment on each count. (187 Fed., 992.)

The indictment was drawn under sections 2, 3, and 4 of the act, which sections are as follows:

"SEC. 2. That any person who shall knowingly transport or cause to be transported, or aid or assist in obtaining transportation for, or in transporting, in interstate or foreign commerce, or in any Territory or in the District of Columbia, any woman or girl for the purpose of prostitution or debauchery, or for any other immoral purpose, or with the intent and purpose to induce, entice, or compel such woman or girl to become a prostitute or to give herself up to debauchery, or to engage in any other immoral practice; or who shall knowingly procure or obtain, or cause to be procured or obtained, or aid or assist in procuring or obtaining, any ticket or tickets, or any form of transportation or evidence of the right thereto, to be used by any woman or girl in interstate or foreign commerce, or in any Territory or the District of Columbia, in going to any place for the purpose of prostitution or debauchery, or for any other immoral purpose, or with the intent and purpose on the part of such person to induce, entice, or compel her to give herself up to the practice of prostitution, or to give herself up to debauchery, or any other immoral practice, whereby such woman or girl shall be transported in interstate or foreign commerce, or in any Territory or the District of Columbia, shall be deemed guilty of a felony, and upon conviction thereof shall be punished by a fine not exceeding $5,000, or by imprisonment of not more than 5 years, or by both such fine and imprisonment, in the discretion of the court."

The third section is directed against the persuasion, inducement, and enticement of any woman or girl to go from one place to another in interstate or foreign commerce, whether with or without her consent, to engage in the practices and for the purposes stated in the first section, and provides that "anyone who shall thereby knowingly cause or aid or assist in causing such woman or girl to go or to be carried or transported as a passenger upon the line or route of any common carrier or carriers in interstate or foreign commerce, or any Territory or the District of Columbia," shall be punished as prescribed in the first section.

Section 4 makes criminal the persuasion, inducement, and enticement of a woman or girl under the age of 18 years from any State or Territory or the District of Columbia to any other State or Territory or the District of Columbia to engage in the immoral practices enumerated. The person guilty thereof and who shall in furtherance thereof knowingly induce or cause such woman or girl to be carried or transported as a passenger in interstate commerce shall be deemed guilty of a felony, and on conviction the offender's punishment may be a fine of $10,000 or imprisonment for 10 years, or by both fine and imprisonment, in the discretion of the court.

The grounds of attack upon the constitutionality of the statute are expressed by counsel as follows:

"1. Because it is contrary to and contravenes Article IV, section 2, of the Constitution of the United States, which reads: 'The citizens of each State shall be entitled to all the privileges and immunities of citizens in the several States.'

"2. Because it is contrary to and contravenes the following two amendments to the Constitution:

"'ART. IX. The enumeration in the Constitution of certain rights shall not be construed to deny or disparage others retained by the people.

"'ART. X. The powers not delegated to the United States by the Constitution, nor prohibited by it to the States, are reserved to the States respectively, or to the people.'

"3. Because that clause of the Constitution which reserves to Congress the power (Art. I, sec. 8, subdiv. 2) 'to regulate commerce with foreign nations and among the several States,' etc., is not broad enough to include the power to regulate prostitution or any other immorality of citizens of the several States as a condition precedent (or subsequent) to their right to travel interstate or to aid or assist another to so travel.

"4. Because the right and power to regulate and control prostitution, or any other immoralities of citizens, comes within the reserved police power of the several States, and under the Constitution Congress can not interfere therewith, either directly or indirectly, under the grant of power 'to regulate commerce between the States.'"

We shall discuss at length but one of these grounds; the others will be referred to incidentally. The power of Congress under the commerce clause of the Constitution is the ultimate determining question. If the statute be a valid exercise of that power, how it may affect persons or States is not material to be considered. It is the supreme law of the land and persons and States are subject to it.

Congress is given power "to regulate commerce with foreign nations and among the several States." The power is direct; there is no word of limitation in it, and its broad and universal scope has been so often declared as to make repetition unnecessary. And, besides, it has had so much illustration by cases that it would seem as if there could be no instance of its exercise that does not find an admitted example in some one of them. Experience, however, is the other way, and in almost every instance of the exercise of the power differences are asserted from previous exercises of it and made a ground of attack. The present case is an example.

Commerce among the States, we have said, consists of intercourse and traffic between their citizens, and includes the transportation of persons and property. There may be, therefore, a movement of persons as well as of property; that is, a person may move or be moved in interstate commerce. And the act under consideration was drawn in view of that possibility. What the act condemns is transportation obtained or aided or transportation induced in interstate commerce for the immoral purposes mentioned. But an objection is made and urged with earnestness. It is said that it is the right and privilege of a person to move between States and that such being the right, another can not be made guilty of the crime of inducing or assisting or aiding in the exercise of it and "that the motive or intention of the passenger, either before beginning the journey, or during or after completing it, is not a matter of interstate commerce." The contentions confound things important to be distinguished. It urges a right exercised in morality to sustain a right to be exercised in immorality. It is the same right which attacked the law of Congress which prohibits the carrying of obscene literature and articles designed for indecent and immoral use from one State to another. (29 Stat., 512, United States v. Popper, 98 Fed., 423.) It is the same right which was excluded as an element as affecting the constitutionality of the act for the suppression of lottery traffic through national and interstate commerce (188 U. S., 321, 357). It is the right given for beneficial exercise which is attempted to be perverted to and justify baneful exercise as in the instances stated and which finds further illustration in Reid v. Colorado (187 U. S., 137). This constitutes the supreme fallacy of plaintiffs' error. It pervades and vitiates their contentions.

Plaintiffs in error admit that the States may control the immoralities of its citizens. Indeed, this is their chief insistence, and they especially condemn the act under review as a subterfuge and an attempt to interfere with the police power of the States to regulate the morals of their citizens and assert that it is in consequence an invasion of the reserved powers of the States. There is unquestionably a control in the States over the morals of their citizens, and, it may be admitted, it extends to making prostitution a crime. It is a control, however, which can be exercised only within the jurisdiction of the States, but there is a domain which the States can not reach and over which Congress alone has power; and if such power be exerted to control what the States can not it is an argument for, not against, its legality. Its exertion does not encroach upon the jurisdiction of the States. We have cited examples; others may be adduced. The pure food and drugs act is a conspicuous instance. In all of the instances a clash of national legislation with the power of the States was urged, and in all rejected.

Our dual form of Government has its perplexities, State and Nation having different spheres of jurisdiction, as we have said, but it must be kept in mind that we are one people; and the powers reserved to the States and those conferred on the Nation are adapted to be exercised, whether independently or concurrently, to promote the general welfare, material and moral. This is the effect of the decisions, and surely if the facility of interstate transportation can be taken away from the demoralization of lotteries, the debasement of obscene literature, the contagion of diseased cattle or persons, the impurity of food and drugs, the like facility can be taken away from the systematic enticement to and the enslavement in prostitution and debauchery of women, and, more insistently, of girls.

This is the aim of the law expressed in broad generalization, and motives are made of determining consequence. Motives executed by actions may make it the concern of Government to exert its powers. Right purpose and fair trading need no restrictive regulation, but let them be transgressed and penalties and prohibitions must be applied. We may illustrate again by the pure food and drugs act. Let an article be debased by adulteration, let it be misrepresented by false branding, and Congress may exercise its prohibitive power. It may be that Congress could not prohibit the manufacture of the article in a State. It may be that Congress could not prohibit in all of its conditions its sale within a State. But Congress may prohibit its transportation between the States, and by that means defeat the motive and evils of its manufacture. How far-reaching are the power and the means which may be used to secure its complete exercise we have expressed in Hipolite Egg Co. v. United States (220 U. S., 45). There, in emphasis of the purpose of the law, we denominated adulterated articles as "outlaws of commerce" and said that the confiscation of them enjoined by the law was appropriate to the right to bar them from interstate transportation and completed the purpose of the law by not merely preventing their physical movement, but preventing trade in them between the States. It was urged in that case as it is urged here that the law was an invasion of the power of the States.

Of course it will be said that women are not articles of merchandise, but this does not affect the analogy of the cases; the substance of the congressional power is the same, only the manner of its exercise must be accommodated to the difference in its objects. It is misleading to say that men and women have rights. Their rights can not fortify or sanction their wrongs, and if they employ interstate transportation as a facility of their wrongs it may be forbidden to them to the extent of the act of July 25, 1910, and we need go no further in the present case.

The principle established by the cases is the simple one, when rid of confusing and distracting considerations, that Congress has power over transportation "among the several States"; that the power is complete in itself; and that Congress, as an incident to it, may adopt not only means necessary but convenient to its exercise, and the means may have the quality of police regulations. (114 U. S., 196, 215; Cooley Constitutional Limitations, 7th ed., 856.) We have no hesitation, therefore, in pronouncing the act of June 25, 1910, a legal exercise of the power of Congress.

There are assignments of error based upon rulings on the admission and rejection of evidence and upon the instructions to the jury and the refusing of instructions. The asserted errors are set forth in 25 bills of exceptions, and the special assignment of errors in this court occupy 28 pages of the record and present the constitutional objections to the law in all the aspects that counsels' ingenuity can devise. A like ingenuity has been exercised to represent the many ways in which the conduct of the accused can be viewed and shown to be inconsistent with a guilty purpose. To discuss them all is unnecessary. We shall pass more or less rapidly over those we consider to be worthy of attention.

1. It is contended that there is variance between the indictment and the proof in that the indictment charges that the women were transported over the Texas & New Orleans Railroad Co.'s road and that the Government failed to prove that such road was a line extending from New Orleans to Beaumont, Tex., these places marking the beginning and end of the transportation of the women. Further, that the proof showed that their tickets were purchased over the Southern Pacific Road. The indictment alleges that the Texas & New Orleans Railroad was a part of the Southern Pacific system, and was commonly known as the "Sunset route," and there was through transportation. The variance is not much more than verbal, and that it prejudiced their defense in any way is not shown. If it is error at all it does not appear to have caused even embarrassment to the defense. But was it error? (See Westmoreland v. United States 155 U. S., 545, 549; also sec. 1025 R. S.)

2. The evidence does not show that the defendants or either of them induced, etc., the women to become passengers in interstate commerce. The particulars are recited wherein it is contended that the evidence is deficient. It is not necessary to review them. It was for the jury to consider and determine the sufficiency of the evidence, and we can not say they were not justified by it in the judgment they pronounced.

3. It is contended that Florence Baden persuaded her sister Gertrude to go to Beaumont and an instruction of the court is attacked on the ground that it declared the charge of the indictment was satisfied against the defendants if Florence acted for them. There was no error in the instruction under the circumstances shown by the record.

4. Error is assigned on the refusal of the court to give certain instructions requested by defendants. To consider them in detail would require a lengthy review of the evidence, for they present arguments on certain phases of it as to the degree of persuasion used or its sufficiency to induce or entice the women. There was no error in refusing the instructions.

5. The court permitted the women to testify as to the acts of Effie Hoke at her house at Beaumont restraining the liberty of the women and coercing their stay with her. Such testimony was relevant. The acts illustrated and constituted a completion of what was done at New Orleans. They were part of the same scheme and made clear its purpose.

There were other instructions asked by which the jury was charged that they could not convict Effie Hoke for the character of the house she kept or Economides for the business he conducted. The charge of the court sufficiently excluded both views. It explained the act of Congress and the offenses it condemned and directed the attention of the jury to them.

6. Defendants complain that they were not permitted to show that the women named in the indictment were public prostitutes in New Orleans. Such proof they contend was relevant upon the charge of persuasion or enticement. This may be admitted, but there was sufficient evidence, as the court said, of the fact of the immorality of their lives and explicitly ruled that they could be shown to be public prostitutes. The court, however, excluded certain details sought to be proved. Under the circumstances there was no error in the ruling.

In conclusion we say, after consideration of all errors assigned, that there was no ruling made which was prejudicial to defendants.

Judgment affirmed.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. McClintock, one of its clerks, announced that the Senate had agreed to the report of the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 27941) making appropriations for the support of the Army for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1914.

DIVESTING LIQUORS OF THEIR INTERSTATE CHARACTER.

Mr. CLAYTON. Mr. Speaker, I yield to the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. LENROOT].

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Wisconsin is recognized.

Mr. LENROOT. Mr. Speaker, I shall vote to pass this bill, notwithstanding the objections of the President. I believe it to be constitutional, but admit that there is some doubt as to how the Supreme Court will hold upon that question. I want to call attention to the paragraph of the President's message that suggests that wherever the constitutionality of a measure is in doubt Members of the Congress should vote against it.

Mr. Speaker, if that had been the rule of action in the past, we never would have had the Interstate Commerce Commission, we never would have had the Sherman antitrust law, we never would have had the white-slave act, and we never would have had progress of any kind; and if that shall be the rule of action in the future, we never will have legislation enacted which may be imperatively demanded by the country because of changing conditions in economic development.

And, Mr. Speaker, applying this to myself, there is but one consideration with me concerning any measure, and that is, is it just, is it right, is it in the public interest that it pass, is there reason to believe that the Supreme Court will hold it constitutional? And if those questions be all answered in the affirmative, it is my duty to my country, it is my duty to myself, to vote for that measure, and leave the final determination of the legal questions with the Supreme Court of the United States, which now is the final authority, and the only place where they can be definitely settled. [Applause.]

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman has expired.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. Stuart, one of its clerks, announced that the Senate had passed with amendments bill of the following title, in which the concurrence of the House of Representatives was requested:

H. R. 28812. An act making appropriations for the naval service for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1914, and for other purposes.

MESSAGES FROM THE PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES.

Sundry messages, in writing, from the President of the United States were communicated to the House of Representatives by Mr. Latta, one of his secretaries, who also informed the House of Representatives that the President had approved and signed bills of the following titles:

On February 26, 1913:

H. R. 20102. An act relating to proof of signatures and handwriting;

H. R. 26279. An act granting the Fifth-Third National Bank, of Cincinnati, Ohio, the right to use original charter No. 20;

H. R. 27837. An act to authorize the Buckhannon & Northern Railroad Co. to construct and operate a bridge across the Monongahela River in the State of West Virginia; and

H. R. 28187. An act to authorize the construction, maintenance, and operation of a bridge across and over the Great Kanawha River, and for other purposes.

On February 27, 1913:

H. R. 11478. An act to quiet title and possession with respect to a certain unconfirmed and located private land claim in Baldwin County, Ala., in so far as the records of the General Land Office show said claim to be free from conflict;

H. R. 23293. An act for the protection of the water supply of the city of Colorado Springs and the town of Manitou, Colo.; and

H. R. 26812. An act to provide for selection by the State of Idaho of phosphate and oil lands.

On February 28, 1913:

H. R. 27827. An act to amend section 70 of an act entitled "An act to codify, revise, and amend the laws relating to the judiciary," approved March 3, 1911; and

H. R. 28607. An act making appropriations for the Diplomatic and Consular Service for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1914.

DIVESTING LIQUORS OF THEIR INTERSTATE CHARACTER.

Mr. DUPRÉ. Mr. Speaker, I yield to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. GALLAGHER].

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. GALLAGHER] is recognized.

Mr. GALLAGHER. Mr. Speaker, I am sorry to see so many Representatives here taking this class of legislation seriously. The idea of trying to grant powers to the States to prohibit the sale of liquor when there is not a State in this Union that has prohibition laws that has enforced or will enforce the laws that are now upon the statute books of those States. In the language of the street, it is nothing but a flimflam game. [Applause.]

This legislation is obviously provocative of prohibition. And prohibition when practically applied never prohibits. In States which are dry illicit distilleries abound. And it has been authoritatively stated by Mr. Cabell, the Commissioner of Internal Revenue, that the illicit distilleries have produced 5,000,000 gallons a year. And this is largely in prohibition territory.

In view of these facts, officially declared, I am opposed, bitterly opposed, to the measure before the House. It strikes at the legitimate traffic and promotes the illicit traffic. It will make a farce of the excise laws of every Commonwealth of the Union, and will breed contempt for legitimate regulation of the liquor traffic.

Mr. DUPRÉ. Mr. Speaker, how much time have I remaining?

The SPEAKER. Four minutes.

Mr. DUPRÉ. I yield that time to the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. HARDWICK].

Mr. HARDWICK. Mr. Speaker, I think this proceeding began in a most fitting manner. The proceedings upon this proposition were begun by objection on the part of the distinguished gentleman from Alabama [Mr. CLAYTON], who is in charge of this measure, to the simple reading of the opinion of the Attorney General of the United States. No wonder the gentleman objected. No wonder he did not wish this House to know the convincing reasons advanced by the Attorney General of the United States upon this question. No wonder he did not want the light turned on.

Mr. Speaker, when this bill was first put upon its passage in this House I voted, as I expect to vote now, against this proposition, because I was convinced then, as I am convinced now, that it is not within the constitutional power of this body to enact this legislation. I do not believe that the General Government can delegate to any State, or to any subdivision of any State, any of the powers that belong to it any more than I believe that the State can delegate, either by misuser or nonuser, any power that it has to the Federal Government. As a strict constructionist, as a believer in the doctrine of State rights, I utterly repudiate the doctrine that these two powers or classes of power can be surrendered at will by the jurisdiction in which each adheres to the other whenever the circumstances of a particular case seem to make it popular. [Applause.]

Mr. Speaker, only rarely have I been able to agree with the President of the United States in his political policies; but I want to say now that, in my judgment, the time will come, when the history of this entire transaction is written, if this House shall vote to pass this bill, the objections of the President to the contrary notwithstanding, when the courts have taken deliberate, impartial judgment on this question, when all the honor and credit and glory that attaches to this transaction will be with the President of the United States and not with this Congress. [Applause.] The action of the President is a brave and manly action, and, although he does not belong to my political party, and although I have rarely agreed with him about political questions, I want to say here and now that, in my judgment, his conduct in vetoing this bill will increase his stature immeasurably in the eyes of the future historian of this country who records the doings of this administration with an impartial hand, uninfluenced by passion and unawed by the prejudices of this hour. [Applause.]

I yield back the remainder of my time.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman has yielded back one minute.

Mr. CLAYTON. Does the gentleman from Louisiana [Mr. DUPRÉ] wish to use that one minute?

Mr. DUPRÉ. I do not.

Mr. CLAYTON. Then, Mr. Speaker, may I inquire how much time I have remaining?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman has four minutes.

Mr. CLAYTON. I yield the remainder of my time to to the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. WEBB], the author of this bill. [Applause.]

Mr. WEBB. Mr. Speaker, the President gives as one reason why he vetoes this bill that liquor and beer are legitimate articles of commerce. That was once true of liquor that was shipped into the Indian Territory before Congress put its hand upon it. That was true of opium before Congress put its hand upon it. That was true of nitroglycerin before Congress put its hand upon it. That was true of lottery tickets before Congress put its hand upon them. That was true of 25 or 30 other different articles before Congress put its hand upon them. In the beginning of the Government everything that could be bought and sold and transported was legitimate interstate commerce, but Congress having the plenary power to cover the whole field of interstate shipment, has the right to exclude certain articles which in the judgment of Congress it deems proper to exclude. It is admitted by all that Congress has the power to exclude the shipment of all liquor from interstate commerce. That being true, it certainly has the right to exclude the shipment of liquor in interstate commerce if it is found that it is intended to be used in violation of the law of a State of the Union.

The other reason assigned by the President for vetoing this bill is that it is a delegation of commerce power to the States. On that I respectfully dissent from the opinion of the President. The old Hepburn-Dolliver bill might have been open to that objection, but this bill is not, and the President's excerpts from the Knox report were written by Mr. Knox in assigning objections to the principle in that bill. The bill we now consider prohibits the shipment in interstate commerce of liquor intended to be used in violation of law of the State into which it is shipped. Congressional power never takes its hands off of such shipment; but the minute it is determined by a competent tribunal that that is the fact, then Congress takes that shipment out of legitimate commerce and subjects it to the law of the State, as C. O. D. shipments of liquor are to-day treated. If a shipment of liquor is sent C. O. D. to-day it can be seized by the State, because it is not legitimate commerce. If it is not marked "whisky" it can be seized by the State for the same reason. Liquor shipped to a fictitious person to-day is not legitimate commerce, because the moment those three injunctions are violated the State can seize it: First, if it is shipped C. O. D.; second, if it is shipped to a fictitious person; and, third, if it is shipped and not marked "whisky."

Pray tell me why Congress has not the power to exclude from the channels of commerce whisky intended to be used in violation of the law of any State whether the State be wet or dry? Congress has plenary power over the entire field and can take out of commerce whatever it sees fit.

Mr. Speaker, the States at one time had the power—before the Constitution was formed—to prohibit the importation of liquor intended to be used in violating the law of these States. After the Constitution was formed is it going to be argued that the States, after the transfer of that power to Congress, that somewhere between the transfer that power was lost? If the State could prohibit the importation of liquor in violation of her laws, Congress can do it, otherwise the States have given up the power that they once had and sovereignty has been lost or suspended somewhere. Congress now has the same power over interstate commerce as each and every State had prior to the formation of the Constitution. Surely, gentlemen, Congress and the States combined have the power to control the liquor question. The courts say that the States now can not control or regulate interstate commerce, for that power now reposes absolutely in Congress. The States once could do it, but they transferred that power to Congress, and that is the legislative body to control interstate shipments now.

The act of 1897 directs the Secretary of the Treasury to make and maintain a standard for imported tea, and the importation of any tea that does not come up to that standard is prohibited. The syllabus of the case of Butfield (192 U. S., 470) reads as follows:

> The power to regulate foreign commerce being an enumerated power, is complete in itself, acknowledging no limitations other than those prescribed in the Constitution, and Congress can, without violating the due process clause, establish standards and provide from considerations of public policy that no right shall exist to import an article of food not equal thereto.

The court upholds the constitutionality of the measure, though the power to fix the standards and apply the imported tea to those standards is committed to individuals, and when such tea fails, in the judgment of the officials, to come up to those standards, the tea must be returned to the country whence it came or it is confiscated.

The power of Congress over interstate commerce is the same as over foreign commerce, and surely Congress can fix a standard or rule by which whisky may be shipped in interstate commerce, viz, that it must not be transported for the purpose of being used to violate the sovereign law of a sovereign State, and there is no delegation of commerce power to any State, but Congress condemns such a shipment of liquor and withdraws it from the sphere of legitimate commerce.

Surely Congress has this power, and therefore the bill is constitutional, and I hope this House will pass the bill in spite of the President's veto.

Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that all gentlemen who have made speeches on this bill may have the privilege of extending their remarks in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from North Carolina asks unanimous consent that all gentlemen who have made speeches on this bill may extend their remarks in the RECORD. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

[Mr. DYER addressed the House. See Appendix.]

The SPEAKER. The question is, Will the House, on reconsideration, agree to pass the bill S. 4043, the objections of the President notwithstanding? and the Clerk will call the roll. All those in favor of passing the bill over the President's veto will answer "aye" and those opposed will answer "no."

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 246, nays 95, answered "present" 2, not voting 39, as follows:

Mr. HARDWICK. Mr. Speaker, it is perfectly evident that there is no quorum present to act on this matter.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of order against the motion, or reserve it——

Mr. HARDWICK. I also reserve the point of order against the resolution.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Speaker, I move to suspend the rules——

Mr. HARDWICK. Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER. For what purpose does the gentleman from Georgia rise?

Mr. HARDWICK. I make the point of order against the motion that under clause 3——

The SPEAKER. The gentleman has not made his motion yet.

Mr. HARDWICK. The gentleman has made his motion, as I understand it.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. If the gentleman will allow me——

Mr. HARDWICK. Suppose the gentleman states it, then.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Speaker, I move to suspend the rules and pass the order sent to the Clerk's desk.

Mr. HARDWICK. Now I raise the question of order, Mr. Speaker.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Georgia raises the question of order, and the Chair will hear the gentleman.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I should like to be heard on the point of order.

The SPEAKER. Before this debate on the point of order takes place the Chair is going to take the liberty of making a statement, and that is unless Members come into this Hall and stay here one-half of these great supply bills are going to fail. They will come in and answer and then dodge out.

The Chair has not any authority to go out and pull them in, or he would do it. [Applause.] It would be a very serious reflection on this House if the supply bills failed through the negligence of the House. The Chair wishes the Members who are here would convey his remarks to those who are not here. [Applause.]

The gentleman from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD] is recognized.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Speaker, I wish to state——

The SPEAKER. The Chair will hear the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. HARDWICK] to state his point of order.

Mr. HARDWICK. Mr. Speaker, the point of order is that, under clause 3 of Rule XIII, this motion can not be entertained by the Speaker. Also, that this motion ought to be referred to the Committee on Rules.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I would like to be heard on the point of order.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will hear the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD] first.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Now, Mr. Speaker, there are two rules for suspending the rules and passing bills. One of those rules has been in the Book of Rules for many years, and that provides that it shall be in order on the last six days to suspend the rules and pass bills. The purpose of that rule, Mr. Speaker, has always been that this House may do business, that the great supply bills on which the Government must depend shall not fail. It is a rule that goes above partisanship, because it is rarely that either party has a two-thirds majority in this House. It is a rule directed to, and an appeal to, the patriotism of the membership of this body. [Applause.] It is an effort to take care of the great public business of this country.

Mr. HARDWICK. Will the gentleman from Alabama yield?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. For a question; yes.

Mr. HARDWICK. Does not the gentleman know that under the rulings of the Chair and under the practice of the House, there has been no effort whatever to apply this rule to the detriment of either appropriation bills or conference reports? There has been an effort to have a quorum present, and it is the constitutional right of even the youngest and humblest Member in this Chamber, on either side of it, to have a quorum present in transacting this great business, and that is the right of the people of the United States.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. The gentleman from Georgia [Mr. HARDWICK] may think so, but I do not think his colleagues on the floor of this House agree with him or the position that he has taken. [Applause.]

Mr. HARDWICK. I will leave that to my colleagues and not to the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD].

Mr. HENRY of Texas. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I will.

Mr. HENRY of Texas. I think the gentleman will agree that no one has tried to stand in the way of any supply bills. Now, will he state to this House that the order that he has just proposed is in the interest of passing the supply bills and not for the purpose of passing the workmen's compensation bill?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Speaker, it is in the interest of clearing this calendar, so that the supply bills may pass. [Applause.]

Mr. HENRY of Texas. Will the gentleman yield further?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Let me finish my speech. So far as I am individually concerned, I am in favor of the workmen's compensation act, but I am no more in favor of pushing that to the front than other meritorious matters before this House. But it appears to me that there is a deliberate filibuster in this House to prevent its transacting public business. Now, what I have to say——

Mr. SISSON. Mr. Speaker——

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Will my friend from Mississippi allow me to finish?—and then I will answer his statement.

Mr. Speaker, the new rules we have adopted for suspending the rules and the Unanimous Consent Calendar were adopted for giving the right of way for the Unanimous Consent Calendar during the ordinary process of business in this House and on unanimous-consent days to let the gentlemen who had private bills have the opportunity to submit them to the unanimous consent of their colleagues before other business interfered with them. But I contend that you can not repeal a law by indirection; that the presumption is that you do not amend a rule unless the Congress directly states that it is amended or rejected.

Mr. Speaker, I contend that it was not the sentiment of this House to pass a rule in adopting the Unanimous Consent Calendar to reject or hamper the old rule that was in the House and which permitted us by two-thirds vote to suspend the rules and attend the public business on the last six days of a session. If we do not clear this calendar it means that public supply bills will fail. They will not fail by my aid. There were bills in here in the last few weeks that I endeavored to push for a consideration in this House that carried matters that I did not believe in myself. But I believed that it was my patriotic duty to have them acted on, and I believe it is yours now. [Applause.]

Now, Mr. Speaker, there is no man on the floor of this House who has a higher regard for the Speaker of this House than I have. [Applause.]

There is no man on the floor of this House that believes in the integrity and fair-mindedness of the Speaker more than I do. [Applause.] I believe that the Speaker of this House almost universally in his decisions from the chair has been correct [applause], and I am ready to sustain him in those decisions. But I want to say to the Speaker that, although I know that his ruling that the Unanimous Consent Calendar must be called before we can suspend the rules is the deliberate and honest and sincere judgment of the Chair, I differ with him in that judgment, and I believe if that decision is carried out it will seriously hamper the transaction of the public business.

Mr. FLOYD of Arkansas. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. In just one moment. I offer this resolution; I do not want to appeal from the decision of the Chair, and will not do so; but I offer the resolution to bring this question before the House, and ask the Speaker to determine in the decision whether or not this rule to suspend the rules has been set aside by the Unanimous Consent Calendar, or whether it is in order for me to offer this resolution now. Whether it is in order or not, I ask the Speaker to submit that question to the judgment of my colleagues and his colleagues on the floor of the House so that the House may determine.

Mr. FLOYD of Arkansas and Mr. SISSON rose.

The SPEAKER. To whom does the gentleman from Alabama yield?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. To the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. SISSON].

Mr. SISSON. I would like to ask the gentleman from Alabama, Mr. Speaker, if the situation in the House is not occasioned now by the unjust, unfair, and unscientific method pursued at the other end of the Capitol in putting on supply bills measures that ought not to be there?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I will say to my friend that I do not believe in legislating upon appropriation bills. But it is not my province or that of my friend from Mississippi, under the rules of this House, to criticize the body at the other end of the Capitol. Whether it is their fault or not, we are facing a condition——

Mr. SISSON. Does not the gentleman believe that the very dignity of this House is involved in all of these propositions when the Senate has put upon these appropriation bills matters that are totally foreign to them, endeavoring to drive through this House matters that they could not otherwise get through perhaps, especially at the short session, which is called for the purpose of passing the supply bills?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. All that I can say to my friend is what I said before, that I do not believe in legislating upon appropriation bills, and I must refrain from criticizing the action of gentlemen at the other end of the Capitol.

Mr. SISSON. Then if the Senate does those things which the House has the right to question, how can we object unless we do criticize that method of legislation?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I say let us criticize, if it is necessary and we do not agree with what they propose, by our vote and by our——

Mr. SISSON. Just another question. Does the gentleman believe that any Member of this House is acting from an unpatriotic motive when he is endeavoring to prevent that sort of disorderly and unwise legislation?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I say to my friend that we should endeavor to prevent it by our votes and by our arguments and by our making the proper protest; but I do not think we are justified in engaging in a filibuster to prevent it. [Applause.]

Mr. SISSON. There are a number of bills here that are most important to the country. But if they are taken up under suspension of the rules there is no opportunity given to consider them section by section at a time, and no opportunity for this House to amend them, and these bills must go through with those riders on them, without giving a representative Member the right to represent his constituents or be heard on those bills, and that is my objection to it. The House of Representatives is entitled to be heard on these matters.

Mr. FLOYD of Arkansas. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I yield to the gentleman from Arkansas.

Mr. FLOYD of Arkansas. I would like to ask the gentleman from Alabama this question: What higher rights have those Members who desire to call up bills under suspension than those Members who have complied with the rules of this House and placed their bills on the Unanimous Consent Calendar?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. That is a matter of recognition that the Chair must govern himself, and I would not say that I think the gentleman from Arkansas or any other Member on this floor will question for one moment the fairness and equal justice that have been accorded to all the Members of the House by the gentleman who presides over the proceedings of this House. [Applause.]

Mr. FLOYD of Arkansas. I do not question that, but I question the fairness of the gentleman from Alabama in these closing hours, in offering a resolution here to change the rules that we have solemnly adopted for the government of this House.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I am not attempting to change the rule. I am attempting to have a declaration by this House as to whether this rule is in effect or not. I have not made a single offer to change the rules. I have no doubt the gentleman from Arkansas is willing to submit to the decision of his colleagues as to whether this rule is in order or not.

Mr. FLOYD of Arkansas. The gentleman has expressed his high regard for the Speaker of this House. I have a higher regard for rulings of the Speaker of this House than does the gentleman from Alabama. I am willing to submit to the ruling already made by the Speaker of this House. Can the gentleman from Alabama say as much?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I stated that I think if the ruling stands we can not legislate, and I am anxious that the wheels of legislation may not be blocked.

Mr. SISSON. They will not be blocked.

Mr. RODDENBERY. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Yes.

Mr. RODDENBERY. In view of the statement the gentleman has made, will not the gentleman so modify his proposed order that it will make only the great supply bills more highly privileged than the Unanimous Consent Calendar?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I do not think that is necessary. I do not question for a moment that the Speaker of the House will give preference to the great supply bills from now until the end of the session. When that is done, if there is other meritorious legislation that should come before the Congress, I see no reason why it should not be presented to the House for action.

Mr. RODDENBERY. Perhaps I did not quite catch the gentleman's proposition. As I understood him in his opening statement, he said that the object of presenting this order now was because unless this or something similar is done, this Congress will close and some of the great supply bills will fail to pass.

Now, what I want to invite the gentleman's attention to is this: If that is the object of this order, why would not that danger be averted by permitting this order distinctly to give preference and high privilege to the supply bills over the Unanimous Consent Calendar, leaving it so that Members who have bills on the Unanimous Consent Calendar will not have to stand aside and let some other measure that has never gone to the Unanimous Consent Calendar come in under suspension of the rules and consume the time? The workmen's compensation bill is one that clearly illustrates the point I desire to bring out. It comes from the Senate, and is reported from the House committee with a vast number of amendments upon it.

Mr. HARDWICK. About 150.

Mr. RODDENBERY. Over 100 amendments upon it. Now, if it is sought to consider the workmen's compensation bill by virtue of this order it puts this House, in the very last days of the Congress, up to passing under suspension of the rules an innovation of legislation, a complete revolution of our system of damage or injury compensation in the United States, confessedly a withdrawal from the employees of the country of their right to litigate in the courts. And however wise a bill it might be, is it fair to the Members of this House to force them to vote yea or nay on a bill from the Senate reported to the House with over 100 amendments, without right of considering amendments separately and without debate?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I will say to the gentleman from Georgia that I am not proposing to pass the workmen's compensation bill. I stated in the beginning that if it comes before this House I intend to vote for it, because I believe in its principles; but what I am proposing it for is to enable the House to get back to the position it has occupied since the beginning of the Government, where it may use the two-thirds rule to transact the business of this House.

Now, as to particular bills, it has been assumed in the past that it was not dangerous to pass any bill under suspension of the rules if a two-thirds vote could be obtained; and I take it, in reference to this particular bill or any other, if it is a vicious or dangerous bill it will not receive a two-thirds vote in this House and will not be passed.

Mr. RODDENBERY. Is there any particular reason, parliamentary or otherwise, why the gentleman from Alabama at this time requests the Speaker of the House to submit a parliamentary proposition to the judgment of the Members, rather than rule upon it directly in this instance, as he has already done and has been the invariable custom heretofore?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. To be candid, I will say that I think the membership of this House has the same high regard for the Speaker that I have.

The membership of this House would not want to overrule the decision of the Speaker. I do not want to overrule the Speaker's decision, but this question having become vital, I ask the Speaker not to put us in an embarrassing position on this matter, but leave it to his colleagues under the rule of the House.

Mr. LONGWORTH. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Certainly.

Mr. LONGWORTH. I want to ask the gentleman if he did not have much to do with the original draft of the rule, and does he believe it was the intention of the framers to provide that the Unanimous Consent Calendar should be called in the last six days of the session?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Not at all.

Mr. LONGWORTH. And that is the object of this resolution?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Yes. I do not think that thought was in the minds of any individual.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I do not think that the gentleman from Alabama had much to do with the original draft of the rule. The gentleman from New York [Mr. FITZGERALD] and myself prepared the unanimous-consent rule.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I am speaking of the rule where the unanimous-consent rule and the suspension and the discharged calendar were all put together.

Mr. MANN. What is the situation here now? I do not understand that the Speaker has directly ruled upon this question yet.

Mr. HARDWICK. If the gentleman from Illinois will allow me.

Mr. MANN. Certainly.

Mr. HARDWICK. The gentleman from Alabama [Mr. CLAYTON] was recognized to call up a motion to suspend the rules and pass this very bill. I made a point of order and the Speaker sustained the point of order.

Mr. MANN. I was not in the Chamber when the Speaker made that ruling.

The SPEAKER. The Chair simply ordered the call of the Unanimous Consent Calendar.

Mr. MANN. This is the situation: The old rule provides for a suspension on suspension days, of which this is one. Then came along the rule providing for the Unanimous Consent Calendar to be called immediately after the approval of the Journal. I remember very distinctly that when that rule was put in operation and the Unanimous Consent Calendar was called among the first bills which were reached on the calendar was one to which objection was made. Thereupon the gentleman in charge of the bill sought to receive recognition to move to suspend the rules and pass the bill, and that was done. It was done on more than one occasion, and it was always considered during the last Congress that the right of the Speaker to recognize for a suspension of the rules was a right of recognition at any time, and if the motion prevailed it set aside the rule for the Unanimous Consent Calendar in the same way that it set aside the other rules.

I think the difficulty has arisen in the minds of gentlemen because of the change of the rules at the beginning of this Congress. We had a rule for unanimous consent and a rule for suspension and a rule for discharge of committees. The rule for the committee discharge expressly provided that the motion to discharge a committee should take precedence over a motion to suspend the rules. So that during the entire last session of Congress I sat here with motions on the calendar to discharge committees ready at any time to call up the preferential motion to discharge a committee if the Speaker would give recognition to anyone to suspend the rules.

We were in the position that the Unanimous Consent Calendar was being called with the right of the Speaker to recognize for the suspension of the rules, but if the prior right for a motion to discharge a committee was entered, that cut off the suspension and you could not make a motion to discharge a committee until the Unanimous Consent Calendar had been called. That is where the impression grew up in this House that the Unanimous Consent Calendar must be called before you could recognize for the suspension.

But the rule was abrogated or changed by the House some time ago, and suspensions were given priority over motions to discharge committees.

While the Speaker, it appears, has ruled otherwise, I am very clear in my own mind that all the time the right of the Speaker to recognize for a suspension was the right which, if made and the motion prevailed, set aside the Unanimous Consent Calendar just as much as it did any other portion of the rules. But since the rules have been changed so that suspension is ahead of a motion to discharge a committee, I think the motion to suspend is in order at any time.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman does not mean to make that broad statement?

Mr. MANN. I mean on suspension days.

The SPEAKER. That is a qualification.

Mr. MANN. At any time during the last six days. The Unanimous Consent Calendar is never called except on suspension days, so that my statement is literally correct.

The SPEAKER. The question that the Chair asked is this: Does the gentleman contend that on the first and third Mondays, leaving this particular difficulty out of consideration for the moment, when somebody objects to a bill that is called the Chair ought to recognize the Member then to suspend the rules?

Mr. MANN. I do not contend that the Chair ought to recognize the Member. Quite the contrary. I do contend that the Chair has the right to recognize him.

The SPEAKER. That question has never been raised while the present occupant of the Chair has been Speaker.

Mr. MANN. It was raised while Mr. CANNON was Speaker, and recognition was given. Of course, it is not intended by the Unanimous Consent Calendar to allow bills to be placed on the calendar which, when objected to, gives the right to a motion to suspend the rules, because the right to recognize for suspension has always been considered arbitrary in the Speaker, and, I take it, is necessarily so. We are in this position just now: If the motion offered by the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD] is in order, it is not necessary. If it is not in order, of course it can not prevail.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Speaker, if the gentleman will permit, I recognize that, and I offer it for the purpose of bringing the matter before the House and for the purpose of letting the House decide.

Mr. MANN. I understand the position of the gentleman. I take it that if the Speaker holds the motion is in order the gentleman will withdraw it. If the Speaker holds the motion is out of order, then some one will take an appeal from the decision of the Chair. Or if the Speaker submits the matter to the House and the House decides that the motion is in order, then I apprehend the gentleman will withdraw the motion, because then the House will have stated that suspensions are in order, and the motion amounts to nothing whatever.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. That is the purpose.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Speaker, I was not present when this question was originally raised by the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. HARDWICK] on yesterday or the day before. Had I been here, I would have called the attention of the Chair to several of the rules, which make it quite clear to me that the motion to suspend the rules is in order on suspension days, regardless of whether the Unanimous Consent Calendar has been called. Rule XXVII provides:

> No rule shall be suspended except by a vote of two-thirds of the Members voting, a quorum being present; nor shall the Speaker entertain a motion to suspend the rules except on the first and third Mondays of each month, preference being given on the first Monday to individuals and on the third Monday to committees, and during the last six days of a session.

The Unanimous Consent Calendar rule provides, after provision for the placing of the bills on the calendar:

> On days when it shall be in order to move to suspend the rules the Speaker shall, immediately after the approval of the Journal, direct the Clerk to call the bills which have been for three days upon the Calendar for Unanimous Consent.

There is nothing in that rule which prohibits the setting aside of the rule by suspension, or which prohibits the Speaker from giving recognition to a Member to move to suspend the rules. I believe that Members have been misled by the wording of the rule, which is:

> Immediately after the approval of the Journal the Speaker shall direct the Clerk to call the bills which have been for three days upon the Calendar for Unanimous Consent.

That language was carefully and designedly inserted in the rule. Its purpose was to insure the calling of the Calendar for Unanimous Consent on the days fixed, unless the rules were suspended, and the necessity for that particular language arose out of the language of paragraph 9 of Rule XXVI, which reads as follows:

> At any time after the reading of the Journal it shall be in order, by direction of the appropriate committees, to move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the purpose of considering bills raising revenue or general appropriation bills.

To make the Unanimous Consent Calendar preferential over the highly privileged motions to go into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union at any time after the approval of the Journal for the consideration of such bills, it was necessary to insert some language which would make that clear. That was done by the insertion of the words "immediately after the approval of the Journal," so as to cut out the highly privileged motions to go into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union to consider revenue and appropriation bills on suspension days. All of the rules of the House can be suspended under the suspension rule, with the exception of one or two. There is a rule which prohibits the Speaker from entertaining any motion to suspend a rule which excludes from admission to the floor all except certain designated persons. It has been held that that rule can not be suspended, because the Speaker is expressly prohibited from entertaining the motion. The same language was inserted in the rule which prohibits the Speaker from entertaining a motion to take a recess on Tuesday of any week, the purpose being to prevent by indirection the elimination of Calendar Wednesday. There is no inhibition upon the Speaker from entertaining a motion to suspend the rules on a day when the Unanimous Consent Calendar is called, and the language of the rule was purposely framed merely to eliminate other motions, which under a different wording would have been preferential in character.

I believe that the peculiar wording of the rule and the situation described by the gentleman from Illinois accounts for whatever confusion there may be in this matter. It would be very easy, Mr. Speaker, if the House were to determine that during the last six days of the session it would not be in order to suspend the rules until the Unanimous Consent Calendar had been called to arrange for the most effective filibuster ever seen in the history of the House. All that it would be necessary to do would be to file with the Clerk notices to place upon the Unanimous Consent Calendar all bills reported from committees, whether entitled to go upon the Unanimous Consent Calendar or not, and so long as it would be necessary to call the calendar and objections to the bills that under the rule could not be placed upon it, sufficient time could be consumed to utilize all of the six days at the end of any session. There is one thing about the procedure of the House that is highly important, and that is, that the procedure, whatever it be, be definite and not variable. For that reason I should not care to appeal from the decision of the Speaker construing the rules of this House unless it were a matter of such fundamental importance that I would prefer to have it settled by the House and have necessarily a vote on it. Since the gentleman from Alabama has made the suggestion at the beginning of his remarks that this matter is of such vital importance that the Speaker might properly, following the course of Mr. Speaker CANNON in construing a different provision of this rule on a former occasion, submit the question to the House and let the House fix a definite construction upon the rule for future observance, I trust that such a course will be followed in this instance.

Mr. HARDWICK. Of course, if the Chair has made up his mind——

Mr. HENRY of Texas. Mr. Speaker——

Mr. HARDWICK. I say if the Chair is willing to hear the gentleman from Georgia——

The SPEAKER. The Chair will recognize the gentleman from Georgia.

Mr. HARDWICK. Well, the gentleman from Texas rose, and I will yield to him.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will hear the gentleman from Texas.

Mr. HENRY of Texas. Mr. Speaker, this is a very important matter, and I am sure the Speaker wants his position to be exactly correct. The gentleman from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD] has no higher regard for the Speaker of this House than that entertained by me. I believe the Speaker is going to decide this question in accordance with his convictions. Ordinarily the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] and the gentleman from New York [Mr. FITZGERALD] and the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD] are correct, but in this instance they can not by any process of reasoning construe away the English language. Let us deliberately for a moment or two examine the provisions of this order. Mr. Speaker, suppose this were the first or third Monday, which are suspension days, and the gentleman from Alabama should offer this resolution. Let us see what would be the effect of it. He and the gentleman from New York have argued that there is nothing in the rules to prevent submitting the proposition of the gentleman from Alabama. I take issue with them. We found it necessary to amend that rule providing for the Discharge Calendar and motions to discharge on that day. The gentleman from Illinois did not read from that rule, but stated what it was; but I want to read to the Speaker two or three lines and see what is the plain meaning. Clause 4 of Rule XXVII reads:

After the Unanimous Consent Calendar shall have been called on any Monday and motions to suspend the rules have been disposed of—

A plain, positive provision—"after the Unanimous Consent Calendar has been called" then motions to suspend may be entertained. Now, Mr. Speaker, we have a plain provision in Rule XXVII that on the first and third Mondays motions to suspend the rules can be entertained, and an express provision, written by the gentleman from New York [Mr. FITZGERALD], providing for a Unanimous Consent Calendar, and we now have six suspension days during the last days of this session which are on an exact parity with the suspension days on first and third Mondays, and the language of the rule is plain that the Unanimous Consent Calendar shall be first disposed of. Now, why the necessity of the proposition of the gentleman from Alabama? He says it is for the purpose of expediting the business of this House and passing the supply bills. I have been here almost as long as the gentleman from Alabama and have never stood in the way of transacting the legitimate business of this House, and no one who is cooperating with me on this occasion is standing in the way of considering any supply bill and will not impede consideration of any supply bill during the last hours of this session. Why the haste——

Mr. MANN. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. HENRY of Texas. No; I can not yield.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman declines to yield.

Mr. MANN. The gentleman ought to yield out of courtesy for a question.

Mr. HENRY of Texas. Not at the moment—yes; I will.

Mr. MANN. The gentleman says he is not standing in the way of supply bills, but if it is not in order to move to suspend the rules until the Unanimous Consent Calendar is called, is it in order to move to suspend the rules on a supply bill before the Unanimous Consent Calendar is called?

Mr. HENRY of Texas. That is for the Speaker to determine. I think it is, and will not stand in the way of it, anyway.

Mr. MANN. I will, if that is the rule.

Mr. HENRY of Texas. Now, Mr. Speaker, I say the ruling of the Chair was correct, and I believe in the integrity of the Speaker of this House, and think he will adhere to the rules as they are plainly written. Why the necessity of the proposition of the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD]? Heretofore these orders which he proposes have been considered by unanimous consent. Now he proposes to change the rules of this House without submitting his resolution to the Committee on Rules, that should report all such resolutions as this. The Committee on Rules can take care of the matter if it is referred to them. Why not pursue the orderly course? Ah, but they say it is in the interest of the dispatch of public business. Mr. Speaker, I am standing here, and we might as well be candid with one another, and let this House understand it, and let the country understand it, to contest every inch of ground against the railroad employees' compensation act which some of these gentlemen are trying to put through this House. [Applause.] I have tried to deal fairly with my colleagues and with the country. I served on the Committee on the Judiciary for more than 10 years, and say to my brethren here that after examining the employees' compensation act, I have convinced myself that it is an act more in behalf of the great railways of this country than in the interest of the men who work for them. [Applause.] I shall raise my voice against it.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I rise to a question of order.

The SPEAKER. What point does the gentleman make?

Mr. MANN. I make the point of order that the gentleman from Texas [Mr. HENRY] is not discussing the point of order before the House.

The SPEAKER. The point is well taken.

Mr. HENRY of Texas. With all due deference to the Speaker and the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN], I was endeavoring to explain that I am not engaging in a filibuster.

The SPEAKER. That might be a question of personal privilege, but it is not an argument on a point of order.

Mr. HENRY of Texas. I do not care to rise to a question of personal privilege, but, Mr. Speaker, will say that I shall expect the Speaker to construe these rules as they are written, and believe he will do it, and without intending to engage in a filibuster, intend to stand here until the end of this session and resist the passage of the proposed compensation bill. I am for the principle of an employees' compensation bill, but desire it to contain the optional feature so that those having rights may have the privilege of electing remedies and going into the courts for redress.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Georgia [Mr. HARDWICK] is recognized.

Mr. HARDWICK. It is impossible for me, Mr. Speaker, to permit the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD] to leave me in the attitude that he seeks to leave me in before this House. Of course the gentleman understands full well, as the Speaker does, and as my colleagues do, that I will not, either now or later, submit to be lectured by him on any occasion or about any subject.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will address himself to this point of order. The question has been raised once——

Mr. HARDWICK. The Speaker raised it with the gentleman.

The SPEAKER. If the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. HARDWICK] had raised that point against the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD] the Chair would have sustained him.

Mr. HARDWICK. The gentleman from Alabama did not raise the question on "the gentleman from Georgia." It was raised by the gentleman from Illinois against the gentleman from Texas [Mr. HENRY].

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Georgia [Mr. HARDWICK] will proceed.

Mr. HARDWICK. I want to say this, that under the rules and under the Speaker's rulings there has not been the slightest attempt to interfere with any of the great supply bills that are now before this House or may hereafter come before this House. Conference reports, under another rule that must be given equal force with the rules to which we appeal, have been given the right of way over everything. Under another rule, the general appropriation bills, the great supply bills of this House, have got the right of way, too. Construing those rules together, "the gentleman from Georgia" has not made the slightest attempt, and the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD] knows full well, as the Speaker knows it, to make one single effort to delay them.

Indeed, Mr. Speaker, I want to say, as a matter of justice to myself, that not even my distinguished friend who made that speech has done more than I have to help the supply bills through. I have been here for days and nights, when the gentleman was not even here, helping them and voting that way, and I do not rest under any such charge, because its injustice is apparent.

Mr. HEFLIN. Mr. Speaker, I will have to raise the point of order that the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. HARDWICK] is not speaking to the point of order.

Mr. HARDWICK. The gentleman did not raise that point against his colleague [Mr. UNDERWOOD].

The SPEAKER. The point of order is sustained.

Mr. HARDWICK. Now, Mr. Speaker, so much for that phase of the question. On the rule itself, the question of order itself, unless the Chair is prepared to take back at least two rulings—and the intimation came from the occupant of the chair that it was not a ruling, because he directed the business of the House to proceed in accordance with the point of order made—I do not think that would be seriously insisted upon, upon reflection on the part of the Chair. Unless the Chair is prepared to reverse his rulings on two separate occasions in the last 48 hours, and unless the Chair is prepared to bow gracefully and ask the House to reverse him in a graceful way, in the smooth, suave way suggested by the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD], this point of order I make must be sustained.

Now, Mr. Speaker, under Rule XI the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD] can not present this matter as a matter of privilege, because under the rules of the House that motion can not be made as a matter of privilege. That has never been done except in the one instance of "the revolution," in which we overthrew the power of the distinguished gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON]. That is the only precedent. Under the rules and precedents, I say, that motion can not be made as a matter of privilege from the floor, but goes in the ordinary course of events to the Committee on Rules, to be reported on by it.

Therefore, the gentleman presents it craftily. Of course, I do not mean "craftily" in an unfair sense, but it is a pretty smooth proposition that the gentleman has worked out, apparently with common consent in some quarters, for the House and for the Speaker. He presents it as a sugar-coated pill, to reverse the Speaker by indirection and to save him from the mortification of reversing himself.

I, however, raise the question here and now that the gentleman's motion is not in order, on exactly the same ground as that upon which the Chair has twice sustained me, because before the Chair can put any motion to suspend the rules he must, under the plain language of this rule, first have the Unanimous Consent Calendar called. Any motion to suspend the rules is out of order; even a motion to alter the practice and rules of this House is out of order; in fact all motions to suspend the rules are out of order until that Unanimous Consent Calendar is called.

But the gentleman from New York [Mr. FITZGERALD] goes into a scholarly disquisition as to how these things happened to get into the rules, and he tells us there is a great difference, because a certain rule says the Speaker shall be prohibited from offering a motion to suspend the rules as to admission to the floor. Why, Mr. Speaker, can the Committee on Rules or the House make a rule that the House can not undo, to apply the gentleman's own argument to his own proposition? Can the House and the committee say that the House may not suspend that rule? And yet we have said so, and the precedents are that way. He calls attention to the fact that the Speaker of this House is not permitted under the rules to entertain a motion to take a recess on Calendar Wednesday.

Now, Mr. Speaker, although the language in one rule is negative, in the other it is positive, and I can not see, to save my life, the force of the gentleman's finespun logic, when he contends that when the rule says the Speaker shall not do a thing, the Speaker must not do it, and when the rule on the other hand says the Speaker shall do a thing, the Speaker can disobey it. The gentleman from New York [Mr. FITZGERALD], a profound logician; the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD], a great leader, and the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN], a hairsplitter from Chicago [laughter], may be able to figure that out; but I can not see, to save my life, how the Chair is bound to obey rules which say he shall not do something and at the same time has full license to disobey rules which say he shall do something. [Applause.]

Mr. POU. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. POU. I would like to inquire what the proposition is that is now pending before the House?

The SPEAKER. The proposition pending is the point of order made by the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. HARDWICK] against the motion of the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD].

Mr. MANN. Against the motion to suspend the rules.

The SPEAKER. Yes. Now, the situation about this thing is this: The main proposition is that this rule about unanimous consent and suspension of the rules and discharges of committees, and so forth and so on, needs overhauling, and needs to be put into a plain, consistent statement that anybody can understand. When this point was first raised the other day, the Chair said that if the rule were strictly construed, the contention of the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. HARDWICK] is correct, but that he did not believe that the authors of that rule ever intended to work the Unanimous Consent Calendar ahead of the suspensions in the last six days of the session.

Inasmuch as the House has the right to do absolutely what it pleases at any time, and the Chair has no pride of opinion whatever about that quasi ruling, the Chair submits to the House itself the question whether on the last six days of a session the Unanimous Consent Calendar shall take precedence of motions to suspend the rules.

Mr. HARDWICK. On that question I demand the yeas and nays.

Mr. MANN. The Chair can only submit to the House the point of order raised by the gentleman.

The SPEAKER. That is what the Chair is trying to do.

Mr. MANN. That does not involve the last six days. The point of order made by the gentleman from Georgia is that the motion to suspend the rules is not now in order. There is no use going beyond that.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will state it that way. The motion of the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD] is to suspend the rules.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Speaker, if the Chair will allow me, my motion is only for the purpose of bringing this matter before the House. I intend to withdraw it, whichever way the House decides; but my motion is to suspend the rules and pass the resolution. The gentleman from Georgia makes the point of order that that is not in order, and the question before the House is whether a motion to suspend the rules is in order at this time.

Mr. HARDWICK. A parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. HARDWICK. Is not that what the Chair first stated, in a different way?

The SPEAKER. It may be or may not. The Chair is not going to split hairs about that. No difference how this vote goes, the Chair announces that he is going to recognize gentlemen in charge of conference reports and appropriation bills, in order to get through with the business of the House. [Applause.]

Mr. HARDWICK. I certainly agree with that.

The SPEAKER. The Chair submits to the House the point of order made by the gentleman from Georgia.

Mr. MANN. Is not the question to submit to the House the question whether the motion offered by the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD] is in order?

The SPEAKER. Is the motion made by the gentleman from Alabama to suspend the rules in order at this time? Those who believe that will say "aye."

The affirmative vote was taken.

Mr. HENRY of Texas. I make the point of order that no quorum is present.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will put the other half of the question. Those opposed will say "no."

The negative vote was taken.

The SPEAKER. Now, the gentleman raises the point of order that no quorum is present. The Chair will count. [After counting.] Two hundred and three Members present—a quorum.

Mr. HARDWICK. Mr. Speaker, I demand the yeas and nays.

Seventeen Members rose to second the demand for the yeas and nays.

Mr. HARDWICK. The other side.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I submit that the gentleman is not entitled to that.

Mr. HARDWICK. We did not have tellers on this. I submit that I am entitled to the other side.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman is entitled to the other side. Those opposed to ordering the yeas and nays will rise. [After counting.] One hundred and fifty-six in the negative. The yeas and nays are refused. On the question, Is the motion made by the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD] to suspend the rules in order at this time? the ayes have it.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Speaker, as this is a decision that ought to go into the RECORD as final in this matter, I ask for a division of the House.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Alabama demands a division. Those in favor of the proposition that the motion of the gentleman from Alabama is in order will rise and stand until they are counted.

The question was taken; and on a division there were—ayes 189, noes 23.

The SPEAKER. The ayes have it, and the House decides that the motion of the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD] to suspend the rules is in order at this time.

Mr. HARDWICK. A parliamentary inquiry, Mr. Speaker.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. HARDWICK. Do I understand the Chair to rule that under the rules as now construed the first thing in order will be conference reports and appropriation bills?

The SPEAKER. The Chair stated that he would give preference to them.

Mr. HARDWICK. That they will be first in order?

The SPEAKER. That they will be given preference.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Speaker, I offered the motion in order that the House might decide the question as to whether a motion to suspend the rules was in order. The House having decided that, my motion is of no further avail, and I ask permission to withdraw it.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman can withdraw it without any permission.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I withdraw it.

Mr. HARDWICK. I raise the point of order that the gentleman can not withdraw his motion except by unanimous consent.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Under the rule he can.

The SPEAKER. He can in the House, although he could not in Committee of the Whole. In the House a Member making a motion may withdraw it at any time before it is voted on or amended.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. McClintock, one of its clerks, announced that the Senate had passed without amendment bills of the following titles:

H. R. 21714. An act to amend subchapter 2 of chapter 19 of the Code of Law for the District of Columbia; and

H. R. 8921. An act for the relief of William H. Seward.

The message also announced that the Senate had agreed to the reports of the committees of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the House of Representatives to bills and joint resolution of the following titles:

S. 8178. An act granting pensions to certain soldiers and sailors of the Civil War and certain widows and dependent relatives of such soldiers and sailors;

S. 8275. An act granting pensions and increase of pensions to certain soldiers and sailors of the Regular Army and Navy and of wars other than the Civil War, and to certain widows and dependent relatives of such soldiers and sailors;

LEGISLATIVE, EXECUTIVE, AND JUDICIAL APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. JOHNSON of South Carolina. Mr. Speaker, I call up the legislative, executive, and judicial appropriation bill for the purpose of making a motion upon it.

The SPEAKER laid before the House the bill (H. R. 26680) making appropriations for the legislative, executive, and judicial expenses of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1914, and for other purposes.

Mr. MANN. What is the gentleman going to do with this bill? I thought we had disposed of it.

Mr. FITZGERALD. The Senate rejected the conference report.

Mr. JOHNSON of South Carolina. I move that the House further insist upon its disagreement to the amendments of the Senate and consent to the conference asked for.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from South Carolina moves that the House further insist on its disagreements to the Senate amendments and agree to the conference asked for.

Mr. MANN. May I ask the gentleman from South Carolina if all of the amendments are in disagreement? We have adopted two conference reports. I understand the Senate rejected all of the last conference report.

Mr. JOHNSON of South Carolina. All the amendments involved in the last conference report are in disagreement. The amendments in the first report have been agreed to both by the House and the Senate, and are no longer in disagreement.

Mr. MANN. That is the reason I made the inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from South Carolina moves that the House further insist on its disagreements to the amendments included in the last conference report and agree to the conference asked for.

Mr. MURDOCK. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. MURDOCK. Is it not necessary that the gentleman from South Carolina should ask unanimous consent to consider the amendments en bloc?

The SPEAKER. No; the Chair thinks it has passed that stage.

Mr. RAKER. Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask the gentleman from South Carolina a question.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from South Carolina yield to the gentleman from California?

Mr. JOHNSON of South Carolina. Yes.

Mr. RAKER. In regard to the conference report filed February 21, leaving these items that were in disagreement, do I understand these matters are all in disagreement now between the House and the Senate?

Mr. JOHNSON of South Carolina. All in disagreement.

Mr. RAKER. And open for consideration by the two bodies?

Mr. JOHNSON of South Carolina. They are open for consideration between the two bodies.

Mr. SABATH. Is the gentleman in a position to state the various amendments that are in disagreement?

Mr. JOHNSON of South Carolina. I am in a position to state the various amendments that are in disagreement. As a matter of fact, the Senate rejected the conference report because we had not provided for a worthless little assay office up in Nevada; that leaves them all open.

Mr. RAKER. Mr. Speaker, am I entitled to a few moments of time on this matter?

Mr. JOHNSON of South Carolina. How much time does the gentleman want?

Mr. RAKER. I think five minutes will do.

Mr. JOHNSON of South Carolina. I will yield five minutes to the gentleman from California, although I think it is more important to get the bill into conference than it is to talk.

Mr. RAKER. Mr. Speaker, I do not want to say anything in response to that, but I do believe that a man has a right—not only his right, but his duty as a Representative of a great State like California—to raise his voice when that State has unanimously, by its legislature and governor, asked and insisted that the proper offices and officers be provided in that State for the purpose of dealing fairly and squarely with its citizens relative to the collection of the internal revenue of that State. The Legislature of California unanimously passed the following resolution on this important question, namely:

SACRAMENTO, CAL., February 18, 1913.

Hon. JOHN E. RAKER,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.:

I am forwarding herewith, as per instructions embodied therein, the following resolution. Kindly acknowledge receipt.

Resolution by Senator Boynton.

Whereas the fourth internal-revenue district of California, with headquarters in Sacramento and serving all the counties north of San Francisco to the Oregon line, and also the entire State of Nevada, was abolished on the 1st day of October last; and

Whereas said district did an annual business of nearly $800,000; and

Whereas said district was also consolidated with the first collection district of California, with headquarters in San Francisco, which district was so large that the Los Angeles district was separated from it two years ago; and

Whereas the loss of the fourth district will work injury to this section of California and Nevada without any corresponding benefit to the first district; and

Whereas an amendment known as Senate amendment No. 68 to the House of Representatives bill No. 26680, providing for the reestablishment of the aforesaid fourth revenue collection district of the State of California, has been approved by the Senate of the United States Congress, and now goes to conference: Therefore be it

Resolved by the senate and assembly jointly, That the Legislature of the State of California approves all of the provisions of said amendment, and our Senators in Congress are hereby instructed and our Representatives requested to vote for and use every honorable means to secure the passage of said amendment to said bill; and be it

Resolved further, That copies of this resolution be sent by telegraph to each of our Senators and Representatives in the Congress of the United States.

WALTER N. PARRISH,
Secretary of State.

It never was intended that the amendment to the sundry civil bill which passed the House in 1912 should eliminate from the northern part of California and Nevada the fourth internal-revenue district for the purpose of collecting internal revenue, but when this bill has amendment 68 placing the revenue districts back as they were, and when the entire State of California, paying millions of dollars internal revenue, is asking and demanding that this House give their citizenship their representation in the collection of their revenue in the method of business, I say it is not economy for this House to set aside these offices and officers to the end that this Government should lose hundreds of thousands of dollars for want of proper officers to collect its revenue.

I ask this House to read the testimony of Mr. Cable, given before the Committee on Appropriations, where he says that this Government loses hundreds of thousands of dollars annually because of insufficient officers to collect the revenue. While I stand for economy, I do not believe in economizing by dispensing with officers necessary to collect the revenue of the country.

Irrespective of the time, irrespective of other appropriation bills, this State ought to have an opportunity to see that its business is provided for. I am satisfied that the conferees of the House will give this matter fair and full consideration, as they do other matters, and I trust they will see their way clear to protect the State of California, so that it will be properly represented in this matter. I have the utmost confidence in the gentlemen acting as conferees on the part of the House, and I submit it to the conferees for their careful consideration. This amendment 68 should be agreed to by the House conferees, and the fourth internal-revenue district reestablished. It is in the interest of proper administration of the laws.

Mr. JOHNSON of South Carolina. Mr. Speaker, the legislative bill does not provide how the revenue districts in the United States shall be arranged. That is a matter of Executive order. We have provided for a sufficient number of revenue districts. It is for the administrative department of the Government to so arrange these districts as to collect the revenues. When the President discontinued the four revenue districts in October, 1912, he did not inquire what districts were not needed in the interest of the public service, but the sole question that confronted him was, what districts could best be dispensed with without political embarrassment.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. JOHNSON of South Carolina. Yes.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Of what earthly use to California will these revenue collectors be, in view of the fact that the House has just voted to keep all of the wine manufactured in California within the limits of the State, the gentleman from California having voted that way?

Mr. FOSTER. Oh, they can send the wine to Philadelphia.

Mr. JOHNSON of South Carolina. Mr. Speaker, we have provided ample money for the collection of the internal revenue. The district in the State that I have the honor in part to represent was discontinued at the same time.

Mr. RAKER. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. JOHNSON of South Carolina. Yes.

Mr. RAKER. Is it not a fact that under the law as it existed before the amendment on the legislative, executive, and judicial appropriation bill for 1912 the President had absolute power and discretion, whenever he saw a district was unnecessary, to consolidate it with some other district. If that is the case, why the necessity for putting the limit upon this bill, to curtail?

Mr. JOHNSON of South Carolina. Because he had not, in the judgment of the committee, exercised the power that he had and ought to have exercised, and we put a provision in the bill that would force him to reduce the number of internal-revenue districts. Mr. Speaker, I demand the previous question.

Mr. FARR. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. JOHNSON of South Carolina. Yes.

Mr. FARR. Mr. Speaker, I desire to ask the chairman if the President abolished the districts that the committee intended he should abolish?

Mr. JOHNSON of South Carolina. Mr. Speaker, our information is that the President never inquired at the Treasury Department what districts ought to be abolished, but that he abolished those that could be abolished without political embarrassment.

Mr. FARR. Mr. Speaker, I would like to be heard upon this question.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from South Carolina has the floor.

Mr. JOHNSON of South Carolina. How much time does the gentleman want?

Mr. FARR. Three or four minutes.

Mr. JOHNSON of South Carolina. I yield to the gentleman five minutes.

Mr. FARR. Mr. Speaker, the chairman of the committee states, if I properly understood the gentleman, that the President did not abolish the four internal-revenue districts that the committee intended the President should abolish. I want to ask the chairman of the committee and the gentlemen of this House, inasmuch as the President discontinued the districts not intended to be eliminated, why they were not willing to write this bill so as to restore the four districts; one in California, one in the gentleman's district, one in Texas, and the other in Pennsylvania? Every one of them is needed for the good of the service. Their abolishment is a loss to the Government, an inconvenience to the people, and it is the duty of this House to reestablish them. I want to say to the chairman of that committee and to this House that I believe the district in Pennsylvania was abolished by the President for political reasons, because it was Roosevelt territory.

Mr. HARDWICK. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of order that there is no quorum present.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will suspend. Evidently there is a quorum present, and the gentleman from Pennsylvania will proceed.

Mr. FARR. He abolished the district because of the strong Roosevelt tendency there.

Mr. BUTLER. Mr. Speaker, I do not think the gentleman ought to say that.

Mr. FARR. I say that without fear of successful contradiction. Four other districts were discontinued by order of the President. That order was recalled and rescinded and the four districts mentioned above, including the twelfth in Pennsylvania, were abolished and merged into other districts. The people of my district, with headquarters at Scranton, Pa., were given no opportunity for a hearing or a chance to file a protest against the injury that was to be dealt them. A telegram was sent to the revenue collector on Sunday night, September 29, 1912, that the district was to be abolished the next day, when it was merged into the ninth Pennsylvania district, to the great disadvantage of my constituents.

Mr. BUTLER. I do not think the gentleman ought to say that about the President of the United States.

Mr. FARR. I say that it is my belief that the President of the United States struck at the district in the State of Pennsylvania because of the fact that it would not yield him any political strength, and I make that statement as regards the State of Texas, as regards the State of South Carolina, and as regards the State of California. I want to say to this House that it is our duty to restore those four districts.

Mr. OLMSTED. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FARR. Certainly.

Mr. OLMSTED. While I do not agree with the gentleman in his statement as to the reason why his district was one of the four cut out, I do agree that that district, which was one of the largest and most important, ought not to have been abolished or consolidated with another. It ought to be restored. The Senate amendment, putting the total number of districts back to 67 instead of 63, ought to be agreed to by the House.

Mr. FARR. The revenues in that district amounted to two and one-half million dollars a year, and within five years they increased $818,000. The district comprised some 20 counties with a population of 1,300,000, and I submit these facts to the House to show the importance of that revenue district.

Mr. GUDGER. Mr. Speaker, I rise to a point of order.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. GUDGER. The only question before the House is, Shall we refer this matter to the conferees? The gentleman is discussing questions as to what ought to be done after it is referred.

The SPEAKER. The point of order is well taken.

Mr. FARR. Mr. Speaker, what is the point of order?

The SPEAKER. The point of order is made by the gentleman from North Carolina that the only proper thing to discuss is whether this bill ought to go to the conferees.

Mr. FARR. Mr. Speaker, I rise to a parliamentary question. The other gentlemen have been permitted to discuss this question, and I was given five minutes——

The SPEAKER. But nobody made a point of order. It is not the business of the Chair to raise the point of order.

Mr. SABATH. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman may be allowed to proceed for five minutes.

Mr. HAMLIN. I object.

The SPEAKER. Objection is made; the time of the gentleman has expired, and the question is on ordering the previous question.

The question was taken, and the previous question was ordered.

The SPEAKER. The question now is on the motion of the gentleman from South Carolina.

The question was taken, and the motion was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will announce the conferees.

The Clerk read as follows:

Mr. JOHNSON of South Carolina, Mr. BURLESON, and Mr. GILLETT.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. McClintock, one of its clerks, announced that the Senate had insisted upon its amendments to the bill (H. R. 28699) making appropriations for the support of the Military Academy for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1914, and for other purposes, disagreed to by the House of Representatives, had agreed to the conference asked by the House on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon, and had appointed Mr. DU PONT, Mr. DIXON, and Mr. JOHNSTON of Alabama as the conferees on the part of the Senate.

The message also announced that the Senate had agreed to the reports of the committees of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to bills of the following titles:

H. R. 28730. An act making appropriations for the payment of invalid and other pensions of the United States for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1914, and for other purposes; and

H. R. 28766. An act to increase the limit of cost of certain public buildings, to authorize the enlargement, extension, remodeling, or improvement of certain public buildings, to authorize the erection and completion of public buildings, to authorize the purchase of sites for public buildings, and for other purposes.

NAVAL APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. PADGETT. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the naval appropriation bill (H. R. 28812), with Senate amendments numbered, may be printed.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Tennessee asks unanimous consent to print the naval appropriation bill with Senate amendments numbered.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I would like to call the attention of the gentleman to a matter in connection with the naval appropriation bill. On page 49 of the bill as reported to the House is a paragraph under the head of "Maintenance, Quartermaster's Department, Marine Corps" and under a subhead "Provisions, Marine Corps." That paragraph was stricken out on a point of order made by me. Subsequently the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. PADGETT] offered an amendment which would include, on page 49 of the original bill, from line 3 down to the word "Army," in line 15. To that amendment I made another point of order, and the Chair sustained it. Thereupon the gentleman from Tennessee offered a third amendment to include that portion of the original paragraph beginning with line 3 down to the sum named in line 12. When the bill went from the reading clerk's desk to the engrossing room it did not show that the item had been stricken out on the point of order at all. It did show that a portion of that item was stricken out, but not all that was stricken out. It shows as though it had been an original proposition and a portion of the matter that was stricken out. Of course that was one of the errors to which I did not refer the other day, caused by the pressure of business which our economical friends on the other side of the House attempt to put upon the clerks at the desk by making them do more work than human endurance can sustain, so errors creep in.

Mr. RODDENBERY. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MANN. Not at present. This bill was erroneously engrossed through no fault of the engrossing clerk and sent to the Senate. The Senate has sent over an amendment to insert the same matter as a new item without striking out what is already in the bill. In the engrossed copy there follows after the figures "$890,000" the words—

No law shall be construed to entitle enlisted men on shore duty to any rations or commutation therefor other than such as are now and may hereafter be allowed enlisted men in the Army.

The Senate, without striking out that language, which possibly they intended to, and which was erroneously sent from the Clerk's desk to the engrossing room, insert another amendment between that language and the sum and wind up by repeating this language, and, for fear the conferees would not notice it, I call the attention of the gentleman from Tennessee to the matter. I note also in these Senate amendments nearly every item which went out while the bill was in progress through the House has been reinserted by the Senate. The conferees who will be appointed on the part of the House having already by their report of the bill in the first instance indicated their desire to see these provisions go into the law, one can readily imagine that they are agreed to in fact. I will say to the gentleman from Tennessee of course in the closing hours of a short session of Congress, when the gentleman has the right to move to suspend the rules and send a bill to conference, and when that right will be exercised, if one even demands a separate vote upon a Senate amendment, you can not stop this procedure; but at the long session of Congress, when the right to suspend the rules does not exist during the last six days of the session, because the last six days of the session are not determined until usually a few hours before the session ends, the gentleman will not meet the same acquiescence at the next regular session of Congress in reference to these provisions in the naval bill which he meets now, because then we will have an opportunity to insist upon the consideration of these things in the House or in Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union.

Mr. RODDENBERY. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MANN. I do.

Mr. RODDENBERY. If the naval bill had been engrossed and read from the Speaker's table prior to its transmission to the Senate, would that not have given the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] an opportunity to have discovered if there existed the very inaccuracy and error he now points out?

Mr. MANN. It would theoretically have given me an opportunity to discover it, but it would not in fact have given me an opportunity to discover it, because I could not have told from the reading of the engrossed copy of the bill from the Clerk's desk whether this item was in or out, not remembering every word in the bill. I remembered enough about it, however, to find it out.

Mr. RODDENBERY. The gentleman remembers the reading of the engrossed bill was dispensed with by an overwhelming vote the other day, does he not?

Mr. MANN. I do not remember, but I have no doubt it was. I have no doubt I voted for it.

Mr. TRIBBLE. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MANN. Certainly.

Mr. TRIBBLE. Does the gentleman mean to say, as to the points of order that were made against the bill on the floor of the House and sustained as being legislation, that that legislation has been reinserted by the Senate, and that the conferees will agree to that legislation on the appropriation bill, and that we will finally pass measures that were put out on points of order on the floor of the House?

Mr. MANN. In the main that is correct.

Mr. ROBERTS of Massachusetts. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MANN. Certainly.

Mr. ROBERTS of Massachusetts. I understood the gentleman to say that in the next Congress, in the long session, he will not acquiesce in certain procedure with regard to the naval bill as to certain things to which he is now giving tacit assent. Does he intend to announce that that is the only bill that will meet with objection?

Mr. MANN. No; not at all. I make no differentiation in regard to the bills.

Mr. PADGETT. I renew my request for unanimous consent.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. PADGETT. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's table the naval appropriation bill, disagree to all of the Senate amendments, and agree to the conference asked by the Senate.

Mr. ROBERTS of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I would like to ask the chairman of the committee if he can and will give assurance to the House that there will be another opportunity afforded the House for a record vote on the number of battleships to be carried in the bill before the conferees come to a final agreement with the Senate, in case it should be one battleship?

Mr. PADGETT. If the House desires a separate vote.

Mr. MANN. I think before the gentleman gives any assurance of that he ought to take into consideration the time of this session. There would be an opportunity now, if any gentleman desires, to instruct the conferees, if this can be put in form so it could be done, this (Saturday) afternoon. I take it the House will be in session from now on much of the time, with recesses between, until Tuesday next. I doubt whether there will be many times when there will be as large a membership here as there is this afternoon. If the gentleman desires a vote, the vote might be called some time Sunday when it would be inconvenient to have a point of no quorum made, or Sunday night, when it would be very inconsiderate to have a vote without having all the Members here. Why can not the gentleman fix it and have the vote now?

Mr. ROBERTS of Massachusetts. I will ask the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. PADGETT] if he will agree to a vote now on the Senate amendment with regard to battleships before trying to put his bill into conference?

Mr. PADGETT. No; I think it ought to go to a conference; and then, before the conferees are announced, will be the proper time for that motion, and it can then be made.

Mr. MANN. But the gentleman has asked unanimous consent——

Mr. PADGETT. I say, so far as I am concerned, I am perfectly willing that the vote shall be taken in the House now on the battleship question, after it is ordered to conference.

Mr. HENSLEY. Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. PADGETT] yield to the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. HENSLEY]?

Mr. PADGETT. Yes, sir.

Mr. HENSLEY. Does not the chairman of the Committee on Naval Affairs regard the vote taken on the proposition only a few days ago a virtual instruction to the conferees?

Mr. PADGETT. I would, unless they gave me later instructions; and they have a right under the rules to demand a vote on that amendment if it is desired.

Mr. HENSLEY. Do I understand you are asking that another vote be taken upon that proposition?

Mr. PADGETT. I am not asking it. I said if it was demanded it could be taken.

Mr. MANN. If the gentleman from Missouri will yield, the House decided the other day on one battleship. The Senate has voted for two battleships, and, under the practice between the two Houses, it is not at all probable that the Senate will recede in conference from the two battleships unless the House has another vote on the question of two battleships; and whichever way the House votes, that will settle the question, in my judgment.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. PADGETT] asks unanimous consent——

Mr. RODDENBERY. Reserving the right to object, Mr. Speaker, I would like to inquire of the chairman of the Committee on Naval Affairs, in round numbers, what was the amount of the naval appropriation bill as it passed the House?

Mr. PADGETT. One hundred and thirty-eight millions.

Mr. RODDENBERY. In round numbers, what is the amount of the bill as it comes back from the Senate?

Mr. PADGETT. I have not had opportunity to add it up, but my understanding from the newspapers is that it carries between $148,000,000 and $150,000,000.

Mr. RODDENBERY. In other words, the bill comes back increased between ten and twelve million dollars?

Mr. PADGETT. Something like that.

Mr. RODDENBERY. And what is involved between the two Houses is whether we will get rid of all or a part of that $12,000,000 extra?

Mr. PADGETT. Yes, sir.

Mr. HOBSON. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. HOBSON. Would a vote to instruct to concur in a Senate amendment be in order before the unanimous consent is granted?

The SPEAKER. No; it would have to be after.

Mr. HOBSON. Immediately after and before the conferees are named?

The SPEAKER. That seems to be the practice.

Mr. HOBSON. I ask to be recognized for that purpose.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I ask that the gentleman from Tennessee will agree to modify his request to disagree to all the Senate amendments except the one that strikes out "one" and inserts "two" before the word "battleship," and have a separate vote on that in the House.

Mr. PADGETT. Personally I have no objection. I want to expedite the business.

Mr. ROBERTS of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, I would suggest to the gentleman that it may save suspension of the rules to get into conference, and save some time.

Mr. PADGETT. I am willing to modify my request, Mr. Speaker, to that effect.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. PADGETT] asks unanimous consent to take the naval appropriation bill from the Speaker's table and disagree to all the Senate amendments, except the two-battleship proposition, and ask for a conference.

Mr. SISSON. Now, Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object——

Mr. HEFLIN. Mr. Speaker, I object.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. HEFLIN. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, what was the statement of the gentleman? Did he desire to concur in the amendment for two battleships?

Mr. PADGETT. No; I simply asked to have a vote on that.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. PADGETT] asks unanimous consent to take the naval appropriation bill from the Speaker's table, to disagree to all the Senate amendments except the two-battleship proposition, and agree to a conference.

Mr. ROBERTS of Massachusetts. And have a separate vote as to the battleship proposition.

The SPEAKER. If any gentleman wants to instruct them as to that, he can offer a motion to do it. Is there objection?

Mr. SISSON. I reserve the right to object. I want to ask the gentleman from Tennessee a question. This matter has been settled once in the House. It was debated for quite a number of days, first and last, and the House at that time, when notice was given and everybody understood practically that the battleship question was on, was full, and Members were here to vote. Now, on this evening does it not seem to the gentleman from Tennessee that you might possibly take some gentlemen by surprise who are opposed to two battleships?

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman yield?

Mr. SISSON. I do.

Mr. MANN. There is no way of preventing a vote, either in this way or by instruction. I voted for one battleship. As a matter of fact, at this time on Saturday afternoon there is likely to be a larger vote than at any other time during the session.

Mr. TRIBBLE. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman yield?

Mr. MANN. Yes.

Mr. TRIBBLE. Is it not quite possible that the conferees can not agree, and that they will be back here for another vote anyway?

Mr. MANN. My own judgment is that if the House expresses itself now in favor of one battleship, as I think it is likely to do, the conferees will come to an agreement upon one battleship. Of course if the House at any time declines to agree to the conference report it still has the power to reject it.

Mr. FOSS. Mr. Speaker, I wish to say that I do not think the House is in a condition to pass its judgment upon this battleship proposition at the present time. This bill has not yet been printed with the Senate amendments numbered. The proposition of two battleships affects several paragraphs in this bill, and I think the chairman of the Committee on Naval Affairs has not been able—I know I have not been able—to get a copy of the bill in its accurate and correct form.

Mr. MANN. I will loan my copy to the gentleman.

Mr. FOSS. And the Members of the House are not able to get it. Now, there is no question in my mind but what there will be opportunity for the House to pass upon the question of the number of battleships. The Senate are very insistent upon their provisions, and I presume that this bill will follow the same course which it followed a year ago, when it came back into the House with one amendment in disagreement, or possibly two, namely, the battleship proposition. At that time I made a motion to concur in the Senate provision for two battleships. I trust that this bill may go to conference now without any vote on the battleship proposition at this time, because I do not think the bill is in that shape where we can intelligently pass upon this proposition.

Mr. SISSON. Mr. Speaker, I have reserved the right to object. I agree thoroughly with the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. Foss], because so many amendments have been added to this bill, as I am informed by the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. PADGETT], that even the members of the committee do not know exactly what is in the bill, and, of course, Members of the House do not.

Mr. FOSS. We have not had an opportunity to examine all the amendments.

Mr. SISSON. So I believe the only wise thing for the House to do now is to let this bill go to conference, as the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. PADGETT] originally requested. [Applause.] I shall make no objection to that, but I think the House would act unwisely at this time if it attempted to take any vote on the battleship proposition, because the Members do not know how voting the battleships in or out might affect the balance of the bill.

Mr. PADGETT. Mr. Speaker, I renew my request, and I hope it will be agreed to—that we disagree to all the Senate amendments and let the bill go to conference.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. PADGETT] asks unanimous consent to take the naval appropriation bill from the Speaker's table, disagree to all the Senate amendments, and agree to the conference asked by the Senate.

Mr. TALBOTT of Maryland. A parliamentary inquiry, Mr. Speaker.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. TALBOTT of Maryland. Of course this will not preclude a motion to concur in the Senate amendment for two battleships when it comes back in disagreement?

The SPEAKER. The Chair does not understand the gentleman.

Mr. TALBOTT of Maryland. Of course, the unanimous consent of the House to send this bill to conference will not preclude the advocates of two battleships from moving to concur in the Senate amendments when that proposition is reported back to the House in disagreement? The House will still have the right to concur in that amendment?

Mr. CALDER. Provided the Senate does not recede.

Mr. TALBOTT of Maryland. If the Senate recedes, that is another thing.

The SPEAKER. That depends on how it comes back here. If the conferees come back with a complete agreement, then you have got to accept the conference report, or reject it as a whole.

Mr. TALBOTT of Maryland. Suppose they come back with an agreement as to all of the bill except the battleships. Then a motion would be in order to concur in the Senate amendment for two battleships, would it not?

The SPEAKER. Certainly.

Mr. TALBOTT of Maryland. I do not want to lose any rights we have.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Tennessee?

There was no objection; and the Speaker announced as conferees on the part of the House Mr. PADGETT, Mr. GREGG of Texas, and Mr. Foss.

POST OFFICE APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, I present a conference report, being a partial agreement on the Post Office appropriation bill (H. R. 27148), and I ask that the statement be read in lieu of the report.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Tennessee presents a conference report on the Post Office appropriation bill and asks that the statement be read in lieu of the report. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The statement of the House conferees was read.

The conference report and statement of the House conferees are as follows:

JOHN A. MOON,
DAVID E. FINLEY,
JOHN W. WEEKS,
Managers on the part of the House.

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House agree to the conference report; that it concur in Senate amendment 25, and further insist on its disagreement to Senate amendment 26 and ask for a conference.

Mr. MURDOCK. Mr. Speaker, I ask that the motion to concur and disagree be put separately.

Mr. MANN. The gentleman can only make a motion to adopt the conference report.

The SPEAKER. For what purpose does the gentleman from Illinois rise?

Mr. MANN. The gentleman from Tennessee has stated three motions together. The motion is to adopt the conference report.

Mr. CALLAWAY. Mr. Speaker, I want to ask the gentleman a question. Under amendment 25 I understand the motion is to concur in that amendment.

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. The motion was made that way, but I take it that the Speaker will put the motion separately.

Mr. COOPER. Mr. Speaker, I desire to ask the gentleman from Tennessee whether there is anything in this report about the increase or decrease of second-class postage?

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. No, sir.

Mr. LLOYD. Mr. Speaker, I did not hear all of the conference report read. What was the disposition of amendment 25?

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. There was no agreement.

Mr. LLOYD. The gentleman proposes to submit to the House the question whether it will agree to Senate amendment 25?

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. Certainly. Amendments 25 and 26 are not involved in the motion to agree to the conference report.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will state that the Senate amendments 25 and 26 are not involved in this motion of the gentleman from Tennessee to agree to the conference report.

Mr. HARDWICK. Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask the gentleman a question. There has been a good deal of controversy about whether the railway mail clerks and employees were to get the advances in pay in accordance with what some of us thought was the intent of the act of Congress passed some years ago. Has that matter been disposed of in this bill?

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. The House provision on that subject was very clear in providing for a promotion and increased pay according to the construction of the act by the House. The Senate has receded on every single proposition.

Mr. HARDWICK. On the proposition as it now stands the low-grade employees will get the increase?

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. They will.

Mr. COX. Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask the gentleman if amendment 25 be adopted it will continue these commissions?

The SPEAKER. The Chair will state again, as he has already stated, amendments 25 and 26 are not involved in the motion of the gentleman from Tennessee. The motion of the gentleman from Tennessee is to agree to the conference report.

The question was taken, and the conference report was agreed to.

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. Now, Mr. Speaker, I move that the House concur in Senate amendment 25.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Tennessee moves that the House concur in Senate amendment numbered 25, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

For the transmission of mail by pneumatic tubes or other similar devices, $962,200 (25): Provided, That the personnel of the membership of the committees and commissions created and provided for in sections 1 and 8 of the act entitled "An act making appropriations for the service of the Post Office Department for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1913, and for other purposes," approved August 24, 1912, shall continue with the same authorities, powers, and provisions for expenses until final report is made to Congress.

Mr. SISSON. Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask the gentleman from Tennessee the question I intended to ask prior to the vote on the conference report. I notice in the last appropriation bill that passed the House there were 10 commissioners or committee men on the Post Office and Post Roads Commission, 6 on the Parcel Post Commission, 6 on the Second-class Mail Matter Commission, and 4 on the pneumatic-tube matter. This bill proposes to continue these 26 committee men?

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. To continue the four committees, because they have not yet reported to Congress in accordance with the order of the House.

Mr. SISSON. How much has the personnel changed?

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. There are four commissions and four vacancies.

Mr. SISSON. I notice no provision is made for the payment of the commissioners or committee men—some portions of the act call them committee men and some joint commissioners.

Now, is it in the mind of the committee that these gentlemen who are soon to be retired from Congress will be paid a salary?

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. No; it is not the purpose that they are to be paid a salary. They could not be paid a salary under the law. There is no provision here for it, and they are not asking for a salary.

Mr. SISSON. I understand they could not be paid any under this act, but the gentleman knows the rule—that when a man has served on these committees or commissions without pay they have a way of getting it subsequently, as they attempted to for the California Exposition and the Buffalo Hygienic Congress, to get the United States to pay them.

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, I know of no such rule. Of course we can not tell what the next Congress may do on the subject of pay if it is asked for it, but I want to say to the gentleman that these gentlemen are not anxious to retain the position here. I have talked with two of them about it, and they say they would be glad to continue in the service as members of this committee, but under no circumstances would they permit this Congress to pay them for it, because no other member would be paid.

Mr. SISSON. Mr. Speaker, if 4 members out of the 26 have gone out of Congress, what objection would there be to filling the vacancies on these various committees from the respective parties, so as to keep up the personnel in reference to the political parties as the commissions now exist?

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, I have made this motion to concur in order that this matter may come before the House, and that the House may take just such action in respect to it as it desires to take. It is utterly immaterial to me whether it concurs or nonconcurs, but it looks to me like a part of common sense, if we continue the commissions at all, that we continue the personnel of the commissions, for the reason that these commissions have been at work and they have gathered much information of value. It so happens in this case that one or two of the gentlemen who go out have been the most active and valuable men connected with these commissions and possess more information than others. I do not think because a Member of the House happens to go out, after he has rendered a service on this commission, that the House ought to disarrange the work and action of the commission on that account, but it would better move along smoothly, as it has heretofore, and get the benefit of the experience and labor of these gentlemen.

Mr. SISSON. Mr. Speaker, I want to ask the gentleman this one question. Since the appointment of these committees, so far as the Senate is concerned, and I believe that so far as one of these committees is concerned, the political complexion of the Congress has changed. Does not the gentleman believe that it would be better if we are going to have these committees continued, that the power be in the next House or in the next Senate to appoint these committees or commissions, if they are necessary, in accordance with the political complexion of the two respective Houses?

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, I will say to the gentleman from Mississippi that I do not look at public questions just exactly in that way. This is not a political question and ought not to be, and is not in any sense. It is not political with any well-balanced and orderly mind. [Laughter.] If these questions are to be decided according to the law and facts and the business interests of the country, it appears to me that the men who have in part performed the service and who are capable of performing the service, and who are willing without compensation to continue, ought to be continued as a matter of benefit to the Government of the United States.

It does not matter to me, and ought not to the gentleman, the snap of a finger whether some man who goes off is a Republican or a Democrat, if the work is being done well or properly. There is no political question involved, and if there was and the gentleman thinks the Democratic Party is going to be hurt by it, I suggest to him that we are going to have a majority in the next Senate, and a hundred in this House and they certainly have sense enough to take care of the interests of the Democratic Party.

Mr. SISSON. Mr. Speaker, I want to say this, that so far as I am personally concerned, I always believed that a man's mind is not in the least disordered when he thinks a good Democrat can do anything better than a good Republican.

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. I have seen it happen both ways.

Mr. COX. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. I yield to the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. Cox].

Mr. COX. Mr. Speaker, I offer the following preferential motion, which I send to the desk and ask to have read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend Senate amendment 25 by adding at the end thereof the following:

"Which shall be made on or before March 4, 1914."

Mr. COX. Mr. Speaker, I move to concur with that amendment, which I submit.

Mr. CALLAWAY. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. I yield to the gentleman from Texas.

Mr. CALLAWAY. Mr. Speaker, I see in amendment 25 that the personnel of the membership of those committees is continued as it is now, and I understand that four of those go out of this Congress.

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. Yes; that has all been stated on the floor two or three times.

Mr. CALLAWAY. I understand from the gentleman from Tennessee that there is no provision to pay these people any salary for continuing on this work.

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. None whatever.

Mr. CALLAWAY. And I understand the gentleman to say that he wants these people continued on these commissions without any provision for salary at all.

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. I did not say that I wanted anything done at all. I said I presented the matter to the House for its judgment. My own opinion is that the amendment ought to be concurred in, and as a matter of law there is no salary carried with the service.

Mr. CALLAWAY. The gentleman wants them to continue?

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. I have no objection.

Mr. CALLAWAY. The gentleman would continue them without any salary?

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. Certainly.

Mr. CALLAWAY. Does the gentleman believe these men will continue their services without any compensation?

A MEMBER. If they do not, they will resign.

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. I have had expression from two of them, who will continue the work provided no salary comes to them, and they would not touch it with a salary.

Mr. CALLAWAY. Does the gentleman think this House ought to pass a law here continuing the personnel of that commission without any salary?

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. The other members do not get a salary; nobody gets a salary connected with it.

Mr. CALLAWAY. I know they do not; but they are in the public service as Congressmen, drawing their salaries as Representatives of the people, and when put on this commission they are expected to serve without a salary or anything except their expenses.

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. It is a very simple proposition. If they do not want to serve without a salary they can resign. That power is vested here now. I want to say further, as a reason for a continuation of this, that they have in part performed this service. They are familiar with what has been done and what ought to be done and with all the papers in connection with this work, and to break up this commission and put new men in means to start fresh.

Mr. CALLAWAY. If they have performed this service in part by collecting data, and so forth, that data is a matter of record and can be come-at-able by any other men put on the commission, would it not?

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. Yes; Euclid is come-at-able to any man who gets his hands on it, but it does not mean he understands it.

Mr. MANN. Will the gentleman permit a question? Does the gentleman have any objection to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. Cox]?

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. No; I have no objection to that amendment.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the motion made by the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. Cox] to concur with an amendment.

The question was taken and the motion was agreed to.

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House further insist on its disagreement to Senate amendment No. 26 and ask for a conference.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. MANN. The gentleman from Indiana having offered an amendment to the Senate amendment, was that amendment just agreed to or was the Senate amendment agreed to?

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. I understood the Chair to announce the amendment was agreed to as amended.

The SPEAKER. The motion of the gentleman from Indiana was to concur with an amendment, and the Chair so declared. Now, the gentleman from Tennessee will state his motion over again.

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. That the House further insist on its disagreement to Senate amendment No. 26 and ask for a further conference.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Tennessee moves that the House insist upon its disagreement to Senate amendment No. 26 and ask for a further conference.

Mr. MURDOCK. Mr. Speaker, I desire to offer a preferential motion. I move that the House recede from its disagreement to Senate amendment No. 26 and concur in the same with an amendment as follows: Strike out the following words in Senate amendment No. 26:

Provided further, That on account of the increased weight of mails resulting from the establishment of the parcel post the Postmaster General is authorized and directed to weigh the mails on railroad routes, for not less than 30 successive working days, and to readjust compensation from the date of the commencement of said weighing at not exceeding the rates provided by law: Provided further, That from the commencement of said weighing the transportation of second-class matter in fast freight trains and the manner of handling incident thereto shall be discontinued, and thereafter said mail shall be carried in the regular mail trains and compensation allowed therefor, the purpose being to reestablish the system in vogue prior to the establishment of the blue-tag system.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. Stuart, one of its clerks, announced that the Senate had passed bill of the following title, in which the concurrence of the House of Representatives was requested:

S. 8575. An act to authorize the town of Okanogan, Wash., to construct and maintain a bridge across the Okanogan River.

POST OFFICE APPROPRIATION BILL.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report Senate amendment No. 26 and then report the amendment offered by the gentleman from Kansas.

The Clerk read as follows:

Provided, That no part of this appropriation shall be paid for carrying the mail over the bridge across the Mississippi River at St. Louis, Mo., other than upon a mileage basis: But provided further, That the Postmaster General may, in his discretion, pay within the present law a fair and reasonable price for the special transfer and terminal service at the Union Station at East St. Louis, Ill., and at the Union Station at St. Louis, Mo., including the use, lighting, and heating of the mail building, and transfer service at St. Louis, Mo., provided the amount so paid shall not exceed $20,000: Provided further, That on account of the increased weight of mails resulting from the establishment of the parcel post the Postmaster General is authorized and directed to weigh the mails on railroad routes, for not less than 30 successive working days, and to readjust compensation from the date of the commencement of said weighing at not exceeding the rates provided by law: Provided further, That from the commencement of said weighing the transportation of second-class matter in fast freight trains and the manner of handling incident thereto shall be discontinued, and thereafter said mail shall be carried in the regular mail trains and compensation allowed therefor, the purpose being to reestablish the system in vogue prior to the establishment of the blue-tag system.

The SPEAKER. Now, the Clerk will report the amendment of the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. MURDOCK].

The Clerk read as follows:

Strike out the following words in Senate amendment No. 26:

"Provided further, That on account of the increased weight of mails resulting from the establishment of the parcel post the Postmaster General is authorized and directed to weigh the mails on railroad routes for not less than 30 successive working days and to readjust compensation from the date of the commencement of said weighing at not exceeding the rates provided by law: Provided further, That from the commencement of said weighing the transportation of second-class matter in fast freight trains and the manner of handling incident thereto shall be discontinued, and thereafter said mail shall be carried in the regular mail trains and compensation allowed therefor, the purpose being to reestablish the system in vogue prior to the establishment of the blue-tag system."

Mr. ANDERSON. Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER. For what purpose does the gentleman rise?

Mr. ANDERSON. For a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. ANDERSON. The proposal of the gentleman from Kansas is to strike out two substantive propositions. Is it in order to demand a division of that question?

The SPEAKER. It is not on the question of striking out two substantive propositions; it is a question of whether the amendment itself contains more than one substantive proposition.

Mr. MURDOCK. Mr. Speaker, Senate amendment numbered 26 to the House bill provides several things.

First, it makes the ordinary appropriation of a lump sum for transportation of mail by railroad routes. Then comes the first proviso in the paragraph, one relating to a reduction in the compensation made to the St. Louis Terminal Co. for the transportation of mail across the bridge at St. Louis, a matter of frequent controversy, but which just now is comparatively a minor matter.

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. Is the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. MURDOCK] entitled to the floor? I have not yielded it.

The SPEAKER. Of course the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. MOON] is entitled to the floor, and can yield as much time as he wishes.

Mr. MURDOCK. Of course the gentleman from Tennessee is entitled to the floor.

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. How much time does the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. MURDOCK] wish?

Mr. MURDOCK. About 10 minutes.

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. I think we can stand the gentleman for 10 minutes.

Mr. MURDOCK. All right; I hope the gentleman can.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Kansas [Mr. MURDOCK] is recognized for 10 minutes.

Mr. MURDOCK. The second proposition in this amendment is a very important one. It proposes a special weighing of the mails throughout the entire country. The third proposition in this amendment is one which seeks to return to the regular mail service second-class matter which has been recently taken out of the regular mail service and dispatched, with economy, by fast freight. Now, the item in toto involves an increased expenditure to the Government of $9,857,000.

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. May I ask the gentleman to explain it?

Mr. MURDOCK. The gentleman has given me only 10 minutes.

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. I will give the gentleman more time on that.

Mr. MURDOCK. Now, if the gentleman will, and does not shut me off, I will explain. That expenditure is divided as follows: The increase to the Government by reason of the increased weights found in a special weighing of the regular mail, and not parcel-post mail, will be annually $3,361,000. The increase by reason of increased weight due to the addition of parcel post to the mail system will be $4,011,000. The increase in expenditure through abandoning the blue-tag system and taking certain second-class mail matter out of fast freights and putting it back in the regular mail system will be $1,485,000.

Mr. WEEKS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MURDOCK. I will not yield at this time. Let me complete this proposition.

The cost of the special weighing itself will be $500,000. Now, I want to say to the House I fully appreciate there is an added burden upon the railroads by reason of the adoption of a parcel-post system. The weights are heavier because of that; but there is no reason under heaven why Congress should grant increased pay to the railroads on classes of mail matter other than parcel post. And I make that statement with the following idea in mind: This country, for the weighing of the mails, is divided into four different sections. New England is one section; the South is another; west of the Mississippi is another; and the Central States compose the fourth. The mails are weighed in one of these four sections once every four years. The original rate of pay to the railroads was based on the proposition that these weighings in the sections were to be quadrennial; that there would be an increase in the weight of mail during the passage of four years after the weighing in each one of these sections. Now, the proposition of this Senate amendment is to depart from the old system of the quadrennial weighing without changing the basis of pay to the railroads, and to have an annual weighing for the whole country.

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MURDOCK. I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. I understand the gentleman does not agree to this amendment?

Mr. MURDOCK. Certainly not. I do not agree to it in toto. I agree to a part of it.

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. I do not agree to it either. I do not see that there is any dispute between us.

Mr. MURDOCK. I want to get this House on record on this proposition. The gentleman from Tennessee knows that at this late hour in the session, after this bill has gone again to conference and has come again here in the rush of business it will be impossible to get a separate vote on this proposition.

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. Let me ask the gentleman further. The gentleman concedes he opposes this amendment. The three House conferees are in opposition to it. Do you want to tie the hands of the conferees by instructions, and keep us continually passing over here to the Senate on the question?

Mr. MURDOCK. Not at all, but I want the House to have a separate vote on this proposition. It is of major importance. The amount involved in this paragraph is considerably more than the cost of a battleship. We have a commission at present investigating this matter of railway mail pay. Why start in now, why come in at this point with an absolute change of system, involving an increased expenditure on the part of the Government of millions of dollars?

I desire to say to the gentleman that if the Government is to abandon the quadrennial weighing of the mails as a basis for the pay, then there should be material changes in the rate of pay, and it should not come piecemeal. The Government should not be foreclosed its rights in the premises, and we ought not to change one part of the system, namely, the matter of weight, without changing the other part of the system, which is the matter of rate of pay.

Now I want to yield to the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. WEEKS], whom I took off the floor, I fear, rather unfairly.

Mr. WEEKS. What I wish to ask of the gentleman from Kansas is how accurate his figures are, and where he gets them?

Mr. MURDOCK. I understand they were given to the Senate by the Post Office Department.

Mr. WEEKS. Of course they are estimates at best.

Mr. MURDOCK. Oh, they are absolutely estimates. But I want to ask the gentleman from Massachusetts, Why can we not ascertain what the parcel post has added to the mails and increase the pay to the railroads on the basis of that ascertainment? Why increase the pay on regular mail matter?

Mr. WEEKS. Let me ask the gentleman from Kansas how he would do it?

Mr. MURDOCK. I would first have a weighing, and then increase the pay in proportion to the weight carried by respective railroads.

Mr. LEWIS. Mr. Speaker, may I ask a question of the gentleman from Massachusetts?

Mr. MURDOCK. Yes; I yield to the gentleman for that purpose.

Mr. LEWIS. The Post Office Department for statistical purposes will be taking the weight of all the parcels shipped. It will also be taking the zones to which they are destined. The zones and the weight together will give them an aggregate of the express parcel matter. From that the department can determine how much is owing to the railroads as a whole for this excess traffic. It can then agree to pay the railroads for this excess service, not letter rates, but express railway rates, which are less than one-half the rates paid for carrying letters.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Kansas has expired.

Mr. MURDOCK. Mr. Speaker, I will ask the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. MOON] to yield to me five minutes more, and then I shall not encroach on his good nature further.

Mr. MANN rose.

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. All right. Mr. Speaker, I yield five minutes more to the gentleman from Kansas.

Mr. MURDOCK. Now I yield to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN].

Mr. MANN. I want to ask the gentleman as to a question of procedure. This amendment is the only Senate amendment left in disagreement, is it not?

Mr. MURDOCK. I was not aware of that fact.

Mr. WEEKS. It is.

Mr. MANN. Oh, yes. Every amendment was disposed of except two in the conference report, and we have just agreed to the other one. That being the case, if the conference report comes back here it comes back squarely on that one amendment. Would it not be advisable to disagree to the Senate amendment and permit the bill to go to conference, so that if the conference committee does not report back an arrangement that is satisfactory to the gentleman, he can then make his fight?

Mr. MURDOCK. I am sorry to see the gentleman take that view. Here is an opportunity. There is no reason why we should not have action at the present time.

Mr. MANN. The gentleman has prepared an amendment, but I have not the slightest idea as to what it is.

Mr. MURDOCK. It is a simple amendment. It strikes out that part referring to the special weighing and the blue-tag provision, and otherwise it is the same as the original Senate amendment.

I want to say further that the trend of opinion in this country among many who understand the question or who are active in regard to it is, in my opinion, to get away from weight as the basis for the payment of the transportation of the mail, and to take up space as a basis.

Now, after long, long years of fraud, the graft has been boiled out of the weight proposition in the carriage of the mails. Within the last 5 years, and for the first time in 35 years, the weight basis has been honest. Before that it was dishonest. Now, the tendency is to get away from the tangible, visible element of weight as a basis of pay, and go into a thing like space as a basis, space used in the railroad cars for the carriage of mails, 10, 20, 30, 40, or 50 feet of space in a car.

Mr. LLOYD. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MURDOCK. Just a moment. As soon as this special weighing proposition becomes a law, that moment, in my opinion, you will have the last weighing covering this country. And thereafter, by reason of the drift in this matter, we will pass from weight as a basis of pay entirely and go into the matter of space, with a resultant increase of expenditure to the Government, not of two or three or five or nine million dollars, but of many million dollars more.

Mr. LLOYD. Is the gentleman aware of the fact that the railroad companies, who are the other party interested in the question of railway-mail pay, are opposed to the space basis, and in all the hearings thus far had before the railway-mail pay commission they have opposed it vigorously?

Mr. MURDOCK. They never have in discussing it with me, I will say to the gentleman.

I yield back the balance of my time. I hope the House will adopt my amendment. [Applause.]

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, on account of the insistence of the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. MURDOCK], while there was no direct agreement made to do so, it was impliedly understood in the House from what I said when this matter went to conference that the conferees would bring this question back to the House for consideration. We have purposely done so, making a partial report, leaving only two items to be disposed of in the whole bill; and then, on a motion to concur, we disposed of that one in the House this evening, leaving the single question at issue in which the gentleman from Kansas is concerned.

We did this in order that he might have, if he wanted it, a separate vote upon the question, which he could not have had if a full report had been brought in. Now he seeks to impose upon the conferees an instruction. He ought to know that on the questions involved in this proposition the Senate, by an almost unanimous vote, having put this amendment in, we can not go back and have a full and free conference. If we are instructed, we can only say to them what the opinion of the House is upon the question, and they can reply to us that that is not the opinion of the Senate, and we shall go through the futile and senseless performance of coming back here and again asking for further instruction. I think it is not a wise thing to agree to the gentleman's amendment or to tie the hands of the conferees. We can probably reach an agreement that will be satisfactory to this House if we have a full and free conference. If we do not do that, it is in the power of the House, there being but this one question at issue, to vote upon the matter and determine it as it will. I hope the House will not vote to sustain this proposition of the gentleman from Kansas.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the motion of the gentleman from Kansas to recede and concur as to Senate amendment 26.

The question being taken, the Speaker announced that the noes appeared to have it.

Mr. MURDOCK. Division, Mr. Speaker.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 76, noes 67.

Mr. MOON of Tennessee and Mr. HENRY of Texas made the point of no quorum present.

The Speaker, after counting, announced 181 Members present, not a quorum.

Mr. HARDWICK. I move a call of the House.

The SPEAKER. It is automatic. The Doorkeeper will lock the doors, the Sergeant at Arms will notify absentees, and the Clerk will call the roll. Those in favor of the motion of the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. MURDOCK] will vote "yea," those opposed "nay."

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 118, nays 168, answered "present" 13, not voting 82, as follows:

The motion was agreed to.

The SPEAKER appointed as conferees on the part of the House Mr. MOON of Tennessee, Mr. FINLEY, and Mr. WEEKS.

ARMY APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. HAY. Mr. Speaker, I call up the conference report on the bill H. R. 27941, the Army appropriation bill, and ask unanimous consent that the statement be read in lieu of the report.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Virginia calls up the conference report on the Army appropriation bill and asks unanimous consent that the statement be read in lieu of the report. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The conference report and statement are as follows:

CONFERENCE REPORT (NO. 1602).

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 27941) making appropriations for the support of the Army for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1914, having met, after full and free conference have agreed to recommend and do recommend to their respective Houses as follows:

That the Senate recede from its amendments numbered 4, 5, 7, 14, 16, 19, 35, 36, 38, and 39.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendments of the Senate numbered 6, 8, 9, 11, 12, 13, 15, 17, 18, 20, 21, 22, 24, 25, 27, 28, 32, 33, and 34, and agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 1: That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 1, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the matter proposed to be inserted by said amendment insert the following: "and the actual and necessary traveling expenses incurred by military attachés abroad under orders from the Secretary of War"; and the Senate agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 2: That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 2, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: Restore the language proposed to be stricken out by said amendment, amended as follows: In line 4, after the word "increased," strike out the word "fifty" and in lieu thereof insert "thirty-five"; and the Senate agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 3: That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 3, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the matter proposed to be inserted by said amendment insert the following: ": Provided, That hereafter, in determining the eligibility, under the provisions of the act of Congress approved August 24, 1912, of troop, battery, or company officers for detail as officers of the various staff corps and departments of the Army, except the General Staff Corps, service actually performed by any such officer with troops prior to December 15, 1912, as a regimental, battalion, or squadron staff officer, shall be deemed to have been duty with a battery, company, or troop: Provided further, That regimental, battalion, and squadron quartermasters and commissaries shall hereafter be required to perform the duties of officers of the Quartermaster Corps, including the receipting for any money or property pertaining to said corps, when no officer of the Quartermaster Corps is present for such duties, and nothing contained in the Army appropriation act approved August 24, 1912, shall hereafter be held or construed so as to prevent competent authority from requiring any officers of the Army to act temporarily as quartermasters wherever there shall be no officers of the Quartermaster Corps and no regimental, battalion, or squadron quartermasters or commissaries present for such duty"; and the Senate agree to the same.

JAMES HAY,
JAMES L. SLAYDEN,
GEO. W. PRINCE,
Managers on the part of the House.

Mr. HAY. Mr. Speaker, if any gentleman desires to ask a question, I will try and answer him.

Mr. RODDENBERY. That is the purpose for which I rose. There was a little disorder, and I could not understand whether the conference report covered a complete agreement or whether it was only on certain items.

Mr. HAY. It is a complete agreement.

Mr. RODDENBERY. Has the gentleman made any accurate calculation as to the amount that the bill will carry as agreed upon over what it was when it passed the House?

Mr. HAY. The Senate added $680,000 to the bill, and receded from $319,000.

Mr. RODDENBERY. Leaving a net increase of about $300,000 over the amount as it passed the House?

Mr. HAY. Yes.

Mr. RODDENBERY. What about the powder item?

Mr. HAY. The Senate receded and leaves the limitation upon the price of powder as passed by the House.

Mr. RODDENBERY. The limitation fixed in the bill as passed by the House?

Mr. HAY. Yes.

Mr. RODDENBERY. I understood that the Senate had receded with the limit fixed by the House removed.

Mr. HAY. No; the statement read that the Senate receded from its action in striking out the limitation fixed by the House.

Mr. TILSON. Will the gentleman yield to me?

Mr. HAY. I yield to the gentleman from Connecticut.

Mr. TILSON. Mr. Speaker, as is well known to many Members of the House, I have been deeply interested in the establishment of a national military reserve. For nearly two years I have been studying this subject. About a year ago I introduced a bill (H. R. 24601) providing for such a reserve, and a little later submitted to the House some observations on behalf of the bill. Unfortunately, that bill sleeps the sleep of the just in the archives of the Committee on Military Affairs. The principle of it, however, was recognized in a rider to the current appropriation bill, in which the period of enlistment was fixed at seven years, but instead of fixing the period of service with the colors at three or, better, two years and with the reserve four or five years, four years are required with the colors and only three in the reserve.

I sincerely believe that an adequate military reserve of trained men is one of the absolute necessities of a proper system of national defense, and that it must be established in the near future if those responsible for the maintenance of our military establishment would escape serious blame for any national disaster suffered for lack of it.

In the last issue of the Infantry Journal is a brief article written by me on the subject of "The necessity for a military reserve." I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD by printing the article referred to, together with an editorial on the subject by Maj. Evan M. Johnson, jr., and extracts from advance sheets of an article by Maj. Carl Reichmann on the same general subject.

The article, editorial, and extracts referred to are as follows:

THE NECESSITY FOR A MILITARY RESERVE.

(By Hon. JOHN Q. TILSON, M. C., lieutenant colonel Second Infantry, Connecticut National Guard.)

Like many others, I had assumed that if substantially half the enlisted men of a military organization were well trained, this half would rapidly train the other half, especially in time of war. Our system of having a prescribed war strength in our regulations and an actual peace strength of a little more than half the number seems to have been founded upon this theory.

The skeleton regiments of certain foreign countries would indicate that the same notion has prevailed elsewhere. It has never been tried out in our Army, even in time of peace. Prior to the mobilization of a division in Texas in the spring of 1911 no large maneuvers of regular troops exclusively were held in the United States. Many of the organizations mobilized there were below the authorized peace strength. As trouble on the Mexican border was confidently expected, recruiting was rushed and recruits sent forward to fill up the various organizations as rapidly as possible. Some of the companies had as high as 45 per cent of new men. Company commanders and higher officers complained bitterly of the demoralization caused by the injection of so large a percentage of untrained men. Many officers expressed the opinion that if it were a case of real fight they would rather go into it with the peace-strength company of trained men than with a war-strength company nearly half of whom are raw recruits. In other words, that 60 trained men would be more effective in battle than 60 trained men plus 40 raw recruits mingled with them. If this be so, and its acceptance by so many of the best-informed officers of the Army would indicate that it is coming to be generally accepted, then something should be done.

There are at least three ways of meeting the situation.

First, by reducing the prescribed war strength to the present peace strength. An insuperable objection to this plan is that the small number of rifles as compared to the number of officers would make such an organization extravagantly expensive in case of a large army in time of war. In addition to the increased expense, such an organization would make the usual tactical units too small for the greatest efficiency.

Second, by increasing the present peace strength to the prescribed war strength. This method would be most acceptable to the Army itself, provided that the number of organizations and the commissioned strength were not diminished while the enlisted strength was so greatly increased. The expense of maintaining such a force in time of peace would, of course, greatly increase the total expense of the Army, a thing of itself undesirable.

Third, by the establishment and maintenance of a reserve in such a way as to be able at short notice to fill the ranks of all organizations to the prescribed war strength with trained men.

The reserve provided for in H. R. 24601, introduced by me last year, contemplates accomplishing just this purpose. In this bill the proposed reserve is divided into two classes, somewhat imperfectly described as active and inactive. Under its provisions the active reserve is to be carried on the rolls of the several organizations of the Regular Army and of the Organized Militia, but not to serve with the colors, except for a brief period each year at maneuvers. The inactive reserve is intended to constitute a second line of defense, and to serve as a reservoir from which to draw men to supply wastage in the first line.

The essential and distinguishing feature of the proposed reserve is that it shall consist of men already trained, and that these men shall be available for immediate service. With such a plan in operation the Army would become essentially a school for the training of soldiers, and that under such conditions that the men would be withdrawn from their several civil pursuits during the period of schooling only, but be available for immediate service in case of war.

In all schemes not purely ideal or visionary it is incumbent upon the proposer to show the practicability of the proposed plan. In a speech delivered in the House of Representatives last July, I submitted figures showing the approximate cost of such a reserve and how it could be established and maintained. It was there shown that a reserve large enough to fill every organization of the Army to the prescribed war strength could be maintained for $775,000, or just about the cost of maintaining two infantry regiments. I shall speak here only of the necessity for such a reserve.

The wars of the future will come suddenly and be decided quickly. The transmission of intelligence by electricity and the wonderful development of firearms combine to make this a certainty. The possibilities of destruction are at present so great as to make it impossible for wars to long endure. Time was when the country having the greater resources usually won in the long run. The time is at hand when the country that is ready for war will win while the country with great resources only is still absorbed in making preparation. "In time of peace prepare for war" is a truism so generally accepted that few would attempt to deny its truth or wisdom. If it were possible for us to know, for instance, that on July 4, 1915, the United States would be at war with a first-rate power, what busy months of preparation we should see. A few extra millions properly expended during the two and a half years interim would save billions of dollars, thousands of lives, and possibly the result of the war itself.

When war comes not only is there no time to train men to shoot and to take care of themselves in the field, but other more absorbing matters prevent this even when there is time. It is common knowledge that at the first battle of Bull Run both sides lacked training. Just before the Federal troops broke and ran away only Jackson's Stone Wall Brigade—the one that gave him his immortal title—stood between the Confederate Army and demoralization. Maj. Gen. Upton, in speaking of the causes of this disaster, begins as follows:

"First among them was the popular but mistaken belief that because our citizens individually possess courage, fortitude, and self-reliance they must necessarily possess the same qualities when aggregated as soldiers. And next to this error was the fatal delusion that an army animated by patriotism needed neither instruction nor discipline to prepare it for battle."

Unfortunately the mistaken belief and fatal delusion referred to by Gen. Upton still have a place in the popular imagination. At the battle of Antietam, although there were seasoned veterans on both sides, there were a number of regiments, especially on the Union side, absolutely without training. Many men engaged in that battle fired the first shot of their lives on that day, and unfortunately for many of them the last shot as well. I recall the history of two Connecticut regiments, which played a gallant part throughout their service, but were far from ready for such a battle at that time. The Fourteenth Regiment Connecticut Volunteer Infantry was mustered into service August 23, 1862, and the Sixteenth Connecticut was mustered in on August 24, 1862. Both participated in this the bloodiest one-day battle of the war on September 17, 1862. These two organizations serve only as illustrations, for there were others in the same condition in this battle and in others throughout the war. It is sad to note the losses among these untrained troops, and sadder still to observe that, in spite of all their individual courage and heroism, they were ineffective until they had received their training.

So far as preparation was concerned, very little seems to have been learned from the terrible lessons of the Civil War. The Spanish War found the country in practically the same situation. Again, there was neither time nor facilities for properly training new organizations. In many regiments no provision whatever was made to teach the men how to shoot. Nor was this the fault of regimental commanders. In the regiment to which I belonged there was no opportunity whatever for rifle practice, although the commanding officer was capable and unusually energetic in seeking every means to fit his command for service. After three months of carrying his rifle at drill, a lean, lanky Tennessee mountaineer in that regiment expressed it thus in his own language: "This is the fust d——d gun I ever toted till I wore it out without shootin' it." On account of his previous experience with a squirrel rifle this particular soldier might have been dangerous to the enemy in battle, but there were many in that regiment and in others without such experience who in battle would have been quite as dangerous to friend as foe.

All agree that a reserve of rifles should be established and maintained. Year after year Congress has appropriated for this purpose, until we now have almost a million rifles, with about 180,000,000 rounds of ammunition. Perhaps the most urgent need of the Army to-day, so far as matériel is concerned, is a reserve of field guns with an adequate reserve of ammunition. The present Congress is asked to make a substantial appropriation for this purpose, and it will undoubtedly do so, if it acts wisely. Even clothing, equipment, and tentage are all kept in reserve. In fact, we have reserves of everything except the most important thing of all—we have no reserve of men. In every war of our history such a reserve would have been of inestimable value and would have saved many times its cost in treasure as well as in human lives. In the speech above referred to I pointed out the increasing necessity for such a reserve of trained men. Every passing year will accentuate the need. If in a war of the future it shall turn out that no steps have been taken to thus avail ourselves of our greatest resource, our trained men, we shall not be free from blame who have had the responsibility and have failed to meet it wisely.

RESERVES.

[Editorial by Maj. Evan M. Johnson, jr.]

Among the great nations of the world, the United States occupies the unique position of having no system of reserves whereby to raise her peace organizations to war strength when the occasion arises for their use. Only in States like Uruguay, Peru, Siam, Mexico, Santo Domingo, and Haiti is a similar condition found. Our policy is to depend upon patriotism or, this failing, upon bounties offered by the States and the United States to swell the ranks when war demands the services of our citizens, for it is evident that the only source from which we can draw the recruit with which to swell our armies is our untrained citizens. We should have profited by the lesson of the past, but, alas, final success has made us forget the unnecessary and frightful toll paid in death through disease and on the battle field. In the Civil War veteran regiments dwindled into nothingness through lack of reserves, and their places were taken by new ones, raw and untrained, who in turn paid their toll to the grim reaper, and in turn disappeared for like cause.

The little Regular Army that in 1898 fought at Santiago averaged but 560 men per regiment, it having been impossible to obtain the recruits necessary to raise them to the required 1,200 each before embarking on the expedition. And had this been possible it may be doubted whether the influx of a mass of raw, untrained material would not have made them so ineffective that the expedition would at that time have been impossible. Those who went were at least trained soldiers, and as such won an almost impossible victory. At the close of the campaign, due to the battle losses and tropical conditions, the Army was so depleted as to be ineffective. Had the war happily not terminated we would have been without regulars and would have been obliged to continue with untrained volunteers. The loss among these, as it was, without the vicissitudes of campaign, was appalling. What this loss would have been had their use therein been necessary one does not like to consider. To remedy this condition there is a means so simple, so economical, that the failure to apply it is difficult to understand. As already stated, practically every nation provides for a reserve of trained men whereby to fill to war strength the ranks of its peace organizations, and to replenish loss during war, but until the last moments of the last session of Congress no steps had even been taken by our lawmakers to make like provision, although the urgent necessity had again and again been pointed out by Presidents, War Secretaries, and generals. At this session an amendment made to the Army appropriation bill provided for a reserve to the Regular Army. The measure, as stated, was tacked on to the bill during the last moments of the session, and probably was therefore not given that consideration its importance deserved. But while open to many objections, it had one redeeming feature in that it recognized, for the first time, the principle which may be said to be vital to any military system. The law is more in the nature of a bounty system than a reserve, and embodied all the evil features of that system which since the days of the Revolution has been a fertile source of fraud and desertion. No provision is made for the pay or for the continued service necessary to retain men, to enable the Government to keep track of them, and the soldier in touch with his duties. However, looking back over the past, let us thank God for so much good, and trust that steps will shortly be taken to correct the faults of the present measure and that it may be the first step in the direction of that "policy" which it is hoped may become our law.

The system thus recognized is believed to have far-reaching effects, for while primarily intended for the Army, it must be remembered that in order to avail themselves of the Federal allotments the Organized Militia must conform to the organization of the Army. Two or three States have already taken steps to do this as regards reserves, and it is hoped that others will soon follow suit, for if the system is vital to the Regular Army with its trained officers and nucleus of trained soldiers, how much more so is it vital to the commander of a National Guard company, who will probably take into the field but 40 half-tained men, his company to be filled to 150. It can readily be understood how his labors will be lessened, how much more quickly this company will be ready to go to the front, should there be available to swell the ranks 110 even partially trained men, rather than the raw, undisciplined, untrained material he otherwise must "lick into shape."

It is said that such a system would entail too much labor on the part of officers of militia organizations, but a method might easily be devised for a State reserve and the organizations relieved of responsibility. In any event, if war be considered, the return in the saving in work, responsibility, and life would be so enormous that the extra labor in time of peace is well worth while.

Elsewhere in this magazine is an article by the Hon. JOHN Q. TILSON, M. C., which deals most admirably with the subject. Mr. TILSON is the author of a bill now before Congress looking to the creation of a reserve system for our Regular Army, Militia, and Volunteers. This bill, if passed, would remedy one of our greatest military defects. It deserves the earnest consideration and support of everyone interested in the military establishment, our success in war, and economy in life during war. It should find place in any "policy" adopted.

[Extracts from article by Maj. Carl Reichmann.]

OUR RESERVE SYSTEM.

The law passed by Congress last session, while generally prescribing four years' service with the colors and three with the reserve, provides for a number of alternatives, so that it is difficult to calculate just what the reserve produced thereby will be. The conscript system produces nearly 100 per cent of reservists from its annual inflow, but our service is affected by many circumstances that do not influence those of foreign armies, so that no comparison can be made with them, except perhaps with the British Army, which is recruited in a manner similar to ours.

By taking the ratio of the average number of discharges by expiration of enlistments for a number of years past, to the average number of enlistments and reenlistments for the same period, and applying it on the basis of four years' service with the colors, we may get some approximation to what the probable strength of the reserve will be. We find that from 1904 to 1911, both inclusive, the average number of annual enlistments and reenlistments was 29,846, and of discharges by expiration of term of service 16,494, i. e., 52 per cent of the men enlisted and reenlisted were discharged by expiration of term of service, as follows.

	Enlistments and reenlistments.	Discharges by expiration of term of service.
1904	28,003	16,592
1905	34,415	22,254
1906	24,752	9,948
1907	20,649	12,816
1908	42,420	18,485
1909	31,911	12,903
1910	18,580	11,911
1911	38,041	27,042
	238,771	131,951
Average	29,846	16,494

These figures closely approximate the British service, where the annual inflow yields 58 per cent in reservists, if our figures are correct, as follows:

	Total gain, all sources.	Transfers to reserve.
1907	45,853	32,776
1908	47,338	27,161
1909	44,885	21,296
1910	37,115	20,586
	175,191	101,819
Average	43,788	25,455

Assuming that under the present law with four years' service with the colors (and disregarding the alternatives) the company of infantry of 65 men receives an annual inflow of one-fourth of its strength, namely, 16.25 men, and that a like number goes out, then, according to our proportion, only 52 per cent of the 16.25 men, or 8.45, would be discharged by expiration of term of service, or rather would on completion of four years' service with the colors pass to the reserve for three years. By the end of the seventh year the company would have 65 men in ranks and three times 8.45 men in reserve, so could take the field with 65 plus 25.35, or 90 men. Allowing for a further loss of 5 per cent from natural causes among the reservists, the company would take the field with 86 men.

It will be remembered that opinions were divided as to length of service with the colors and with the reserve. A number of officers were for five years' service with the colors; the War Department advocated three years' service with the colors and four in the reserve, and has expressed itself generally in favor of the short service with the colors and long service in the reserve. Legislation has fixed the length of service with the colors at four years and in the reserve at three years.

Our present peace strength is 65 men per company, and the Field Service Regulations contemplate that it shall be raised to 108 men for war service. How far it will be possible to effect this augmentation with trained men from the reserve appears from the following table:

Years of service.		Strength of company.	Annual in and out flow.	Available for reserve.	Strength of company after seven years.
With colors.	In the reserve.				Total.	Deducting 5 per cent.
2	5	65	32.5	16.9	150	142
3	4	65	21.7	11.23	110	105
4	3	65	16.25	8.45	90	86
5	2	65	13	6.75	79	75

It is evident at once that under the present law the company will produce in three years but 21 reservists and that it will be necessary to add 22 recruits to bring it up to the strength of 108 men contemplated in the Field Service Regulations. If service with the colors were two years and in the reserve five years, the company would have a surplus of 34 trained men, enough to keep its fighting strength up to the maximum for several months.

From the viewpoint of national defense, short service with the colors is preferable. It yields the larger reserve, it avoids preparatory work, such as recruit drill, at a time when everything of that kind should be completed; it throws all this preparatory training into the period of peace, where it belongs, but largely increases the work of the officers and noncommissioned officers during that period. Long service with the colors, on the other hand, furnishes long-service soldiers, entails a minimum of work in time of peace, and throws the maximum recruit training and similar preparatory work into the war period, where it is out of place.

The committee of the General Staff on the organization of our land forces has recommended a company of infantry of 100 men in peace and of 150 in war. The subjoined table shows the reserve-producing capacity of this company:

Years of service.		Strength of company.	Annual in and out flow.	Available for reserve.	Strength of company after seven years.
With colors.	In the reserve.				Total.	Deducting 5 per cent.
2	5	100	50	26	230	217
3	4	100	33⅓	17.33	169	161
4	3	100	25	13	139	132
5	2	100	20	10.4	121	115

Again we find that the present law requiring four years of service with the colors will not furnish a sufficient reserve to raise the company from 100 to 150 men. If the service with the colors were three years and with the reserve four, the company would have 161 men, and after transferring to the reserve its sick, its weaklings, and its old men it would perhaps just be able to take the field with 150 able men, leaving 11 noneffectives at home, and would have no reserve to fill up the gaps made by the first battles.

The foregoing is not to be understood as advocating the management of the reserve system by company; that unit has merely been selected here for convenience in calculating the probable numerical effect of the present law.

Mr. HAY. Mr. Speaker, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. PRINCE. Mr. Speaker, I entered this body as a Member in the Fifty-fourth Congress. I was appointed as a member of the Committee on Military Affairs in the Fifty-seventh Congress. When I entered upon my duties as a member of that committee I found two very distinguished members then upon that committee who are now the only Members, aside from myself, who were Members of the Fifty-seventh Congress. The present distinguished chairman of that committee, Mr. HAY, of Virginia, became a member of the Military Affairs Committee in the Fifty-sixth Congress, and the gentleman from Texas [Mr. SLAYDEN], an equally distinguished member of that committee, became a member in the Fifty-seventh Congress.

Our relations from the Fifty-seventh Congress down to the present moment as members of that committee have been cordial and pleasant. I take this opportunity to say that I have a very high regard for the faithful, vigilant, able, well-equipped chairman of the Military Affairs Committee, the distinguished gentleman from Virginia. [Applause.]

The side of the House of which he is a Member have in this Congress taken charge of public affairs, and I leave it to my colleagues here on both sides that few of the chairmen have been so well equipped to handle difficult matters like those before the Military Affairs Committee, or any large appropriation, amounting in the aggregate to ninety-odd million dollars, touching the various ramifications of our country as the military affairs bill does. He is always courteous, prompt, and possessed of knowledge when you ask him in reference to the bill he has in charge. At the last session we did not agree along the lines of how the legislation should be made, but it was an honest difference. We were each seeking to advance the Army as an Army, not seeking to get personal legislation for officers connected with the Army. The personnel of the Army is one thing. The Army as an arm of a great Government of which we are a part is another thing. That has been the aim of the chairman. That has been the aim of the gentleman from Texas [Mr. SLAYDEN], and that has been the aim of myself, to move along for the betterment of this great military establishment called a Regular Army. I do not know why it should be called a Regular Army. The young men who become officers volunteer their services. They ask to be sent to West Point or, so far as the naval branch of the military establishment is concerned, to Annapolis. They volunteer to give their service for life. The men who enlist in the Army go to the recruiting stations and volunteer their services for this country, to serve it, and they serve it well.

I have had something to do with the various Secretaries of War since I have been a member of this Committee on Military Affairs. I say now, and I say it without fear of successful contradiction, that next to Edwin M. Stanton, the great Civil War Secretary of War, no man has been the equal of the Hon. ELIHU ROOT, when he was Secretary of War under the administration of William McKinley. [Applause.] He it was who took the Army in the shape it was then and reorganized it. He it was who made the officers cease to be careless and indifferent so far as their military duties were concerned, and he it was who started them along the way of the schools and gave to them an impetus and an ambition to become distinguished officers of the most distinguished Army that there is in the world. I desire to pay my respects to him and others who have held that high position. Especially do I want to say that the Army officers and enlisted men are of a high type and are worthy successors of those who have gone before as members of the Army of this country.

Just one word more, Mr. Speaker. We are mobilizing our forces, as it were, along the border of our country, and I want to say this: That the one thing in my judgment which will stand out and commend itself for all time to the credit of the distinguished gentleman who occupies the office of President, Mr. William Howard Taft, is the fact that he declined to intervene in the trouble in Mexico and make a slaughter pen for the American soldiers of this Republic. [Applause.] Whatever else he may have done, history will accord to him the high distinction of being able to stand steady as the Rock of Gibraltar against the interests that sought to force him to intervene in another country. And I firmly believe that the distinguished gentleman who will soon become President of the United States, the son of a minister, a believer in the Master, and peace on earth, good will to men, will follow in the footsteps of his illustrious predecessor, Mr. Taft, and that he will not intervene in the border troubles that may arise. [Applause.]

That is all I desire to say. [Prolonged applause.]

Mr. HAY. Mr. Speaker, I desire to make just a brief statement. I want to say that I have served on the Committee on Military Affairs since the Fifty-fifth Congress, and during the most of that service I have had the pleasure and honor of serving upon it with the distinguished gentleman from Illinois [Mr. PRINCE], who I regret to say is about to leave his service on that committee. During that time he has been most faithful and efficient and of great benefit to the country and to this House. [Applause.] I am sure that we all regret that we are to lose his valuable services, which have been made so efficient by reason of the long time that he has been a member of that committee, and we part with him with great regret. [Applause.]

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the conference report.

The conference report was agreed to.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. Crockett, one of its clerks, announced that the Senate had passed bill of the following title, in which the concurrence of the House of Representatives was requested:

S. 1142. An act to protect the monuments already erected on the battle field of Bull Run, Va., and other monuments that may be there erected.

PENSION APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. BARTLETT. Mr. Speaker, I submit a conference report on the bill (H. R. 28730), making appropriations for the payment of invalid and other pensions of the United States, for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1914, and for other purposes, and I ask unanimous consent to have the statement read in lieu of the report.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Georgia submits a conference report on the pension appropriation bill and asks unanimous consent that the statement be read in lieu of the report. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The Clerk read the statement.

The statement and conference report are as follows:

CONFERENCE REPORT (NO. 1603).

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 28730) making appropriations for the payment of invalid and other pensions of the United States for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1914, and for other purposes, having met, after full and free conference have agreed to recommend and do recommend to their respective Houses as follows:

That the Senate recede from its amendment.

C. L. BARTLETT,
WM. P. BORLAND,
JAMES W. GOOD,
Managers on the part of the House.

P. J. MCCUMBER,
B. F. SHIVELY,
HENRY E. BURNHAM,
Managers on the part of the Senate.

STATEMENT.

The managers on the part of the House at the conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendment of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 28730) making appropriations for the payment of invalid and other pensions of the United States for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1914, and for other purposes, submit the following written statement in explanation of the effect of the action agreed upon and recommended as to that amendment in the accompanying conference report:

Strikes out the paragraph, inserted by the Senate, making available the unexpended balance of the appropriation for clerk hire and other services at pension agencies for the fiscal year 1913 for payment of traveling and other incidental expenses of clerks transferred from the various pension agencies to Washington.

C. L. BARTLETT,
WM. P. BORLAND,
JAMES W. GOOD,
Managers on the part of the House.

Mr. BARTLETT. Mr. Speaker, the Senate placed upon the pensions appropriation bill an amendment which provided for the payment of the expenses of employees who were employed in the pension agencies which were abolished by the last Congress. The House disagreed to that amendment. The conferees on the part of the House did not think it was a proper charge against the Government. There were no itemized statements, and we declined to concur in the amendment. The Senate receded from the amendment.

I ask that the conference report be adopted.

Mr. RODDENBERY. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BARTLETT. Yes.

Mr. RODDENBERY. The gentleman states that the Senate recedes and acquiesces in the position of the House conferees upon that item. This bill will carry a total of how much?

Mr. BARTLETT. One hundred and eighty million dollars, the amount carried when it left the House; not a cent more.

Mr. RODDENBERY. What was the bill when it passed the House for the current year?

Mr. BARTLETT. I think $152,000,000; something in that neighborhood.

Mr. RODDENBERY. Will the gentleman yield me five or six minutes?

Mr. BARTLETT. I yield the gentleman six minutes.

Mr. RODDENBERY. Mr. Speaker, we are now confronted with the adoption of a conference report that disposes of the small sum, insignificant, it is true, of $180,000,000. We discover that since a year ago $30,000,000 is necessary for the country to comply with its obligations of gratitude and honor in the payment of pensions. But that is not all. The deficiency bill that was just passed yesterday carried $15,000,000 more, making, in round numbers, $200,000,000. I can not, as I have said before, understand why, when these increases are made, it is not possible for this legislative body to take out of this pension legislation the people's millions that are being paid to foreigners and aliens who do not live in this Republic and who have not lived here in 40 years. I can not understand why this legislative body can not exercise its powers and expunge from the pension roll men who are drawing pensions from the taxes of the people of this country and at the same time drawing a salary of $7,000, of $6,000, of $5,000, of $4,000, and of $3,000 for services rendered to the Government. Mark you, these people encumber the roll as invalid pensioners.

I can not understand why gentlemen rise on this floor and say that they know of men drawing these pensions who are worth $20,000,000, Members rising on this floor and saying they know of men drawing pensions who are worth $10,000,000, and yet vote for them. The man at the plowshare, at the anvil, at the saw, the man laboring in the pit and toiling on the housetop is taxed year by year in the name of national gratitude and public duty to pay taxes to pension these millionaires, the wealthy, the rich, and the opulent. Why can not deserters and imposters be expunged from the pension pay roll and thus taken off the backs of honest toiling men. It can not be founded in justice, it can not rest on right, it can not be in obedience to the law of national honor. It is an imposition, it is treachery to the masses of our countrymen; it is burdensome to legitimate business; and it is unwise legislation, more especially so when we have a decadent Senate increasing the river and harbor bill $7,000,000, when we have a Republican Senate, which is now breathing its last breath, burdening the House bill with $12,000,000 more for the Navy. It is loading the people, whom we represent, down with indefensible burdens. There can be no honorable defense if we permit a Republican Senate, under pretense of passing supply bills, to load down the sundry civil bill with $8,000,000; to increase the Indian appropriation bill by $6,000,000 more; and all this by a Senate that the people of this country have repudiated in the last election with their ballots. After the House has passed a fair and equitable public building bill we behold the spectacle of a discredited Senate loading it down with $22,000,000, and before three more suns are set they will have been retired from public office and Senators will come in whom the people have chosen. I announce now that it is an unsound, indefensible policy for the Sixty-second Congress to permit a repudiated legislative body to burden the people of this country with $50,000,000 when in three days' time they will have been driven from power and the Representatives whom the people have chosen will be clothed with power to legislate for them.

Mr. BYRNES of South Carolina. Mr. Speaker, I wish to ask the gentleman from Georgia to yield me five minutes.

Mr. BARTLETT. I yield the gentleman five minutes.

Mr. BYRNES of South Carolina. Mr. Speaker, in the time yielded to me by the gentleman from Georgia I desire to refer to the criticism of the Pujo investigating committee by the gentlemen from Pennsylvania, Mr. MOORE and Mr. BURKE. When these gentlemen addressed the House on Thursday morning the members of our committee were not on the floor, being engaged in preparing the report which has been filed. The committee was criticized because they incurred expenses in excess of the amount first appropriated and delayed asking for an additional appropriation until this time, when the investigation is completed. The facts are that Mr. PUJO, the chairman of the committee, introduced in the House the resolution providing for the additional appropriation not recently but as far back as May, 1912, and he at that time informed the other members of our committee that he was told by members of the Committee on Accounts that they would not report the resolution at that time, but would wait until it was definitely known what amount would be needed to defray all expenses, and thus save bringing in a third resolution. The gentleman from Pennsylvania, Mr. BURKE, thinks that the lawyers on the committee should have conducted the investigation instead of employing an attorney. This investigation was ordered by a Democratic caucus, and the resolution authorizing it passed this House by a vote of 214 to 15, and it specifically authorized the committee to employ counsel. No criticism has ever been heard of the committee appointed by a Republican Senate to investigate the Lorimer matter or of other committees that have employed attorneys; and if our committee had employed an attorney unacquainted with the subject matter of the investigation and, as a result, the inquiry have been ineffective, there would be no criticism. But the committee saw fit to employ an attorney who was qualified to conduct the inquiry, and, as a result, the hearings have resulted in the disclosure by the leaders of finance of conditions which they themselves declared should be remedied, and the committee has proposed the remedy.

The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MOORE] stated that we should have gone to some "potato patch in Missouri" to get a representative of the common people to conduct the inquiry, instead of going to the city of New York. I have no doubt such a course would have pleased him, but we did not take that view of it. This was a most complex subject, involving not an investigation of any one concern, but of a large number of the leading financial institutions and industrial corporations and their relations to each other; an exceedingly technical subject involving a knowledge of the conduct of the stock exchanges as well as the financial institutions, and it would have been impossible for any attorney, no matter how well equipped he might be for the ordinary practice of the law, to have conducted this investigation as it has been conducted, without having specialized in this particular branch of the law. Every question in this examination was directed to the resolution under which we acted and the facts have been presented in a clear and logical manner. The interests opposed to the investigation and their friends at first charged that nothing would come of it. As the hearings developed admissions from the bankers themselves of existing evils they changed their course. They decided it was no longer to be ignored and they then proceeded to criticize the committee for permitting counsel to conduct the examinations. The committee did this because they believed that the facts could be presented in better order if questions were asked by one person instead of having them asked by the 11 members of the committee, making the record so voluminous that no one on earth could ever follow it. We are satisfied with the correctness of our decision. As I stated yesterday in answer to the gentleman from Massachusetts the statement is absurd that the committee agreed to ask no questions unless they were approved by counsel. The reverse is true. The committee reserved the right to disapprove of questions by counsel, but in the conduct of the investigation there has never been the slightest friction between the committee and counsel. The Republican as well as the Democratic members of that committee will bear me out in that statement.

I have no doubt the gentlemen from Pennsylvania, representing the districts they do, would have preferred that we employ an incompetent man, but we employed one who has contributed to an investigation which will, during a Democratic administration, result in remedial legislation.

But Mr. MOORE did not content himself with this criticism. He proceeded to do something unworthy of him. Holding in his hand the publication "Who's Who," he purported to read from it, stating, "He says he is now the senior member of the firm of Guggenheim. Oh, what a horrid name to the people of this country." And a moment afterwards, referring to some client of Mr. Untermyer's, he referred to "copper" interests. The name of Guggenheim is a horrid name to the people of the country; but it is a Republican, not a Democratic name. Furthermore, it is not the name of the partner of Mr. Untermyer, and Mr. MOORE knew it, because the book he purported to read from states the name of Mr. Untermyer's partner to be "Guggenheimer," not Guggenheim; and Mr. MOORE's eyesight is good; he saw it, and it was unworthy of him to misrepresent this man and misread this book in order to lead the people to believe that the counsel to this committee was an associate of one of the Guggenheim's of copper fame.

But, Mr. Speaker, at the suggestion of Mr. DALZELL, Mr. MOORE included in his remarks, as extended in the RECORD, an editorial from the New York Sun of that morning criticizing counsel to the committee. Of course, it was to be expected that the great financial interests opposed to this investigation would do everything in their power to destroy its work. This inspired attack upon counsel was withheld until the morning of the day they expected the committee to file its report. The questions asked in this editorial refer to the decision of a court in a case tried 32 years ago. Believing that by an attack upon counsel they would distract attention from the report, they conducted an investigation into the career of counsel of the committee. The persons inspiring this attack knew that once before, when Mr. Untermyer incurred the displeasure of the great insurance companies, the New York Herald, that defender of the rights of the people, had indulged in similar criticism of Mr. Untermyer, and they could have answered their own questions by printing the reply of Mr. Untermyer which appeared in the New York Herald on August 20, 1906, which was as follows:

[Extract from New York Herald, Aug. 20, 1906.]

STOCK DEALS DENIED BY MR. UNTERMYER—DECLARES HE MADE NO PROFITS OUT OF LITIGATION IN CASE OF SEE V. HEPPENHEIMER—GIVES HISTORY OF THE CASE—SAYS JUDGE PITNEY'S DOCUMENT IN STRAW PAPER TRANSACTIONS WAS IN NO SENSE AN OPINION.

To the Editor of the Herald:

I note from to-day's issue of your paper that in connection with the insurance controversy you have given up two entire columns to the publication of what purports to be part of an opinion in a transaction 15 years old, entitled "In the case of See v. Heppenheimer," in which it is implied that I made large profits out of that transaction which I was required to refund.

The implication is grossly untrue, and you are perhaps not aware that in making that publication you are not protected in it as being the record of a judicial proceeding.

I accordingly herewith ask that you publish this letter. The suit in question has been settled between the parties, with the formal approval of the court, the appropriate order had been entered, and the money paid for more than two months before this document was prepared and sent by Judge Pitney for publication.

It was in no sense an opinion in a pending litigation over the subjects discussed in so far as we were concerned. All the parties to the adjusted controversy protested against the filing of that document, including our opponents in the litigation, as it had been clearly understood by all parties that the case would not otherwise have been adjusted, since no liability was recognized. All these facts and negotiations were known to Judge Pitney, who was a party to the settlement, having approved it on behalf of the receiver fully two months before he placed this document on file.

The result of filing that paper months after the case had been settled and against the objection of all parties concerned was to deprive the defendants of the right to appeal. An attempt was then made to get back the money or to obtain the right of an appeal, but the answer was made that the case had long since been settled and discontinued, and there was therefore nothing from which to appeal.

The true facts as to the controversy are, briefly summarized, as follows: In 1891 my firm was retained by Messrs. Beard & Stein to prepare certain papers in the form of options on straw paper mills. We were told that Messrs. Poor & Greenough had agreed to finance the required money by the purchase of an issue of bonds with a bonus of stock. Some months later we were informed that Messrs. Poor & Greenough had been unable to market the bonds, and we were persuaded to do so on the faith of certain written representations which we subsequently discovered were grossly inaccurate.

My partners and myself bought a large part of the bonds, and the bulk of the balance was taken by our friends.

It is not true that any of us ever made a dollar of profit out of the transaction in any form, directly or indirectly. On the contrary, we lost over $400,000 of our own money, of which my personal loss was over $150,000. We never received a dollar of compensation for our services or otherwise, but put large additional moneys of our own into the property in an attempt to save our friends, whom we did not ask to contribute.

The ground on which a stock liability was sought to be enforced did not involve any claim of wrongdoing. It was a purely technical statutory claim, based on the ground that the bonus stock which went with the bonds was charged with a liability. This was disputed. On the one hand it was claimed that the property was not worth the amount of stock that had been issued for it. We claimed, on the other hand, that we bought the bonds believing that the bonds had that value, and that we had been deceived as to the facts.

There is nothing in the record of the case to support the assumption that anybody concerned with the transaction made a dollar out of it.

It is with great reluctance that I have departed from my rule not to permit the great issues involved in the insurance controversy to be obscured by answering personal attacks that have no relation to that subject. I have, however, felt that as this was represented to be a judicial determination in an actual controversy it might be inferred that I could have appealed if it was wrong.

SAMUEL UNTERMYER.

NEW YORK, August 19, 1906.

The gentleman from Pennsylvania knew that it was unfair to give additional circulation to this attack when the man attacked had not the privileges of the floor to reply to him. It was as unfair as if I should include in my remarks a clipping from the Philadelphia North American, a newspaper opposed to him politically, referring to the case of the city of Philadelphia against J. HAMPTON MOORE, without his having the opportunity to explain the legal questions involved in the case and which brought about the litigation.

But, Mr. Speaker, these efforts will be of no avail. The people have during the conduct of this investigation learned something of the concentration of control of credit in this country in the hands of a few men; they have learned that some of the bankers themselves regard it as a serious menace to the welfare of the people, and this report will be considered on its merits. The States will, as a result of the recommendations of the committee, remedy many of the evils which can be best regulated by their legislatures, and by the enactment of the two bills recommended by this committee much will be done by Congress to restore competition in this country.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the conference report.

The question was taken, and the conference report was agreed to.

On motion of Mr. BARTLETT, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the conference report was agreed to was laid on the table.

CANCELING MACHINES.

Mr. McCOY. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to withdraw from the files of the House Report No. 1570, House Calendar 412, under House resolution 109, to investigate the Post Office Department.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. HUMPHREYS of Mississippi. Is it necessary, Mr. Speaker, in view of the order passed a few days ago, authorizing this report of the Alaska Railroad Commission to be printed with illustrations, to have an additional order now to print them?

Mr. MANN. Undoubtedly; with illustrations, if they want them.

Mr. HUMPHREYS of Mississippi. May I ask unanimous consent now to print the report with illustrations?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. HUMPHREYS] asks unanimous consent to have the report printed with illustrations. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

WOMAN SUFFRAGE PROCESSION.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. Mr. Speaker, I call up from the Speaker's table Senate joint resolution 164 and ask its adoption.

Mr. HEFLIN. Mr. Speaker, I demand a second.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. I move, Mr. Speaker, that a second be considered as ordered.

Mr. HARDWICK. Mr. Speaker, I reserve the point of order. I do not know whether there is a similar House resolution or not.

The SPEAKER. The Chair would inquire of the gentleman from Colorado what is the number of the resolution?

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. It is Senate joint resolution 164.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report it.

The Clerk read as follows:

Senate joint resolution (S. J. Res. 164) stopping traffic and preventing interference with the suffrage procession.

Resolved, etc., That the superintendent of police of the District of Columbia be, and he is hereby, directed to stop all the ordinary traffic and travel, including the operation of street railroads, along Pennsylvania Avenue from the Peace Monument to Seventeenth Street, between the hours of 3 and 5 p. m., on Monday, the 3d day of March, A. D. 1913, and to prevent any interference with the suffrage procession on that day.

[Applause.]

The SPEAKER. There is an identical joint resolution reported from the House committee and on the calendar.

Mr. HARDWICK. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. HARDWICK. Does the gentleman from Colorado [Mr. TAYLOR] call this up by authority of the committee?

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. Yes; he calls it up under his right.

Mr. HARDWICK. As a matter of law he must call it up by authority of the committee.

The SPEAKER. Has the gentleman the committee's authority?

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. I have the authority of the chairman of the committee, Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky.

The SPEAKER. That is not enough. There is no dispute about what the rule is any more, and that is that it takes an authorization of the committee.

Mr. HEFLIN. The gentleman ought to move to suspend the rules.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. Mr. Speaker, I move to suspend the rules and pass the resolution.

Mr. HEFLIN. I demand a second.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. MANN. Has the gentleman from Alabama been recognized for that purpose?

The SPEAKER. The Chair will recognize him for that purpose. The gentleman from Alabama [Mr. HEFLIN] demands a second.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that a second be considered as ordered.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. HARDWICK. I object, Mr. Speaker.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Colorado [Mr. TAYLOR] and the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. HEFLIN] will act as tellers. Those in favor of seconding this motion to suspend the rules will pass between the tellers and be counted.

The House divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 116, noes 13.

Mr. HARDWICK. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of order that there is no quorum present.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will count. Evidently there is a quorum present. There are 225 men on the floor of the House. A second is ordered. The gentleman from Colorado [Mr. TAYLOR] has 20 minutes and the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. HEFLIN] has 20.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. Mr. Speaker, on the 29th of last month the Congress passed a Senate joint resolution providing for the regulation of traffic on the streets of this city during inauguration, but when the ladies who expect to conduct the woman's suffrage parade in this city on next Monday—some 10,000 of them—came to ask the superintendent of police to stop traffic and protect their line of march he informed them that he had no authority to do so under that resolution passed by Congress. The matter was taken up with the District Commissioners and with the Interstate Commerce Commission, and also with the superintendent of police, and they all determined that the only way in which authority could be given to the superintendent of police and relieve the District of legal liability and permit the policing and roping off and stopping of traffic during the hours from 3 to 5 on Monday afternoon was by having a joint resolution passed for that purpose. I introduced this resolution several days ago, and it was this morning introduced in the Senate. It passed the Senate this afternoon by a unanimous vote, and it is now on the calendar of the House. I ask the favorable consideration of it by the House. It is not a question of equal suffrage; it is a question of fair treatment of the women of this country. [Applause.] They have a right to parade down Pennsylvania Avenue next Monday without interference. That is all this resolution provides. If the street car companies were willing to stop their cars during two hours of the suffrage pageant there would be no necessity for this resolution; but owing to the fact that they will not do so, and the superintendent of police says he has no authority to compel them to, in view of the fact that there will be 150,000 visitors here and the streets will be thronged, there is no way of protecting that parade. The parade can not possibly be had unless this resolution is passed. With the hundreds of thousands of people that will be on the streets that day, unless all vehicles, street cars, and all traffic is absolutely stopped and Pennsylvania Avenue is roped off from the Peace Monument to Seventeenth Street and the line of march is protected by 500 police the procession will be utterly impossible.

I reserve the remainder of my time.

Mr. HEFLIN. Mr. Speaker, how much time did the gentleman consume?

The SPEAKER. Five minutes.

Mr. HEFLIN. I hardly think the gentleman has a right to reserve 15 minutes in which to close, when there are only 20 minutes. I should like to have him divide his time.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman has a right to reserve his time.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. I will yield time to others.

Mr. HEFLIN. I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN].

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, upon inaugural day there will be a very large number of visitors in this city, many of whom will reach the city Monday afternoon. I desire to read a statement from the president of the Capital Traction Co., the company that operates the street car lines on Pennsylvania Avenue, before the House acts upon this resolution.

THE CAPITAL TRACTION CO.,
Washington, D. C., February 28, 1913.

Hon. JAMES R. MANN,
House of Representatives.

DEAR SIR: Noting the introduction of a resolution directing the cars of the Capital Traction Co. to cease running on the Avenue during the presentation of the suffragist pageant on the afternoon of Monday, March 3, I request that in the event the passage of this resolution is pressed to submit that to stop the running of the cars on that afternoon, or any part thereof, would seriously incommode a great number of people who are coming to Washington to participate in the inauguration of the President-elect.

The experience of the past shows that by reason of the delays on steam railroads incident to the heavy traffic, a very great number of those coming reach Washington during the afternoon preceding the day of the inauguration.

It is a difficult thing to get the crowds from the station. The capacity of every street railway leading to and from the station is taxed to the utmost, and it is quite impossible to maintain, by reason of the conditions referred to, usual or satisfactory schedules.

The people coming into Washington are, for the most part, strangers, and are dependent upon the street cars for transportation to their destinations.

The Avenue line is one of the most direct arteries of transportation from the Union Station westward; not only that, but it is crowded with people coming in from Virginia over the Aqueduct Bridge, and all of this is in addition to the usual afternoon rush-hour traffic.

To meet measurably the conditions imposed upon us, we have to shorten our headway and increase the service by the addition of every available car.

To stop the cars on the afternoon of Monday for any period of time would interrupt the service, increase congestion at many points, would add to the crowded and uncomfortable conditions at the Union Station, and would incommode thousands of citizens coming from every part of the country.

In my judgment, this should not be done unless it were required for a governmental function or necessity, and hence the refusal of the company to stop the cars because of the intended parade of the suffragettes.

Very respectfully,

GEORGE E. HAMILTON, President.

If, instead of permitting the strangers who come to the city on that afternoon to reach their points of destination through street car transportation, the House desires to hold up transportation for practically the afternoon it is within the power of the House to do so; but I submit that it is not fair to the strangers who come here, practically invited for inauguration day, to subject them to this inconvenience and probably render impossible the reaching of their destinations during the afternoon.

I yield back the remainder of my time.

Mr. LAFFERTY. Will the gentleman answer a question? Is it not possible for all of those cars to be routed west from the Union Station on G Street or F Street?

Mr. MANN. It is not possible, because there will be cars on those lines running as frequently as the headway will permit, anyhow.

Mr. TILSON. And there is no physical connection between the lines of the two companies.

Mr. MANN. It is not possible. The cars ought to be permitted to run on Pennsylvania Avenue. The parade can march on Pennsylvania Avenue without holding up the street cars. Pennsylvania Avenue is a wide avenue; there is plenty of room for a procession or parade without inconveniencing every stranger who comes to the town at this time. However, most of them will be our Democratic friends. I anticipate that people of my own political persuasion will not be here in great numbers; but I think the strangers coming to the town are entitled to decent treatment. [Applause.]

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. I yield five minutes to the gentleman from California [Mr. RAKER].

Mr. RAKER. Mr. Speaker, this resolution stops the cars for two hours in the city of Washington, on Pennsylvania Avenue—one street—to the end that the women of this country, representing an iden and a principle, may have an opportunity and the privilege of marching down it in order, with protection surrounding them.

We hear an appeal, as we have always heard from the business interests, that they can not delay their traffic for two hours, that these good women may have the opportunity to demonstrate to the world that the women of this land can march with respect and with decency and with honor, with their banners flying, to represent a principle that is coming just so sure as the sun shall shine to-morrow. That one-half of this country will not be permitted to rule alone, but that the other half, as intelligent, as honest, and patriotic for representative government, shall have an opportunity to participate. I say as a Representative that this Congress ought to give this protection for these noble and loyal women for the short space of two hours. I trust that the resolution will pass.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. I yield 4 minutes to the gentleman from Wyoming [Mr. MONDELL].

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Speaker, a large number of good women of many States of the Union, engaged in promoting a cause in which they believe, and in which an increasing number of American citizens believe, propose to have a parade on Pennsylvania Avenue for two hours on the 3d of March. The Capital City of this great Nation owes it to the women of the Nation to see that that procession is properly guarded and those participating in it given an opportunity to march down the Avenue without interference, interruption, or annoyance.

I regret to say that the chief of the police of this city has not shown himself in that harmony with this movement that a man charged with the maintenance of order in this Capital City of the Nation should be. If he had so shown himself to be in sympathy with the movement sufficient to insure adequate protection I doubt if this resolution would have been considered necessary. The stoppage of traffic for two hours on this one street will discommode but few people, and that for a brief period. I am of the opinion there are few citizens coming here to participate in the inauguration of the President of this Republic who will not be perfectly willing to be discommoded for a short time that the Capital City of the Nation may properly guard and show proper respect for this splendid demonstration of good women in their effort to spread the gospel of better government throughout the Union. [Applause.]

Mr. HEFLIN. Mr. Speaker, I yield two minutes to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON].

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Speaker, I passed through the tellers against the seconding of the motion, and I did so for the reason that under this motion there is no opportunity to amend this bill. I listened to the remarks of my colleague [Mr. MANN] and the letter that was read. Pennsylvania Avenue is a very wide avenue. On it are the tracks of the Capital Traction Co. I do not regard the interests of that company as paramount, but for the reasons stated, it seems to me that these American citizens who desire to march on the 3d of March could have marched just as well on the 4th. But let that pass, and say if they desire to march on the 3d they have that right. I would have offered an amendment if it had been in order, as it would have been if this was not a motion to suspend the rules, directing the Commissioners of the District to rope the streets and to afford police protection and preserve order, but I would have allowed the street cars to run. There is room or space to throw to the birds on both sides of the tracks to enable the women to march 20 deep, if they should so desire.

My mother was a woman, my wife was a woman, and I have no sons. I have two daughters and two granddaughters, and somehow the family runs to women. [Laughter.] I have a great respect for the opinions of all American citizens. The women are citizens and have a right to believe in woman suffrage and resort to all peaceable and proper means to secure that end.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. I yield one minute to the gentleman from Colorado [Mr. RUCKER].

Mr. RUCKER of Colorado. Mr. Speaker, I am the oldest member of the organization known as suffragists in this House. I will be the oldest woman of this House in the parade on Monday, and I need protection. I am therefore in favor of the resolution. [Laughter.]

Mr. HEFLIN. Mr. Speaker, I have not the time to elaborate my views on the question of woman suffrage. I will not undertake to discuss that question now, but I intend to discuss it in the near future, and I will extend a challenge to the member of the Alabama delegation who favors the suffragette movement to meet me in joint debate and discuss that subject. I understand that my colleague, Mr. HOBSON, will take part in the suffragette parade that will take place in this city next Monday. It is rumored that he will command a portion of the suffragette paraders. If he does, I want him to march clad in the paraphernalia of a woman. [Applause and laughter.] And I now suggest that he don a bonnet and wear a dress on that occasion. [Applause and laughter.]

Mr. Speaker, the gentleman from Colorado [Mr. TAYLOR] admits that this is not a question of woman suffrage, but merely a question of getting permission for these suffragette women to parade up and down Pennsylvania Avenue.

I am willing to rope off the right side and the left side of the Avenue and allow them and other people to parade if they so desire, but I am opposed to stopping the cars from running down the middle of the Avenue; cars on which my constituents and your constituents, gentlemen, may ride for 5 cents apiece, when, if the cars stop, they will have to pay two or three dollars for a cab to ride around another way. The parade can be had without stopping the cars. While I have no sympathy with this suffragette movement or the proposed suffragette parade, let them parade if they want to, and let Mr. HOBSON command them if he chooses. [Applause and laughter.] Now, ho for that day.

The lark was up to meet the sun,
The bee was on the wing;
And soon the sufferin'-yets begun
To make the "welkin ring."

[Applause and laughter.]

They gathered around a laundryman.
"Protect yourself, sir, if you can,"
They thundered in his aching ear.
"Don't move," said one; "you stand right there."

[Applause and laughter.]

"It's votes for women, votes for women;
You'll soon be under the bottom;
We want votes; we want votes." He said,
"Women, I ain't got 'em."

[Applause and laughter.]

They screamed and yelled and tore their hair
And wildly, madly rent the air;
Marched back and forth, here and yonder,
While the absence of our wives, daughters, and mothers from the parade made the heart grow fonder.

[Applause and laughter.]

Mr. Speaker, there is already trouble in the land caused by the suffragette paraders from New York to Washington. A little bird tells me that some of these suffragettes were entertained at the home of Sarah Saxton one night; and Rufe Ruffin, the hero of Squash Center, relates this story:

Sarah Saxton tuck kere uv the sufferinettes one night, but she didn't know whut they wus up to, an' when she found that she was entertainin' sich as they it purty neer killed her. And nex' mornin' everything was outen jint. The hens refused ter lay, and in er body tried to follow the sufferinyets off up the road.

[Applause and laughter.]

The big red rooster looked lack his hart wood brake, an' he flew in front of a speckle hen and tried to purswade hur to behave and return, an', by golly, she crowed right in his face.

[Applause and laughter.]

The hen did finally return, Mr. Speaker, so the story goes, but she still crows like a rooster.

Said the big red rooster
To the little speckled hen,
"The way you air crowin'
Around here is a sin."

[Applause and laughter.]

Said the little speckled hen
To the big red rooster,
"I'll crow around here
Whenever I chooster."

[Applause and laughter.]

Another message from Squash Center, Mr. Speaker. Yad Potter says:

Don't be alarmed, men, this here crazy movement among certain women will soon disappear. There air bound to be a few female cranks along man's pathway.

I remember when I wus a boy my daddy put 25 settin's of eggs under 25 different hens, an' when they hatched out the entire hill wus covered with little chickens, and most of 'em wus hens, and, by golly, there wern't but one crowin' hen in the whole bunch—

[Applause and laughter.]

but she caused more confusement in the barnyard than ever you saw in your lifetime—

[Applause and laughter.]

Whenever she crowed the roosters charged at her, and when they got there and found she wus not a rooster they wus pestered powerful.

[Applause and laughter.]

Now, Mr. Speaker, I do not want to deny women or men the right to go up and down the Avenue Monday or any other day, but a woman suffragette calling herself "general" and another one calling herself "colonel" is going to cause more "confusement" in this city than you ever saw in your born days. [Loud and continuous applause and laughter.]

Mr. Speaker, this brigade of women marching from New York to Washington was commanded by Gen. Rosalie Jones. Who is Rosalie Jones? He is a woman. [Applause and laughter.] I understand that Col. Craft commanded the rear guard of the suffragette army. Who is Col. Craft, the children cry? He, too, is a woman. [Applause and laughter.] I am told that when marching about sundown one afternoon a faithful family cow came out and planted herself in front of them in the road. Gen. Jones addressed a few hot remarks to the cow, but the cow lowed back friendly greetings, and she finally made herself understood and said, "I mean no harm; I just saw you women coming down the road and, thinking that it was milking time, I planted myself in the road." [Applause and laughter.]

Mr. Speaker, I understand there will be speaking on the Avenue by women. I am reminded of another suffragette speaking. It is said that one damsel mounted a goods box and said, "I pant for the day when I can take a stand alongside of man and cast a vote just as he can. I pant for political paraphernalia, I pant"—and then a fellow in the audience said, "Yes, you pant to wear a pair of pants." [Laughter and applause.] Mr. Speaker, here comes the suffragette brigade, marching, tramp, tramp, tramp on to Washington, and here is a poem, a touching poem from Truth, a Buffalo magazine, that I wish to read:

The road is rough, and long the way.
Step along, O Rosalie.
Keep straight ahead, don't go away,
Rosy Jones, O Rosalie.
When you arrive count up your gains,
Your corns, and aches, and pains.
And coming back don't miss the trains;
You'll need them, my Rosalie.

[Applause and laughter.]

Mr. Speaker, I can fancy on Monday next, when the suffragettes are charging up and down the Avenue, the spirit of Washington coming back, with Thomas Jefferson standing by his side. I can fancy Washington, as he looks down upon these females of the species, and hear him saying:

"Who've come here since we've been gone?"

Jefferson:

"Voters and stump speakers with dresses on."

[Loud and continuous laughter and applause.]

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry. How much time have I left?

The SPEAKER. Nine minutes.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. HOBSON]. [Applause.]

Mr. HOBSON. Mr. Speaker, I thought when the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. HEFLIN], my distinguished colleague, was charging about here that he was very much like the rooster in his father's barnyard, except with this contrast, he did not stop when he met the crowing hen. [Laughter and applause.] Evidently, Mr. Speaker, he prefers to fight rather than to be friendly. [Laughter and applause.] But, Mr. Speaker, to be serious, it comes with poor grace from the champion of man's kingly position in creation, as a protector of women, that my good friend is not willing that these of the weaker sex should have the protection that is given everywhere even to a circus parade or given to almost any large procession in this city. Think of his proposition, that he wants his constituents to be able to go down the Avenue; that they have come here to see the Washington Monument or other points of interest. Those who come here by Monday have come to see that parade. You will do nothing more to spoil the happiness of the stranger who will be here than to interfere with the success of that parade. As a matter of fact, Mr. Speaker, in going from the Union Station to any point where the Pennsylvania Avenue cars lead, or coming down Pennsylvania Avenue in the opposite direction, there is not one place that would be more than a block from where other cars would proceed—cars on F Street and G Street. There is simply no sound objection based on reason to this proposal. The elemental instincts of gallantry should prompt unanimous action on our part. It is not a question of the merits of equal suffrage, but simply a question of courtesy, called for by common hospitality. Mr. Speaker, my friend from Alabama intimates that he is going to challenge me to meet him. I will be glad to meet him. [Laughter and applause.] I do not know whether it will be on the hustings in Alabama or here on the floor of this House.

Mr. HEFLIN. Both places, if the gentleman desires.

Mr. HOBSON. I expect it will be both. I have smoked him out. I have convictions on the subject. It is one of the great, progressive, evolutionary questions of our age. It can not be laughed out of court. Woman has a right to the franchise. No democracy is complete till woman's half of the population is enfranchised. Woman's world—the world of home economics, child life, public health, and morals—ought to be projected into legislation, and can only be so projected through the participation of woman directly in our political affairs. The main objection advanced is that women are not endowed with capacity for self-government, are not qualified for political action. It is indisputable that the capacity for self-government can not be fully developed unless it is developed in both sexes, for women are the mothers of the men. I venture to say that the admirable traits of my friend from Alabama are largely inherited from his mother. I have observed that whenever you find anything eminently admirable in a man you can trace it to his mother. The capacity for self-government is no exception. It comes under the great law of heredity. Any breeder of horses or other animals, or of any other living thing, desiring to develop a quality in an animal is more careful to see that the characteristic is developed in the mother than in the father. If the capacity for political government is as low in women as my friend intimates, then he ought to hasten to develop that capacity by giving women political activities.

Mr. HEFLIN. I have made no such statement.

Mr. HOBSON. It is only when the women in the world get fully developed that we can expect the greatest progress in the world. It is only when woman's angle of view as well as man's angle of view is brought upon man's activities that the greatest efficiency can be realized in these activities, and only when man's angle of view as well as woman's angle of view is brought to bear on woman's activities that the greatest efficiency can be realized in these activities; only when man and woman join together in their activities that the highest sympathy and happiest lives can be attained in the home.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Colorado has three minutes.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. Mr. Speaker, in answer to the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. HEFLIN] in regard to amending the resolution, I will simply say this: That the police and the people of this city know that if the street cars run, the people will be getting off the cars and on all along the line all the time, and it will be a physical impossibility to maintain the streets clear for the parade. They will be getting on and off at every street corner, and the whole march will be thrown into confusion and will be a failure. We know from experience that there is no other way of protecting the march except by absolutely stopping the street cars and all other vehicles along the parade from 3 to 5 p. m. next Monday.

It does seem to me that every fair-minded man in this House ought to support this resolution as a matter of common decency and fairness to the millions of good women of this country. [Applause.]

I now ask the adoption of the joint resolution.

Mr. EDWARDS. Mr. Speaker, I offer an amendment.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman can not offer an amendment; it is under suspension of the rules. The question is on suspending the rules and passing the joint resolution.

The question was taken, and the Speaker announced the noes seemed to have it.

On a division (demanded by Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado) there were—ayes 148, noes 70.

Mr. SABATH. Mr. Speaker, I ask for the yeas and nays on this vote. [Cries of "No!" "No!"]

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois demands the yeas and nays.

Mr. SABATH. I change my demand for tellers instead of the yeas and nays.

Mr. HENRY of Texas. Mr. Speaker, I demand the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 201, nays 52, answered "present" 8, not voting 120, as follows:

YEAS—201.

NAVAL APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. PADGETT. Mr. Speaker, I desire to submit a request for unanimous consent. I notice in the naval appropriation bill that the Senate has amended many of the items in the bill, but overlooked amending the totals. And if any of them should be agreed to the totals, being the same text in the House and in the Senate, would not be so in conference. And I ask unanimous consent that it be in order for the conferees to change the totals so as to make them correspond with the report.

Mr. MANN. With the items?

Mr. PADGETT. With the items.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. PADGETT] asks unanimous consent that the conferees on the naval appropriation bill be empowered to make the correct totals. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

PROCEEDINGS AT DINNER TO REPRESENTATIVE CANNON (H. DOC. NO. 1445).

Mr. HUMPHREYS of Mississippi. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to have printed as a House document the proceedings had at the dinner recently given by the House of Representatives to the Hon. JOSEPH G. CANNON.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. HUMPHREYS] asks unanimous consent to print as a public document the proceedings at the recent dinner given to the Hon. JOSEPH G. CANNON. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

RECESSES OF THE HOUSE.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Speaker, from now on it will probably be necessary for the House to take recesses instead of adjournments. It will probably be necessary to meet to-morrow, and the House will not wish to carry to-morrow's date on the RECORD. I ask unanimous consent that it may be in order as a matter of privilege, from now until the end of the session, to make a motion to take a recess.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD] asks unanimous consent that it shall be a matter of privilege from now to the end of the session to make a motion to take a recess instead of to adjourn.

Mr. RODDENBERY. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I would like to ask the gentleman with reference to the probability of being in session a part of to-morrow. It is not the idea that we will hold any session on Sunday except for the consideration of supply bills, is it?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Well, we shall have to hold sessions for the consideration of the business that comes before the House. The "gentleman from Alabama" can not limit what the House shall do. The House must determine that.

Mr. RODDENBERY. What I had in mind at the time the unanimous-consent request was being preferred by the gentleman, he having stated that it might be necessary, in connection with taking these recesses, to hold sessions to-morrow, was that I did not care for that statement to go along with the unanimous consent without attention being called to it now, so that an objection to it hereafter, if made, would not appear to be inconsistent with the assent at this time.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Of course the gentleman knows that it is perfectly in order to-night to move to adjourn so that we can meet to-morrow, or suspend the rules and meet to-morrow. I am merely trying to expedite business.

Mr. RODDENBERY. I will ask the gentleman further: A recess might be taken, or an adjournment might be taken, whichever might be preferred, to meet to-morrow—that is, Sunday—for the consideration of supply bills, conference reports, and matters to close up legislation that gentlemen seem to be of opinion should pass; but does the gentleman mean to include in that, by taking a recess to meet to-morrow, that it might be contemplated by the House that we would take up and move to suspend the rules to pass some general legislative bill on Sunday that is not now in conference or which did not involve an appropriation?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I can not answer the gentleman. I can not tell what the House will do when it meets. I ask unanimous consent, Mr. Speaker.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

RECESS.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Then, Mr. Speaker, I move that the House do now take a recess until 8 o'clock to-night.

Mr. MANN. Would it not be better to make it 8.30?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Speaker, at the request of some gentlemen here, who want a little more time, I will modify my request, and ask that the House take a recess until 8.30, with the request that all Members be here to-night.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD] moves that the House take a recess until half past 8 to-night.

The motion was agreed to; accordingly (at 6 o'clock and 49 minutes p. m.) the House stood in recess until 8.30 p. m.

EVENING SESSION.

At the expiration of the recess the House resumed its session.

MONUMENTS ON BULL RUN BATTLE FIELDS.

Mr. HAY. Mr. Speaker, I ask to call up from the Speaker's table the bill (S. 1142) to protect the monuments already erected on the battle fields of Bull Run, Va., and other monuments that may be there erected, a similar bill having been reported by the House committee.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the bill.

Mr. HARDWICK. I reserve a point of order against it, because under the statement of the gentleman so far made it would not be privileged, and he could not call it up in that way.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Georgia reserves the point of order.

Mr. HAY. I move to suspend the rules and pass the bill.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Virginia moves to suspend the rules and pass a bill which will be reported by the Clerk.

The bill was read, as follows:

Whereas United States troops belonging to the Department of Washington, in the month of June, 1865, took possession of certain lands on the battle fields of Bull Run and erected thereon two monuments, about 1 mile apart, and dedicated the same in memory of the patriots who fell July 21, 1861, and August 28, 29, and 30, 1862, in the battles known as the first and second Bull Run; and

Whereas the said monuments still stand on private property, the title to which has never been acquired by the United States; and

Whereas many military organizations which took part in said battles desire to suitably commemorate the same; and

Whereas the State of Virginia has ceded to the United States their jurisdiction over land that may be acquired for the purposes herein named, not to exceed 200 acres: Therefore

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of War is hereby directed to inquire into the practicability of purchasing the land upon which the aforesaid monuments stand, the advisability of making the purchase thereof, and the price which will have to be paid therefor.

The SPEAKER. Is a second demanded?

Mr. FOSTER. I demand a second.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois demands a second.

Mr. HENRY of Texas. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of no quorum present.

The SPEAKER. Evidently there is no quorum present.

Mr. HAY. I move a call of the House.

The motion was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. A call of the House is ordered. The Doorkeeper will lock the doors, the Sergeant at Arms will notify absentees, and the Clerk will call the roll.

The Clerk proceeded to call the roll, when the following Members failed to answer to their names:

Aiken, S. C.	Fordney	Langley	Redfield

The SPEAKER. On this roll call 249 Members have answered—a quorum.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Speaker, I move to dispense with further proceedings under the call.

The motion was agreed to, and the Doorkeeper was directed to open the doors.

The SPEAKER. The question is on ordering a second.

Mr. HAY. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that a second may be considered as ordered.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Virginia asks unanimous consent that a second may be considered as ordered. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Virginia [Mr. HAY] has 20 minutes and the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. FOSTER] has 20 minutes.

Mr. HAY. Mr. Speaker, unless the gentleman from Illinois wishes to ask me some question I do not desire to address the House.

Mr. FOSTER. I would like to ask the gentleman from Virginia with reference to the bill. I observe that the bill as originally introduced, and very much the same in the Senate, provided for the buying of not more than 200 acres of land, and there was an appropriation proposed of $50,000. As it passed the Senate all that matter has been stricken out, and it provides that the Secretary of War shall be directed to inquire into the practicability of purchasing the land on which the monuments stand, and the price that will have to be paid therefor. I want to ask the gentleman if this land which it is proposed to buy will cost $50,000?

Mr. HAY. I think not. The Committee on Military Affairs of the House reported the bill in the identical words as it passed the Senate. They reported it in that way and struck out the provision for the appropriation, because they thought that $50,000 was too much and that the land could be bought for very much less. We want information from the War Department in order that we may know just what the land is worth. However, I will say that the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. CARLIN] is the Representative of that district and knows more about the value of the land than I do, and I yield such time as he may desire.

Mr. MANN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HAY. I will.

Mr. MANN. The bill the gentleman now calls up is the Senate bill. Is that the same as the committee amendment to the House bill?

Mr. HAY. In the same words.

Mr. MANN. Providing for an investigation as to the practicability of purchasing or acquiring the land on which the monuments are erected on the Bull Run battlefield?

Mr. HAY. Yes.

Mr. FOSTER. I would like to ask the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. CARLIN] to give the House some idea of what this land can be secured for.

Mr. CARLIN. I have no definite idea as to the value of it, but I should think somewhere in the neighborhood of $75 or $100 an acre—perhaps more and perhaps less.

Mr. FOSTER. Does the gentleman believe that the land down there is worth $75 or $100 an acre?

Mr. CARLIN. I do; yes.

Mr. FOSTER. Mr. Speaker, I do not know, of course, what this land is worth, but this is an investigation looking to the feasibility of acquiring this land for the purposes of care and protection of the monuments on the first and second Bull Run battle fields. I believe that it is proper and right that the Government should ascertain the advisability of securing land for that purpose.

Mr. Speaker, this inquiry, I take it, is to be made by the Secretary of War and will not cost the Government anything, and if Congress in the future decides not to purchase the land at the option offered there will be no obligation to buy it.

Mr. CARLIN. The gentleman is correct.

Mr. FOSTER. I see the interest of the gentleman from Virginia in preserving these historic battle fields, and I believe that, so far as I am concerned, I will not object to it.

Mr. COX. How much land are they going to buy?

Mr. FOSTER. Not more than 200 acres.

Mr. SISSON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FOSTER. Yes.

Mr. SISSON. I have been over the battle field, and I am in sympathy with the object of the bill, but I am doubtful whether 200 acres will cover the engagement and scope of the monuments there.

Mr. FOSTER. It is the intention to buy the land on which the monument stands, not to buy all of the land on which the battles were fought. It is only to take in the land on which the monuments are erected.

Mr. MANN. This bill is to acquire information. It does not pledge the Government to buying anything.

Mr. SISSON. I understand; but the acreage is limited to 200 acres.

Mr. MANN. No; it is not.

Mr. SISSON. I so gathered from the reading of the bill.

Mr. COX. Does not the gentleman think the bill states in the beginning the proposition to purchase many hundreds of acres?

Mr. MANN. The cession of the State of Virginia is limited to 200 acres—the jurisdiction of the State of Virginia.

Mr. SISSON. In this bill?

Mr. CARLIN. The Legislature of the State of Virginia would extend the jurisdiction if the Federal Government desires it.

Mr. SISSON. From an examination of the battle field I really do not believe that 200 acres will cover what the Government ought to preserve, and I want to say another thing. I believe that the gentleman from Virginia has placed the land valuations entirely too high. I made some inquiries respecting that.

Mr. FOSTER. But the gentleman would not expect the gentleman from Virginia to price the land in his own State at a low figure.

Mr. SISSON. Oh, no.

Mr. FOSTER. I am sure the gentleman from Mississippi would not price land in Mississippi at a low figure.

Mr. CARLIN. If I were pricing the land in Mississippi I would perhaps have made it lower, but this is valuable, desirable land.

Mr. MANN. This bill does not provide for even acquiring information about the battle field of Bull Run, but only as to the land upon which two monuments are now erected, and I judge as to the land between those monuments.

Mr. CARLIN. That is all.

The SPEAKER. The question is on suspending the rules and passing the Senate bill.

The question was taken, and (two-thirds having voted in favor thereof) the rules were suspended, and the bill was passed.

COAL-MINING COMPANIES IN OKLAHOMA.

The SPEAKER laid before the House the bill (S. 3843) granting the coal-mining companies in the State of Oklahoma the right to acquire additional acreage adjoining their mine leases, and for other purposes, with House amendments thereto.

The Clerk read the House amendments.

Mr. CARTER. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House insist upon its amendments and agree to the conference asked.

The motion was agreed to.

The SPEAKER announced the following conferees: Mr. CARTER, Mr. HAYDEN, and Mr. CAMPBELL.

WORKMEN'S COMPENSATION BILL.

Mr. BRANTLEY. Mr. Speaker, I move to suspend the rules and pass the bill (S. 5382) to provide an exclusive remedy and compensation for accidental injuries, resulting in disability or death, to employees of common carriers by railroad engaged in interstate or foreign commerce, or in the District of Columbia, and for other purposes, with amendments thereto, which I send to the desk and ask to have read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That every common carrier, including express companies, engaged in interstate or foreign commerce by railroad, including commerce between the District of Columbia and a State (hereinafter designated employer), shall pay compensation in the amounts hereinafter specified to any employee who, while employed in such commerce by such employer, sustains personal injury by accident arising out of and in the course of his employment and resulting in his disability, or to the dependents, as hereinafter defined, of such employee in case such injury results in his death.

SEC. 2. That every common carrier, including express companies, by railroad in the District of Columbia (hereinafter designated employer) shall pay compensation in the amounts hereinafter specified to any employee who sustains personal injury by accident arising out of and in the course of his employment and resulting in his disability, or to the dependents, as hereinafter defined, of such employee in case such injury results in his death.

SEC. 3. That except as provided herein no such employer shall be civilly liable for any personal injury to or death of any such employee resulting from any such accident.

SEC. 4. That the first five calendar days of disability resulting from any injury shall be excluded from the period of time for which compensation is hereinafter specified, but this shall not be construed to reduce the length of time over which payments shall extend wherever specific periods are herein fixed: Provided, however, That during said five days the employer shall furnish all medical and surgical aid and assistance that may be reasonably required, including hospital services.

SEC. 5. That after the expiration of the five days mentioned in the foregoing section the employer shall continue to furnish such medical and surgical aid and assistance as may be reasonably required, including hospital services, in an amount not exceeding $200: Provided, That if the employee elects to furnish his own physician or surgeon or to care for himself he shall receive from his employer such expenses incurred therefor by him as are reasonable and just, not to exceed $200. The compensation hereinafter provided shall be in addition to all such surgical, medical, and hospital services as set forth in this and the preceding section.

SEC. 6. That no compensation or benefits shall be allowed for the injury or death of any employee where it is proved that his injury or death was occasioned by his willful intention to bring about the injury or death of himself or of another, or that the same resulted from his intoxication while on duty: Provided, That this clause as to intoxication shall not apply if the employer knew or in the exercise of ordinary care might have known that the employee was intoxicated or that he was in the habit of becoming intoxicated.

SEC. 7. That it shall be the duty of the injured employee, immediately upon the happening of the accident, or as soon thereafter as practicable, and not later than 90 days thereafter, and likewise in case of his death by such accident the duty of one or more of the dependents of an employee, within 90 days thereafter, to give or cause to be given to the employer written notice of the accident causing such injury or death, stating in ordinary language the time and place thereof, the name of the injured or dead employee, his class of service, and the address of the injured employee or person giving the notice: Provided, That where it is made to appear that the party herein required to give such written notice has been prevented from giving it through or by reason of mental or physical incapacity, ignorance of law or of fact, or the fraud or deceit of some other person, or from other good cause, the same may be given after the expiration of said 90 days, but not later than six months from the date of the accident or death.

In the absence of such written notice the employer shall not be liable to pay any compensation under this act unless it is made to appear that such employer had knowledge or information of the injury or death: Provided, That in case of death resulting within 48 hours from the time of the accident notice thereof shall not be required.

No defect or inaccuracy in the written notice herein required shall be deemed material unless the employer shall show that he was prejudiced thereby, and then only to the extent of such prejudice; and such written notice may be substantially in the following form:

"FORM OF NOTICE OF ACCIDENT AND CLAIM.

"To be filled out by an injured employee or by a dependent of a deceased employee or by a person acting for either.

"To ——:

"You are hereby notified that —— —— (name of deceased or injured employee), your employee, met with an accident on or about the —— day of ——, 19—, at or near ——, in the State of ——, and that the accident occurred in the course of his employment by you as —— (class of service), and resulted in his —— (disability or death) on the —— day of ——, 19—, and claim for compensation is hereby made.

"Name —— —— (person giving notice),
"Address —— ——."

But no variation from this form shall be material if the notice is sufficient to advise the employer that a certain employee by name met with an accident in the course of his employment (stating the nature of such employment) on or about a specified time at or near a certain place which resulted in his disability or death. The notice may be served personally upon the employer, or upon any agent of the employer upon whom a summons may be served in a civil action under the laws of the State or Territory or the District of Columbia where the accident occurred, or upon any station agent, or by sending it by registered mail to the employer, addressed to the principal office or to any division superintendent of such employer, or to any such agent aforesaid.

SEC. 8. That it shall be lawful at any time after the expiration of 14 days from the date of an injury, unless an award or findings shall have previously been made, for the employer and employee to settle by agreement according to the limitations of amount and time in this act established, the compensation due under this act, which agreement shall be in writing signed and acknowledged by the parties, and shall specify the compensation, if any, due and unpaid by the employer to the employee up to the date of the agreement, and, if agreed upon, the amount of the monthly payments thereafter to be made by the employer to the employee, and the time such monthly payments shall continue. In case of death it shall be lawful for the employer and any of the dependents of the deceased employee to settle by agreement in like manner and with the same effect the compensation payable to such dependent under this act. The periods of compensation provided for permanent total disabilities or for the permanent partial disabilities specifically mentioned in subdivision one, clause (D) of section 21, or for death, and the provisions of this act with respect to periodic payments and the percentage which such payments shall bear to the monthly wages shall not be varied by such agreement. Such agreement may be substantially as follows:

"In the matter of the claim of —— —— for personal injury received by —— ——, in the service of ——.

"—— and ——, an employee of said ——, injured in —— service (or in case of death, —— ——, dependent of —— ——, deceased, an employee injured in the service of said ——), hereby agree to the following adjustment under the Federal accident compensation act of the liability for injuries (or death resulting from injuries) to —— ——, received in the course of and arising out of his employment by said —— (or receiver, as the case may be), in interstate (or foreign) commerce (or in the District of Columbia), at ——, on the —— day of ——, 191— (here state the facts generally as to the work in which employee was engaged when injured), the said adjustment being as follows: (Here state the terms of the adjustment, referring to the appropriate sections and subsections of the act.)

"(Signed) —— —— "—— ——,
"Employee (or dependent of employee)."

Said agreement shall be executed in triplicate, one of which may be retained by the employer, one by the employee or his dependents, and the other shall be filed with the adjuster, as provided in section 12. Any modification or alteration of said agreement, if made by the parties, shall be in writing and executed and filed in the same manner and with like effect. If the employer shall fail for a period of 10 days after written demand to make any payment provided for in said agreement, the employee or dependent, at his election, may maintain an action in any State or Federal court of competent jurisdiction to enforce such agreement or may treat such agreement as rescinded and proceed to enforce the claim for compensation under the provisions of this act. Save as provided in this section no agreement purporting to settle compensation due under this act shall be valid.

SEC. 9. That it shall be competent for any employer subject to the provisions of this act and his employees to organize and constitute, in such manner as they may determine, a committee or committees for the purpose of settling disputes and awarding compensation under and in accordance with the limitations as to amount and time prescribed in this act; and it shall thereupon be the duty of the employer to file a written notice with the adjuster or adjusters having jurisdiction within the territory for which said committee is constituted, giving the names and post-office addresses of the members of the committee or committees. If the compensation due under this act be not settled by the agreement of the parties, and any such committee exists, the differences between the employer and employee arising under this act shall, upon the request in writing of either party and the written consent of the other filed with the committee, be settled by such committee in accordance with the provisions of this act, and after the filing of such consent the provisions of this act with reference to instituting original proceedings before the adjuster shall not apply. Such committee shall not be bound by technical rules and shall give the parties and their witnesses ample opportunity to be heard. The award made by such committee shall be final, except as provided in section 11, and shall be filed by the committee with the adjuster having jurisdiction within 30 days after the same is made, and the provisions of section 12, so far as applicable, shall apply thereto. The adjuster shall file such award with the clerk of the court having jurisdiction in the same manner and with the same effect as findings made by the adjuster, and said award, except that it shall be final, shall be treated in all respects as such findings. If the committee shall fail to make an award within 90 days after the filing of such consent, the same shall, by the said committee at the request of either party in writing, be immediately referred to the adjuster having jurisdiction thereof, who shall proceed to hear and determine the same as if the claim for compensation were originally before him upon petition and answer.

SEC. 10. That before any agreement or award has been made it shall be the duty of the injured employee, if so requested by the employer, to submit himself at least once, at reasonable times and places, for examination by a duly qualified physician or physicians furnished and paid by the employer, and the employee shall have the right to have a duly qualified physician or physicians, chosen by himself, present at such examination.

SEC. 11. That an agreement for compensation may be modified at any time within two years after the accident by a subsequent agreement. At any time before the expiration of two years from the date of the accident, but not afterwards, and before the expiration of the period for which payment of compensation has been fixed thereby, but not afterwards, any agreement, award, findings, or judgment may be reviewed by the adjuster upon the application of either party after due notice to the other party upon the ground that the incapacity of the injured employee has subsequently ended, increased, or diminished. Upon such review the adjuster may increase, diminish, or discontinue the compensation from the date of the application for review, in accordance with the facts, or make such other order as the justice of the case may require, but such order shall have no retroactive effect. The findings of the adjuster upon such review shall be served on the parties and filed with the clerk of the court having jurisdiction, in like time and manner and subject to like disposition as in the case of original findings: Provided, That not more than one review shall be had upon the application of any one party.

SEC. 12. That it shall be the duty of the employer to file, or cause to be filed, every agreement for compensation, or modification thereof, to which he is a party, in the office of the adjuster having jurisdiction, as hereinafter provided, within 60 days after it is made; otherwise it shall be voidable by the employee or dependent. The same shall be received and filed by said adjuster and recorded and indexed. A copy thereof, certified by the adjuster, may be admitted in evidence with like effect as the original; and it shall be the duty of the adjuster to furnish a certified copy at the request of any person in interest: Provided, That the employee or dependent who is a party to said agreement may file the same with the same effect as though filed by the employer: And provided further, That where there are two or more adjusters having concurrent territorial jurisdiction, such agreement shall be filed with the adjuster senior in date of appointment.

SEC. 13. (1) That the United States district court in each judicial district shall, within 30 days after this act takes effect, appoint a competent person to be known as adjuster of accident compensation, and may, from time to time, whenever the business in any such district in the judgment of the Attorney General of the United States justifies it, appoint additional adjusters. Each of such adjusters shall receive a salary of not less than $1,800 nor more than $3,000 per annum, to be paid by the United States in equal monthly installments in like manner as salaries of district judges are paid. It shall be the duty of the Attorney General of the United States, as soon as practicable, to make inquiry and fix and establish the salary to be paid to each adjuster within the limits aforesaid, the determination by him of the amount to be based upon the extent of the business done or to be done by said adjuster under this act. Each adjuster shall have jurisdiction of all cases arising under this act within the judicial district for which he is appointed: Provided, however, That where more than one adjuster is appointed for a judicial district, the court making the appointment may, in its discretion, determine the manner in which the authority of the respective adjusters shall be exercised under this act within the same district or limit the jurisdiction of any adjuster appointed by it to one or more counties or other territorial subdivision within the district, in which case the jurisdiction of such adjuster shall extend to such county or counties, or territorial subdivision only, except as hereinafter provided: And provided further, That every appointment of an adjuster shall be certified by the district court making it to the circuit court of appeals having jurisdiction of the district, and said circuit court of appeals may, within 30 days after the receipt of the same, for good cause, disapprove such appointment, in which case it shall become of no effect, and such district court shall make another appointment, but the acts of such adjuster in the meantime shall be valid.

(2) No person shall be appointed as adjuster who, at the time of his appointment, holds any office of profit or emolument under the laws of the United States or of any State other than the office of commissioner of deeds, justice of the peace, or notary public, or who has been in the employment of any railroad as claim agent or attorney within a period of 12 months prior to his appointment, or who is related by marriage or by consanguinity or affinity within the third degree, as determined by the common law, to any judge of the district court of the United States, or judge or justice of an appellate court, having jurisdiction of the district wherein he may be appointed. The adjuster shall be a resident of the territorial district for which he is appointed. He shall hold his office for a term of four years, but may be removed at any time by the court or by the President on the recommendation of the Attorney General of the United States, if his services are no longer required in the public interest or for good cause shown.

Each adjuster before entering upon the duties of his office shall take an oath of office for the faithful and impartial performance of his duties. In case any adjuster shall be removed, or for any reason shall cease to act, he shall transfer all his official records, files, and papers to his successor in office, or, if none, then to the clerk of the district court having jurisdiction, and the court shall have power to enforce this provision by order: Provided, however, That nothing herein shall operate to render any adjuster ineligible to act in a like capacity under the law of any State.

(3) It shall be the duty of the said adjuster to keep a record of his proceedings, and he shall have the power to preserve and enforce order in his presence while transacting business; to subpœna witnesses, to administer oaths in any proceeding and in all other cases where it may be necessary in the exercise of his powers and duties; to formulate, issue, amend, and control his processes and orders consistent with law as may be necessary to carry into effect the powers and jurisdiction possessed by him; to examine persons as witnesses, take evidence, require the production of documents, and to do all other things conformable to law which may be necessary to enable him effectively to discharge the duties of his office.

(4) If any person shall, in proceedings before an adjuster, disobey or resist any lawful order or process, or misbehave during a hearing or so near the place thereof as to obstruct the same, neglect to produce after having been ordered to do so any pertinent document, or refuse to appear after having been subpœnaed, or, upon appearing, refuse to take the oath as a witness, or after having taken the oath refuse to be examined according to law, the adjuster shall certify the facts to the district court having jurisdiction, which shall thereupon in a summary manner hear the evidence as to the acts complained of, and if the evidence so warrant, punish such person in the same manner and to the same extent as for a contempt committed before the court, or commit such person upon the same conditions as if the doing of the forbidden act had occurred with reference to the process of or in the presence of the court: Provided, That no person shall be required to attend as a witness before an adjuster at a place outside of the State of his residence and more than 100 miles from such place of residence, or unless his lawful mileage and fee for one day's attendance shall be first paid or tendered to him: Provided, That either party may take the testimony to be used before the adjuster, of a witness, either by deposition or interrogatories, according to the rules of practice in force in the United States district in which the case is pending.

(5) It shall be the duty of said adjuster to maintain and keep open during reasonable business hours an office at the place of his residence for the transaction of business under this act, at which office he shall keep his records and papers. He shall, however, hear cases at such other place or places within the limits of his territorial jurisdiction as will be most convenient for the parties and witnesses, including the place where the accident occurred and the residence of the injured or deceased employee. He shall be allowed all necessary traveling expenses in going to and from his place of residence for the purpose of conducting such hearings and his necessary and reasonable expense of subsistence actually incurred while so absent, not exceeding $5 per day. Accounts for all such expenses shall be approved by the district court and transmitted to the Attorney General of the United States and paid as allowed by him. Said accounts shall be rendered quarter yearly, beginning with the 1st day of October next after this law goes into effect. The Attorney General, upon requisition, shall, at the expense of the United States, furnish each adjuster with necessary records, books, blanks, and stationery supplies.

(6) No adjuster shall act in any case in which he is interested, or when he is employed by either party or related to either party by marriage or by consanguinity or affinity within the third degree, as determined by the common law. Whenever it shall be made to appear, by the application of either party, to the satisfaction of the district court having jurisdiction, that the adjuster before whom any case is pending is disqualified, or that he entertains bias or prejudice, so that a fair and impartial hearing of the case can not be had before him, it shall be the duty of the court to order the case transferred for hearing and disposition to another adjuster within the judicial district, or if none, to another adjuster within the State, or if none, then to appoint a competent person to act in the case as adjuster pro tempore. Such adjuster pro tempore shall possess all the powers conferred upon the adjuster by this act and shall proceed in the same manner and with the same effect. His compensation shall be fixed by the court appointing him, and such compensation shall be paid by the United States on the approval of the judge and the allowance of the Attorney General. The parties may agree to transfer any case to another adjuster in the same State, and in case of such agreement or order all papers and a certified copy of any record in the case shall without cost be forthwith transmitted by the adjuster before whom the case is pending to the adjuster agreed upon or designated, who shall, upon receipt of such papers and copy of record, proceed as though the case had been originally brought before him.

(7) Neither an adjuster nor the partner of an adjuster shall appear as attorney for either party in any proceedings under this act.

(8) The adjuster may, in any case upon application of either party or of his own motion, appoint a disinterested and duly qualified physician to make any necessary medical examination of the employee and testify in respect thereto. Said physician shall be allowed a reasonable fee, to be fixed by the adjuster, not exceeding for each examination $10, which shall be included by the adjuster in his account and paid as provided in paragraph 5 of section 13: Provided, however, That the adjuster shall in every case receive the testimony of any physician called by either the employer or the employee.

(9) Witness fees and mileage shall be computed at the rate allowed for witnesses in the United States district courts, and fees and mileage for serving the petition or other papers shall be computed at the rate allowed for service of summons from said court in civil suits by the United States marshal. Costs legally incurred may be taxed against either party or apportioned between the parties, in the sound discretion of the adjuster or of the court, as the case may be, and as the justice of the case may require.

(10) The adjuster or adjusters for the District of Columbia shall be appointed by the Supreme Court of the District, and such adjuster or adjusters shall hold the same tenure of office as prescribed for adjusters appointed by the United States district courts, subject to removal by the Supreme Court of the District of Columbia, or by the President on the recommendation of the Attorney General of the United States, for like cause, and shall have the same power and jurisdiction under this act within the limits of the District of Columbia, and shall be governed by all the provisions of this act, so far as the same may be applicable, in the same manner as adjusters appointed by the United States district courts. The findings of the adjuster or adjusters shall be transmitted to the said supreme court, and shall be disposed of by said court in the same manner and under the same rules as are prescribed herein for the disposal of such matters by the United States district courts. The said supreme court and the justices thereof shall have and exercise the same power in all cases arising under this act within the District of Columbia as are conferred by this act upon the United States district courts.

SEC. 14. (1) That in default of agreement between the parties interested or submission to a committee as hereinbefore provided, the employer, employee, or any dependent may, after giving notice of the accident when the same is required, or without giving notice where such notice is not required, and within one year from the date of the injury or death, institute proceedings for the settlement and adjustment of the claim before an adjuster having jurisdiction within the territory where the accident occurred. Such proceedings may be instituted by petition, setting forth in ordinary language the facts constituting the claim and asking that compensation be fixed and awarded in accordance with the provisions of this act. Unless service is accepted by the party defendant a copy of such petition shall be served upon him and return of such service made in the manner provided by law.

(2) Within 10 days after such service the party defendant may answer the petition and in such answer shall include such questions of law and fact as it may be desired to put in issue. As soon as practicable after the answer has been received, the adjuster shall proceed to hear the case and decide the same, his decision both upon questions of fact and law being reviewable in the district court as herein provided. If no answer has been filed within 10 days after the service of the petition, or such other time as may be fixed by the adjuster, the said adjuster shall enter a default and proceed to hear the evidence and determine the case with the same effect as though answer had been made. If no proceedings shall be instituted for the settlement and adjustment of a claim arising under this act within one year as above provided, the same shall be forever barred, unless the adjuster shall find that the failure to institute proceedings within such time was chargeable to the employer or to circumstances clearly beyond the control of the employee or dependent. But under no circumstances shall any claim for compensation be maintainable after the lapse of two years from the date of injury or death, except in cases in this act otherwise provided for: Provided, That in any case where the period during which payments are to be made is not made final by agreement, award, findings, or final judgment, such claim shall be maintainable within three months from the date when the last payment was due according to the terms of such agreement, award, findings, or judgment, or, when no such time has been fixed, or where payments are discontinued by the employer as set forth in section 8, from the date of the last actual payment: Provided, That where an employee institutes suit for an injury claiming that same did not take place while he was employed in interstate or foreign commerce and fails to recover in such suit, on the ground that he was employed in such commerce, the limitation of the time for his right to proceed under this act shall begin with the termination of such suit, and not with the time when the injury to him occurred.

(3) The adjuster shall allow either party to be represented by counsel, or an agent, who need not be a member of the bar, and after hearing any evidence that may be presented and considering any arguments that may be made he shall promptly make and render his findings in writing, a copy of which shall be served on each of the parties, and shall return such findings, together with the petition and answer, if any, into the clerk's office of the United States district court for the district in which he was appointed, or the clerk's office of the Supreme Court of the District of Columbia, as the case may be. The clerk of the court shall forthwith file the same and make an entry thereof on his docket without charge. At any time within 20 days after receiving a copy of the findings either party may file exceptions with the clerk of the court and serve a copy thereof on the adverse party, stating generally that the findings of the adjuster are excepted to on the ground that they are contrary to the law and evidence, whereupon the case shall be tried and determined in said court, all questions of law and fact being open for consideration de novo. And said court may regulate by rule the practice in such cases in all respects not provided for by statute. The party filing exceptions shall at the same time pay to the clerk of the court the sum of $5, which shall be in lieu of all other clerk's fees and charges, and no other or additional charge for any service rendered by said clerk in said cause except as herein otherwise provided shall be made. Any such amount shall be taxed by the court as costs against the losing party. If no exceptions shall be filed by either party as above provided, the said findings shall become final and have the effect of and, subject to payment of fees as in other cases, be enforced as a judgment of the court, and the clerk shall, without charge, record said findings and index the same as in the case of other judgments: Provided, That if the employer shall file exceptions to the findings of the adjuster, and shall not on the trial de novo in the district court reduce the amount awarded by the adjuster to the employee, there shall be added by the court when judgment is entered on the finding of the court or the verdict of the jury on the trial in said district court 25 per cent on the sum awarded to the employee by said court in its findings or by the verdict.

(4) Where exceptions are filed, either party shall have the right to a trial by jury, upon the claim for compensation under this act, as in cases at common law. But a jury trial may be waived by consent of the parties, and the court shall thereupon hear and determine the case without a jury. Where the case is tried by a jury the court may submit special interrogatories, to be answered by the jury in the form of a special verdict. If the evidence produced before the adjuster shall be taken in writing or in shorthand, it may be, in case of appeal from the finding of the adjuster, transcribed and duly authenticated, and filed with the clerk of the United States court; and may be thereafter read in evidence in any future hearing or trial in said cause under the same circumstances and with the same force and effect as a deposition may now be read in suits at law.

(5) Wherever counsel or agent for the employee has stipulated for a fee, the agreement for such fee shall be made in writing and filed with the adjuster or clerk of the court in which the case is pending, and the employee shall not be liable to pay any fee in excess of the amount allowed by the adjuster or the court. In every case it shall be the duty of the adjuster or the court, as the case may be, regardless of any agreement, to fix the compensation, which shall not exceed a fair and reasonable sum for the services actually rendered, which shall not be greater than the sum agreed upon.

(6) Appeals and writs of error may be taken from the district courts to the circuit courts of appeals and to the Supreme Court of the United States as provided in sections 128 and 238 of the Judicial Code, and it shall be competent for the Supreme Court of the United States to require, by certiorari or otherwise, any case to be certified to it for review and determination as provided in section 251 of the Judicial Code. In cases arising in the District of Columbia appeals may be taken from the Supreme Court of the District to the Court of Appeals of the District as in other cases, and appeals and writs of error may be taken to the Supreme Court of the United States as in other cases and said court may require, by certiorari or otherwise, any case to be certified to it for review and determination as in other cases.

(7) Any petition may be served by the United States marshal for the district where the proceedings are pending, or by any deputy. Any subpœna, process, or order of an adjuster, or any notice or paper requiring service, may be served by such United States marshal or deputy, or by any citizen of the United States over the age of 21 years, being a resident of such district, or by registered mail sent by the adjuster to the person or employer to be served, postage prepaid, and addressed to the principal place of business of such employer or to the place of residence of such person. The affidavit of such citizen, or the return registry receipt signed by the person or employer to be served, shall be prima facie proof of service.

SEC. 15. That while any person entitled to compensation under this act shall be an infant or mentally incompetent, his natural guardian, or guardian, or committee, appointed pursuant to law, may on his behalf perform any duty required or exercise any right conferred by this act with the same force and effect as if such person was legally capable to act in his own behalf. No limitation respecting the time within which any right under this act is to be asserted shall, as against such infant or incompetent person, run while such infant or incompetent person has no guardian or committee: Provided, however, That the foregoing shall not apply to cases of infancy where the infant is over the age of 18 years, but such infant shall be treated for all purposes of this act as though of full age.

SEC. 16. That the assignment of any cause of action arising under this act, or of any payments due or to become due under the provisions hereof, shall be void. Every liability and all payments due or to become due under this act shall be exempt from levy or sale for private debt. In case of insolvency every liability for compensation under this act shall constitute a first lien upon all the property of the employer liable therefor paramount to all other claims or liens except for wages and taxes, and such lien shall be enforced by order of the court.

SEC. 17. That nothing in this act shall interfere with any proceeding by the United States to enforce any act of Congress regulating the appliances or conduct of any common carrier, or affect the liability of any such common carrier to a fine or penalty under any such act. Nothing in this act shall be so construed as to affect the power and jurisdiction of the courts, under the established principles of equity, to reform or cancel any agreement or award.

SEC. 18. That where an injury or death for which compensation is payable under this act was caused under circumstances also creating a legal liability for damages on the part of any carrier subject to the provisions of this act other than the employer, the employer shall be subrogated to the right of the employee or dependents to recover against such other carrier, and such employer may bring legal proceedings against such carrier to recover the damages sustained by the injured employee or dependents in an amount not exceeding the aggregate amount of compensation payable to the injured employee or dependents under this act. That where the injury or death for which compensation is payable under this act was caused under circumstances also creating a legal liability for damages on the part of any person other than the employer, such person not being subject to the provisions of this act, legal proceedings may be taken against such other person to recover damages, notwithstanding the payment of or liability to pay compensation under this act; but in such case, if the action against such other person is brought by the injured employee, or in case of his death by his dependents, and judgment is obtained and paid, or settlement is made with such other person, either with or without suit, the employer shall be entitled to deduct from the compensation payable by him the amount actually received by such employee or dependents: Provided, That if the injured employee, or in case of his death his dependents, shall agree to receive compensation from the employer, or institute proceedings to recover the same, or accept from the employer any payment on account of such compensation, such employer shall be subrogated to the rights of such employee or dependents to the extent of his liability under the provisions of this act and may maintain an action therefor, but such action by such employer shall be no bar to an action by such employee or his dependents for damages against such other person in excess of the amount of compensation paid or to be paid under this act.

SEC. 19. That no contract, rule, regulation, or device whatsoever, shall operate to relieve the employer in whole or in part from any liability created by this act.

SEC. 20. That for all the purposes of this act the monthly wages of an employee, unless the monthly wage is ascertained by the contract of employment, shall be twenty-six times the established day's pay prevailing in the business of his employer for the class of service for which such employee was receiving pay at the time of the accident or, if payment be by the hour, by the piece, or by the job, shall be twenty-six times the average of one day's earnings in such business and class of service ascertained by taking the aggregate of the earnings for the month next preceding the accident and dividing this aggregate by the number of days on which the employee worked in the month. Calculations of the percentage of wages herein mentioned shall be based on the monthly wages ascertained by the contract of employment or on the amount thereof determined as aforesaid, as the case may be. For the purpose of such calculation, no employee's wages shall be considered to be more than $120 a month or less than $50 a month; except that where in any case the monthly wages of the employee are less than $25 per month payment for the first 24 months of disability shall not exceed the full amount of such monthly wages: Provided, That where the employee is engaged in a class of service in which employees habitually and with the sanction of the employer receive for their own use gratuities from the traveling public, the monthly wages of such employee shall not be considered to be less than $50 a month.

All compensation under this act shall be paid monthly unless commuted as hereinafter provided.

SEC. 21. That compensation under this act shall be made in accordance with the following schedule:

(A) Where death results from any injury, except in the cases provided for in section 2B, and except in those cases in which, in certain contingencies, a reduced period is hereinafter provided for, the following amounts shall be paid for a period of eight years from the date of the death: Provided, however, That this limitation shall not apply to any child under the age of 16 years; but payments shall continue to such child until it shall have attained the age of 16 years.

(1) If the deceased employee leave a widow and no child under the age of 16, and no dependent child over the age of 16, there shall be paid to the widow 40 per cent of the monthly wages of the deceased.

(2) If the deceased employee leave a widow and any child under the age of 16, or any dependent child over the age of 16, there shall be paid to the widow for the benefit of herself and such child or children 50 per cent of the monthly wages of the deceased.

(3) If the deceased employee leave any child under the age of 16, or dependent child over the age of 16, but no widow, there shall be paid, if one such child, 25 per cent of the monthly wages of the deceased to such child, and if more than one such child 10 per cent additional for each of such children, not to exceed a total of 50 per cent of the monthly wages of the deceased divided among the children, share and share alike: Provided, That if the number of children entitled to payment be subsequently reduced to less than four, the amount of the payments shall be correspondingly diminished.

(4) In the event of the death or remarriage of a widow receiving payments under subdivision (2) of this clause, the amounts stated in subdivision (3) shall thereafter be paid to the child or children of the deceased employee therein specified for the unexpired part of the period of eight years from the date of the employee's death, but to continue in any event until the youngest child shall have attained the age of 16 years, subject to the provisions of subdivision (9) of this clause (A).

(5) If the deceased employee leave no widow or children entitled to any payment hereunder, but leave a parent or parents, there shall be paid, in case of partial dependency, 15 per cent of the monthly wages of the deceased to such parent or parents, and if either is or both are wholly dependent on the deceased there shall be paid in lieu of the 15 per cent, if only one parent, 25 per cent of the monthly wages of the deceased, or if both parents, 40 per cent of the monthly wages of the deceased, to such parent or parents.

(6) If the deceased leave no widow or child or parent entitled to any payment hereunder, but leave any brother, sister, grandparent, or grandchild wholly dependent upon him for support, there shall be paid to such dependent relative, if but one, 20 per cent of the monthly wages of the deceased, or if more than one, 30 per cent of the monthly wages of the deceased, divided among them share and share alike. If none of such relatives is wholly dependent and the deceased leave any such relative or relatives partially dependent upon him for support, there shall be paid to such dependent relative or relatives 10 per cent of the monthly wages of the deceased, divided among them share and share alike.

(7) The foregoing subdivisions of this clause (A) shall apply only to dependents who at the time of the death of the deceased employee are actual residents of the United States or contiguous countries, except (a) if the nonresident dependent be a widow and there be no resident child or children entitled to compensation under this act, there shall be paid to her a lump sum equal to one year's wages of the deceased employee, as hereinbefore defined and limited, for the benefit of herself and nonresident children, if any; (b) if the nonresident dependent be a child or children under the age of 16 years and there be no widow, resident or nonresident, and no resident children entitled to compensation under this act, there shall be paid to such nonresident child or children a like lump sum to be divided among them share and share alike; it being the intention of the foregoing to exclude from the benefits of this act any such nonresident widow, child, or children, if there be any resident child or children entitled to compensation under this act, and to exclude from the benefits of this act all other resident dependents if there be any nonresident widow, child, or children entitled to take under the provisions of this subdivision.

(8) If the monthly payments for a death hereunder are at the rate of not more than $15 per month, there shall be paid by the employer a contribution of $75 toward the burial expenses: Provided, however, That where no compensation for death of an employee caused as defined by sections 1 and 2 of this act is payable hereunder there shall be furnished by the employer a reasonable burial expense not exceeding $150.

(9) If compensation is being paid under this act to any dependent, such compensation, unless otherwise provided for herein, shall cease upon the death or marriage of such dependent, and in case the dependent be a child, shall cease upon such child reaching the age of 16, unless dependent, and then when such child shall cease to be dependent.

(B) Where permanent total disability results from any injury, there shall be paid to the injured employee 50 per cent of the monthly wages of such employee during the remainder of his life. In the following cases it shall, for the purposes of this section, be conclusively presumed that the injury resulted in permanent total disability, to wit: The total and irrevocable loss of sight in both eyes, the loss of both feet at or above the ankle, the loss of both hands at or above the wrist, the loss of one hand and one foot, an injury to the spine resulting in permanent and complete paralysis of the legs or arms, or an arm and a leg, and an injury resulting in incurable imbecility or insanity.

(C) Where temporary total disability results from any injury there shall be paid 50 per cent of the monthly wages of the injured employee during the continuance of such temporary total disability.

(D) Where permanent partial disability results from any injury—

(1) An amount equal to 50 per cent of his wages shall be paid to the injured employee for the periods stated against such injuries, respectively, as follows: In case of—

The loss by separation of one arm at or above the elbow joint, or the permanent and complete loss of the use of one arm, 72 months.

The loss by separation of one hand at or above the wrist joint, or the permanent and complete loss of the use of one hand, 57 months.

The loss by separation of one leg at or above the knee joint, or the permanent and complete loss of the use of one leg, 66 months.

The loss by separation of one foot at or above the ankle joint, or the permanent and complete loss of the use of one foot, 48 months.

The permanent and complete loss of hearing in both ears, 72 months.

The permanent and complete loss of hearing in one ear, 36 months.

The permanent and complete loss of the sight of one eye, 30 months.

The loss by separation of a thumb, 13 months; a first finger, 9 months; a second finger, 7 months; a third finger, 6 months; a fourth finger, 5 months.

The loss of one phalanx of a thumb or two phalanges of a finger shall be considered equal to the loss of one-half of a thumb or of a finger, and compensation for one-half of the above periods shall be payable.

The loss of more than one phalanx of a thumb and more than two phalanges of a finger shall be considered as the loss on an entire thumb or finger.

The loss by separation of a great toe, 9 months; any other toe, 4 months.

(2) In all other cases of injury resulting in permanent partial disability the compensation shall bear such relation to the periods stated in subdivision 1 of this clause (D) as the disabilities bear to those produced by the injuries named therein, and payments shall be made for proportionate periods not in any case exceeding 72 months.

(E) Where temporary partial disability results from an injury, the employee, if he is unable to secure work, at the same or better wages than he was receiving at the time of the injury, shall receive 50 per cent of his wages during the continuance of such disability; but such payment shall not extend beyond the period fixed for payment for permanent partial disabilities of the same character; and if the employee refuses to work after suitable work is furnished or secured for him by the employer, at the same or better wages than he was receiving at the time of the injury, he shall not be entitled to any compensation for such disability during the continuance of such refusal.

SEC. 22. That should an employee who sustains an injury resulting in permanent total or permanent partial disability die from any cause at any time, or should an employee who sustains an injury resulting in temporary total or temporary partial disability die as a result of such injury after 14 days of disability, the employer shall be liable for an amount to be ascertained as follows:

First. By computing the amount which would have been payable under clause (A) of section 21, if death had immediately resulted from the accident.

Second. By deducting from such amount a sum equal to the payments for the period between the accident and the death, which, if the accident had immediately resulted in death, the employer, by reason of the happening of any of the contingencies mentioned in clause (A) of section 21, would have been relieved from making.

Third. By deducting from the remainder so ascertained the amount of the compensation paid up to the time of death under clause (B), (C), (D), or (E) of section 21.

The amount so ascertained shall be paid to the dependents, if any, of such employee, living at the time of his death, in the same amounts and subject to the same contingencies as if compensation had been payable to them under clause (A) of section 21 by reason of their having been dependent at the time of the accident: Provided, That should an employee who sustains an injury resulting in permanent partial disability die from cause other than the injury at any time, the liability of the employer shall not exceed the unpaid balance of the amount which, if the injured employee had lived, would have been paid under the terms of any agreement, award, findings, or judgment, or under clause (D), section 21.

SEC. 23. That if, in an accident, an employee receive an injury resulting in permanent partial disability and in the same accident receive additional injury, which, by itself, entitles him to compensation, or if he be injured in the service of the same employer while entitled to or receiving payments for a previous injury, the amount of the monthly payment to him for such combined injuries shall be computed as for a single injury as provided for and limited by section 20 hereof, but in such case the periods of time prescribed for such combined injuries, severally, shall be added together: Provided, That where any of such periods is less than three months, the same shall not be added, but shall be disregarded.

If an employee receive an injury which, of itself, would only cause permanent partial disability, but which, combined with a previous injury, does in fact cause permanent total disability, the employer shall be liable as for the permanent total disability only.

SEC. 24. That in case any employee for whose injury or death compensation is payable under this act shall, at the time of the injury, be employed and paid jointly by two or more employers subject to this act, each of such employers shall be jointly and severally liable for the payment of such compensation, but as between each other such employers shall contribute the payment of such compensation in the proportion of their respective wage liability to such employee. If one or more but not all of such employers should be subject to this act, then the liability of such of them as are so subject shall be to pay the entire compensation: Provided, however, That nothing in this section shall prevent any arrangement between such employers for a different distribution, as between themselves, of the ultimate burden of such compensation: And provided further, That proceedings for the purpose of obtaining an award and payments under an award shall not in any event be delayed because of liability to contribution as between employers.

SEC. 25. That where payment of compensation is made to the widow for the use of herself, or for the use of herself and child or children, her written receipt therefor shall acquit the employer. Where payment is made to any child 18 years of age or over, the written receipt therefor of such child shall acquit the employer. Where payment is due to a child under the age of 18 years, the same shall be made to a duly appointed and qualified guardian of such child under the laws of the State of such child's residence, and the written receipt therefor of such guardian shall acquit the employer.

SEC. 26. That the term "dependent" shall include all persons who are entitled to compensation under the provisions of clause (A), section 21, and of section 23, and, wherever the context requires it, shall be held to include the personal representatives of the deceased and guardians of infants or incompetent persons.

The term "injury," wherever the context requires it, shall be held to include death resulting from injury.

The term "employee" includes an apprentice. It shall include the singular and plural and both sexes. Any reference to an employee who has been injured shall, where the employee is dead, and the context requires it, include a reference to his dependents or personal representatives.

The term "physician or physicians" includes surgeon or surgeons.

The term "child or children" shall include posthumous children and all other children entitled by the law of the State where the accident happens to inherit as children of the deceased employee.

"Disability" under this act shall mean want of capacity or ability by reason of injury to make full wages and full time in the position where working at the time of receiving the injury.

The term "dependent child over the age of 16," wherever it occurs in this act, or any reference to such child, shall be construed to mean a dependent child over the age of 16 years unable to earn a living by reason of mental or physical incapacity, or a female child under the age of 20 years unless sooner married.

Whenever an employee of a common carrier engaged in interstate or foreign commerce by railroad shall sustain personal injury by accident arising out of and in the course of his employment resulting in his disability or death, it shall be presumed prima facie that such employee was at the time of the accident engaged in such commerce.

SEC. 27. That without otherwise affecting the meaning or interpretation thereof the phrase "personal injury by accident arising out of and in the course of his employment"—

(a) Shall not cover an employee except while he is engaged in, on, or about the premises where his services are being performed, which are occupied by or under the control of the employer, or while he is engaged elsewhere in or about his employer's business where his service contracted for or reasonably volunteered or rendered for the protection of his employer's interests requires his presence as a part of such service at the time of the injury and subjects him to dangers incident to that employment.

(b) It shall not include an injury caused by the willful act of another directed against him for reasons personal to such employee and not against him as an employee or because of his employment.

(c) It shall not include a disease or infection except as it shall result from the injury.

SEC. 28. That where in any case payments have continued for not less than six months either party, provided said party is a citizen of the United States, may, upon due notice to the other party, apply to the court having jurisdiction of the territory within which the accident occurred for an order commuting the future payments to a lump sum. The application shall be considered by the court sitting without a jury, and may be granted where it is shown to the satisfaction of the court that the payment of a lump sum in lieu of future monthly payments will be for the best interest of the person or persons receiving or dependent upon such compensation, or that the continuance of monthly payments will, as compared with lump-sum payments, entail undue expense or undue hardship upon the employer liable therefor, or that the person entitled to compensation has removed or is about to remove from the United States. Where the commutation is ordered the court shall fix the lump sum to be paid at an amount which will equal the total sum of the probable future payments, capitalized at their present value upon the basis of interest calculated at 4 per cent per annum with annual rests. Upon paying such amount the employer shall be discharged from all further liability on account of the injury or death, and be entitled to a duly executed release, upon filing which, or other due proof of payment, the liability of such employer under any agreement, award, findings, or judgment shall be discharged of record.

SEC. 29. That nothing herein contained shall be construed as doing away with or affecting any common-law or statutory right of action or remedy for personal injury or death happening before this act shall take effect.

SEC. 30. If either the employee or the employer shall file exceptions to the report of the adjuster, as provided in this act, he may on motion in writing have the cause removed from the district court of the United States to any State court of competent jurisdiction, in the county where the cause of action arose or where the employer resides or is doing business at the time of such removal, by filing in such State court, within 30 days from the filing of said exceptions, a certified copy of the report of the adjuster and his exceptions thereto, and thereupon the case shall proceed and trial shall be had in said State court in the same manner as is provided in this act for trial in the district court of the United States: Provided, That if the employer removes said cause, such removal shall be to the county where the cause of action arose or where the employer resides. If both the employee and the employer shall file motions for removal as above provided, the motion first filed shall prevail. When a case is removed to a State court it shall not thereafter be removed to a court of the United States. Appeal from and writ of error to such State court shall lie as in other cases. The provisions of this section shall be applicable and become effective in any State whenever and only whenever that State by appropriate legislation shall authorize the proceedings and practice in the courts of that State provided in this act for the trial of such causes in the district court of the United States.

SEC. 31. That it shall be the duty of every employer subject to this act to make reports of accidents, payments, and operations under this act to the Interstate Commerce Commission in such detail and at such times as the said commission may by general regulation require. Such reports shall be compiled and the general results thereof published as soon after they are received as practicable.

SEC. 32. No employee nor dependent, who shall have lost his right to compensation hereunder by reason of the invalidity of this act or any part of it, in case the act or any part of it shall be held to be invalid, shall be deprived of any right of action to which he would otherwise have been entitled if this act had not been passed, and such right in such event is hereby preserved and may be enforced within two years from and after the adjudication of such invalidity.

SEC. 33. That this act shall take effect on the 1st day of July, 1913, and may be cited as the Federal accident compensation act of 1913.

The SPEAKER. Is a second demanded?

Mr. FLOYD of Arkansas. Mr. Speaker, I demand a second.

Mr. BRANTLEY. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that a second be considered as ordered.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. HENRY of Texas. Mr. Speaker, I object.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Texas objects, and the Chair appoints the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. BRANTLEY] and the gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. FLOYD] to act as tellers.

The House divided, and the tellers reported—ayes 149, noes 61.

So a second was ordered.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Georgia is entitled to 20 minutes and the gentleman from Arkansas to 20 minutes.

Mr. RODDENBERY. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. RODDENBERY. Can a vote be had on any particular paragraph of this bill?

The SPEAKER. It can not.

Mr. RODDENBERY. At any time will it be in order to offer an amendment to the bill?

The SPEAKER. It will not be.

Mr. BRANTLEY. Mr. Speaker, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. STERLING]. [Applause.]

Mr. STERLING. Mr. Speaker, a little more than two and a half years ago Congress passed a joint resolution providing for the appointment of a commission to investigate the subject of workmen's compensation. That resolution was approved on the 25th day of June, 1910. Within a very few days after that the commission was organized and proceeded to its work. It was directed in the resolution to make report to Congress and to recommend such legislation on the subject of workmen's compensation as it deemed best. That commission was engaged for a little more than a year and a half in investigating that subject.

It had numerous hearings. The representatives of the railroad companies on the one side and the representatives of the railway employees on the other side were given every possible opportunity to be heard and express their views on the subject. Experts investigated the subject of workmen's compensation in European countries. The commission gathered, I think, all of the available data in this country on personal injuries on railroads and costs relating thereto, and the amount of compensation actually received by injured men in railroad accidents. A little more than a year ago the bill which was prepared by the commission was introduced in the Senate and in the House. A few weeks later that bill passed the Senate. The Senate bill and the bill introduced in the House was pending before the Judiciary Committee of the House until four weeks ago. The bill that passed the Senate is now before the House with various amendments proposed by the Judiciary Committee of the House. The purpose of the bill is to provide relief for employees injured in interstate commerce in the railroad service of the country.

From the best obtainable data it has been determined that the cost per annum to the railroad companies of the country for personal injuries is $10,085,000, a little less than one-fourth of which has gone into the hands of the injured employees. Out of this vast sum of money which the railroads have paid on account of personal injuries received in accidents the victims have had but two and a half million dollars. Experts have carefully considered the question as to how much it will cost the railroads under this bill, if it becomes a law, to compensate for such personal injuries, and they find that it will increase the liabilities of these companies to the sum of $15,000,000, all of which will go direct to the injured employees or their families. This law will increase the cost to the railroads about 50 per cent, but it will increase the compensation to the injured employees by at least 500 per cent. The prodigious waste that has been going on under the present system of liability is a disgrace to American civilization and to American jurisprudence. Three-fourths of the money actually paid on account of these injuries has gone into the pockets of the attorneys and to the payment of court costs and witness fees, while at the same time more than one-half of those injured were unable to recover at all. Under the plan proposed in this bill all waste is eliminated and all moneys paid by the employer goes to the injured employee. In every case where the employee is injured in the line of duty the victim will receive compensation under this plan except in those where the injury resulted from the willful intention of the employee or where he was under the influence of liquor.

This bill is in harmony with the spirit of the age and enlightened civilization. It lifts the burden of industrial accidents from the shoulders of those least able to carry it and places it where it belongs. Why should the injured man or his family bear all the loss incident to accidents in the operation of these great quasi public enterprises. Railroads are operated for the benefit of society, and society should bear the burden imposed by them.

I trust the House will pass this bill to-night. Not only are the railroad men of the country demanding it but humanity requires it. I trust the great work which has been done by this commission and by the committees of the House and Senate will not fail to-night, and that these great labors will not have been in vain. Whatever opposition there may be to this bill arises from a lack of knowledge of its provisions and its purposes.

It is intended to give prompt and adequate relief to the injured man in the hour of his need and to his widow and children in case of his death. It is in harmony with Christian civilization, and its adoption is imperative if our Government is to keep step with the onward march of progress. These new industrial conditions which have sprung up in the last half century have necessitated this revolution in legislation pertaining to this subject. The old laws should be abrogated, because our civilization has outgrown them. The time has come when we must strip ourselves of laws which, although good in their day, are now wholly inadequate to meet new conditions.

When law has outlived its usefulness it should be repealed and new principles established to meet the needs of mankind. Government should never retard progress, but should always keep step with the advancing hosts of mankind. Let us to-night, in the closing hours of this session, as the Representatives of the people, move forward and join in the forward march of human progress.

The United States is far behind every civilized country in the world in legislation of this kind. All of the European nations and many States of this Union have gone further and given better relief to injured employees than has the Federal Government, but I believe, and I think it is agreed by men well acquainted with the features and merits of this bill, men on both sides of the question, representatives of railway trainmen and representatives of the railroad companies—all agree that this is the most comprehensive and the most generous bill that has ever been proposed in any legislative body in the world, and if it becomes a law it will be the most comprehensive and most generous compensation law that was ever passed. [Applause.]

Mr. BRANTLEY. I will ask the gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. FLOYD] to use some of his time.

Mr. FLOYD of Arkansas. Mr. Speaker, I am not opposed to the principle of compensation, but I am opposed to this bill. I have given it a careful study and I declare to you that it is a railroad bill pure and simple. [Applause.] The distinguished gentleman from Illinois [Mr. STERLING] who has just closed his remarks says that it is the most generous compensation act ever proposed in a legislative body. Yes; for the railroads, but it is the most outrageous, unjust, and damnable law that was ever brought forward in the name of virtue. [Applause.] It is the favorite method of those who seek to procure the enactment of bad legislation to seize upon and champion some popular idea or sentiment and then accomplish their ulterior purpose by indirection. That is what is sought by this legislation. This legislation originated with the claim agents of the great railroad systems of this country as disclosed in the hearings before the Committee on the Judiciary of the House.

Mr. STERLING. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. FLOYD of Arkansas. No; I decline to yield.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman declines to yield.

Mr. FLOYD of Arkansas. A greater outrage perhaps than the preparation and presentation of this bill is the manner in which the proponents of this measure seek to pass it through this House [applause] under suspension of the rules with 40 minutes' debate, 20 minutes on a side. I decline to yield to any man who is seeking to enforce such an injustice upon the membership of this House. It comes in here with 94 amendments from the Committee of the Judiciary of the House. I am determined that no man shall vote for this bill without being told of its purposes. What is the purpose of this bill? Let me tell you the chief object sought to be accomplished by it. The Federal employers' liability act of 1908, as amended in 1910, in my humble judgment, is the most comprehensive and most complete and the most favorable law to railroad employees that was ever enacted in this or any other country in the world [applause], and in less than two months after the constitutionality of that law was upheld by the Supreme Court of the United States this bill was introduced into the Congress. And what is its primary object and purpose? It is to repeal the employers' liability act of 1908 and wipe it off the statute books. [Applause.] How many of you gentlemen would dare vote for the naked proposition if a bill were introduced into this Congress to repeal the employers' liability act? That is what you are doing when you vote for this bill, and if you pass it you will repeal it in toto, every line of it, and that wholesome law in behalf of the railroad employees that they have been striving for 25 years to enact into legislation will be wiped out and a new, untried, experimental law will be substituted in its place that will take another 25 years to settle in this country.

Now, we have some economists in this House. There are those of us who stand for economy. This bill proposes to create a system of Federal adjusters. These Federal adjusters are to be made officers of the United States and to be paid salaries from $1,800 to $3,000 a year. How many of them are there? There is to be one in each judicial district of the United States, to be appointed by the judge of that district, and as many more as the judges in their discretion may see fit to appoint. There are 67 judicial districts at present and the cost of maintaining these adjusters and their expenses will be four or five hundred thousand dollars a year.

Mr. ALEXANDER. Will the gentleman yield?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Will the gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. FLOYD] yield to the gentleman from Missouri?

Mr. FLOYD of Arkansas. I am sorry, but I have not the time to do so.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Arkansas declines to yield.

Mr. FLOYD of Arkansas. What are these adjusters? Are they judges, do they preside over a court? No. What are they? They are claim agents for the railroads, to be paid for out of the Federal Treasury. They are claim agents for the railroads with the power of subpœna. You can not differentiate their functions from those of claims agents now employed and paid by the railroads. Oh, you say, these adjusters will be impartial. Every honest claim agent of a railroad who is loyal to his employer is now impartial; he investigates and reports to his company the real facts. What else about these adjusters? You can not get into court without first having a trial before the adjuster. Under the existing law a man can bring his case either in a State or Federal court. Under this new law, which is exceedingly technical, no man has a right to bring an action directly either in State or Federal court. He must bring it first before an adjuster. He must go through the formality of a trial before a Federal adjuster who has no judicial power and yet who acts in the capacity of a judge and performs the pseudo functions of a court. Yet his decision is not worth the paper it is written upon. Either party can except to his findings, and it nullifies the entire proceedings; and either party may then appeal or take his case into the Federal district court. And yet this outrageous law is brought forward in the name of labor. I am sorry to say that many labor leaders have been advocating it. But I want to call your attention to this fact, that no railroad company, no railroad attorney, has entered any protest against the passage of this law. [Applause.]

I understand that a railroad lobby is now in this Capitol working for this bill. There is some undisclosed, some powerful influences behind it. It is not in the interests of labor. I want to read you what Mr. Gompers had to say in response to a question which I propounded to him when he was before the Committee on the Judiciary last June. I read from page 192 of the hearings. Mr. Gompers was before that committee advocating at that time the passage of this law. I will read:

Mr. FLOYD. In that connection I want to ask another question. You have appeared a great many times before this committee, Mr. Gompers, and I want to say that usually I have been in sympathy with the legislation you were seeking. But since I have been a member of this committee in every instance except this one, when you sought legislation in behalf of labor, representatives of capital were here protesting. None are here on behalf of the railroads protesting against this legislation. How do you account for that if it is such a good thing for labor?

And after talking two or three minutes, Mr. Gompers in response to that question made this observation:

I do not know in what position the question of Mr. FLOYD places me—whether I do not know what I am talking about, or whether I am talking for a bill which the railroad companies want. In either case I should regard myself in a very unenviable light.

The most charitable view that can be placed upon the position of Mr. Gompers in regard to this legislation is that he has been misled in regard to it, as many other good people have been.

On January 24, 1913, Mr. Gompers again appeared before the Judiciary Committee and made a further statement concerning the changed attitude of the American Federation of Labor in regard to this bill. I quote from page 467, Serial No. 10, of the hearings before the Committee on the Judiciary, House of Representatives, Sixty-second Congress, on H. R. 20487 (S. 5382):

Mr. GOMPERS. Since my appearance before the committee advocating the passage of this bill there has arisen some difference of opinion among the workmen—or, I should more properly say, among the members of the organizations, the brotherhoods of railway employees—who are primarily concerned and interested in this legislation. In view of that fact, my associates and I in the American Federation of Labor, to which several of these brotherhoods are not affiliated, have felt that if these men are not united on a proposition of this character, the provisions of which affect them much more than they do us who are directly affiliated to our federation, it is scarcely right, scarcely the right thing for us now, to continue to advocate strongly a measure toward which they feel either a sort of indifference or hostility. Now, whether the reasons be good or no, the fact that they are divided among themselves on the question is sufficient to warrant, at least for the time being, our not taking any positive position or to continue our positive affirmative advocacy of the passage of the bill.

I repeat I am not opposed to the principle of compensation embodied in and underlying this proposed legislation. I am opposed to this bill. From a careful study and analysis of its several provisions I am firmly convinced that its enactment into law would be detrimental to the best interest of labor and highly favorable to the railroads. The railroad employees in this country, as already stated, have been striving for years to secure legislation favorable to their interests.

All these years they have been earnestly striving to secure legislation that would abolish and get rid of the old common-law doctrine of fellow servants, assumed risk, and contributory negligence. They first appealed to the legislatures of their respective States, and many State legislatures passed liberal laws in their favor. They finally appealed to Congress, and Congress in 1906 passed the first Federal employers' liability act, which was afterwards held to be unconstitutional. With the decision of the Supreme Court in that case before them, Congress in 1908 again took up the subject and passed another act, known as the Federal employers' liability act of 1908, the validity of which has since been upheld. After the passage of this act the railroad companies and their attorneys no doubt became fully convinced of its constitutionality long before the opinion of the Supreme Court was handed down, and it was during this period that the claim agents of the railroads began the agitation and discussion of the advisability of seeking the passage of compensation laws to supersede and take the place of our present employers' liability laws. It is shown in the hearings that in 1910, if I remember correctly, the claim agents of several great railroad systems met in Chattanooga, Tenn., and discussed the question of Federal compensation. Afterwards a meeting was held in Montreal, Canada, where the matter was again brought up and discussed. A meeting was held subsequently in Chicago, at which the matter was fully discussed, and it was decided that the railroad companies should take some steps looking to the procurement of compensation legislation. A committee of five was appointed, of which Mr. Whiting, of the New York Central Railroad, was chairman. They prepared a draft of a compensation bill, which appears on pages 210 to 216 of the hearings. Afterwards the Federal commission was created and appointed, which reported and brought in the bill under consideration. Mr. Brown, president of the New York Central, was a member of that commission, and Mr. Whiting, as I understand, was in attendance with the commission much of the time they were considering this question, and was freely consulted by them. These are some of the reasons, Mr. Speaker, that impel me to the conclusion that the idea of workmen's compensation legislation as embodied in this bill had its origin and inception with the claim agents of the railroads.

A further objection to this bill is that it not only repeals the Federal employers' liability act but it relieves the railroad companies from the added penalties in that act and in our safety-appliance acts, which provide that railroad companies which fail to comply with the requirements of law by equipping their cars with safety appliances shall have no right to plead the negligence of any employee in an action brought against them for damages in personal-injury cases. This, in my judgment, is the secret and underlying cause of this persistent and insistent demand for this proposed legislation at this time. The object is to repeal the existing settled law, the employers' liability act, and substitute therefor a new and untried law of compensation, and thereby relieve the railroads of millions of dollars on account of their failure to comply with our safety-appliance acts, and leave the rights of railroad employees again unsettled for a long period of years. If we pass this bill, let us not add insult to injury by resorting to the shallow and specious pretense that we are passing it in the interest of labor, but let us do it openly, frankly, and avowedly for the real purpose for which it has been promulgated and brought forth, namely, to relieve the railroad companies from heavy liabilities under our present laws.

This bill is against the interest of labor. I assert—and defy any advocate of the bill to show to the contrary—that there is not an administrative feature in the entire bill that is not more favorable to the railroads than to employees and that is not less favorable to the employees than the provisions of the existing laws.

Under the present law an injured employee may bring his action within two years. Under the terms of this bill as amended by the Judiciary Committee notice of the accident must be given by the employee, or, in case of death, by his dependents, within 90 days, unless, for causes stated in the bill, such time is extended to six months, and within six months in all cases, or the claimant loses his right of action and he is forever barred from recovering compensation under this act. The giving of this notice of the accident is made jurisdictional, and a failure to give it within the period prescribed bars the right of action. After this jurisdictional notice has been given an action must be instituted before the proper adjuster within 12 months from the date of the accident or the claim for compensation is forever barred. Under the bill as originally introduced this jurisdictional notice is required to be given within 30 or 90 days or the claimant loses his right of action, and if notice is given he must institute his action for recovery of compensation before the adjuster within six months or his case is forever barred.

Under our present law an employee or his dependents can bring an action directly in any State or Federal court of competent jurisdiction. Under this bill no employee can bring an action for compensation directly either in a State or Federal court. He must first institute his action before a Federal adjuster appointed by a Federal judge and go through the formality of a trial before this adjuster, who, as I have already shown, is without judicial power, but who nevertheless acts in the capacity of judge and performs the functions of a court. There is no possible way in which any claimant under the terms of this proposed act can get his case in court except by a trial or hearing before an adjuster. Under our present law State courts have concurrent jurisdiction with Federal courts in personal-injury cases. Under the terms of this bill the Federal courts are given jurisdiction in the first instance when exceptions are filed to the findings of the adjuster, and under the bill as originally introduced had exclusive jurisdiction in all cases. The Committee on the Judiciary undertook by an amendment to give State courts concurrent jurisdiction with the Federal courts by a removal of the cause as provided therein, but the amendment adopted contains a provision that no removal of such cause can be had from a Federal court to a State court until the legislature of the State in which said cause is pending has passed a law authorizing Federal procedure in State courts in the trial of causes arising under this act. In the meantime employees are denied the right to have their cases determined in their local or State courts.

Under our present laws the parties to an action are allowed a trial by jury. Under this bill, as originally introduced, the right of trial by jury was restricted as far as it was possible to do so under Article VII of the Constitution. I am glad to state that the bill was amended by the Judiciary Committee so as to give to both parties the full right of trial by jury. If we pass the bill as amended and send it to conference this amendment may be stricken out and the original provision may be restored to and retained in the bill. This is true as to every other one of the 94 amendments adopted by the Judiciary Committee of the House. This House passed a bill during this Congress allowing jury trials in contempt cases, and if this bill should pass and go to the Senate and be referred to a conference committee, it is my earnest hope that the House conferees will never consent to restore the original provision in the bill which virtually denied the right of trial by jury in personal-injury cases. So much for the administrative features of the bill.

But there are other more serious and fundamental objections to the passage of this bill. The bill is exclusive and compulsory. As already shown, section 3 repeals the employers' liability act and makes this compensation act the sole and exclusive remedy in all cases of accident resulting in injury or death to railroad employees. I have insisted in the committee, and I insist here now, that if this bill is to be enacted into law it should be amended and made optional and should not be an exclusive remedy. At least it should be so made during the experimental stage of the new law. None of us know or can know how it is going to operate when applied in actual practice. I have therefore maintained and now maintain that as careful and conservative legislators we should leave the present employers' liability law in full force and effect.

This proposed law should be made optional or cumulative, an additional and not an exclusive remedy. Without this optional feature—and it is not possible to amend the bill under the pending motion—it is my judgment that the bill should be defeated outright. The proponents and friends of this measure have resisted at every stage of its consideration all attempts to incorporate therein an optional feature, insisting that such provision would destroy the purpose of the bill and would be unjust to the railroads. The answer to such contention is that as drafted now it is unjust to the railroad employees.

In this proposed law liberty of contract is denied to the injured employee and his dependents. However serious the injury, no amount can be legally paid him in excess of the amount allowed in the act, and all contracts made in excess thereof are void. If an employee makes a contract with an attorney to represent him in one of these cases, the adjuster or the court may annul the contract and fix the fee or allowance in his discretion. The railroad companies are left free to pay their attorneys whatever amounts they see fit. The bill seems to be based upon the theory that railroad employees as a class are a lot of incompetents, and that the employer, on account of some superiority, real or fancied, should be made the guardian and protector of the employees. Under the terms of the bill, if an employee should recover judgment against the railroad company, the company is allowed to withhold the amount of the judgment and pay it in installments. The rates of compensation provided in the bill are low, but when an employee recovers judgment it is not to be paid as other judgments are paid. It is expressly provided that the money adjudged against the railroad companies is to be paid to the employees in monthly installments for a period of eight years, and thereafter all compensation ceases. This provision is based upon the idea or principle that if the employer company so manages or mismanages its affairs as to cut off a man's leg or arm or put out his eye, that thereupon it is entitled to become his guardian. Why this provision withholding from the injured employee money adjudged in his favor by the courts of his country? Is it for the benefit of the employee? No; like many other provisions of the bill it is a forbearance in favor of the railroads. Many of these injured employees in the course of eight years will die, and when one of them dies who has no family or dependents the railroad company will be relieved of the unpaid balance of the judgment. Such provision if enacted into law will result in the grossest injustice to railroad employees—that great army of men engaged in a most useful and honorable field of labor, but one that is hazardous and that costs 10,000 of them their lives each year. I shall not by my voice or vote be a party to any such act of injustice to these unheralded heroes of our great industrial railroad systems. What can a man give in exchange for his life? Yet the life of a railroad man under the terms of this bill is fixed at a value of $4,800. I deny that railroad employees in this country need any guardians. If they are to have guardians, I deny the right of any man to make their employers, the railroad companies, their guardians. I deny that the rich and often profligate owners of railroads, who manipulate stocks and bonds, who summer in Europe, winter in yachts in southern waters, and clip bond coupons for a living, are the proper persons to become the guardians of anybody, much less of the great working classes between whom and the railroads there is a constant clash of interests. The workingman's toil has piled up the millions that these financial magnates and rich railroad dignitaries to-day enjoy. These workingmen are intelligent, trustworthy, vigilant; they are themselves the guardians and protectors of the lives and safety of the entire traveling public; and, in addition, the properties and the earnings of the railroad companies are under their supervision, care, and protection. What would the railroad companies be without this noble band of intelligent and trustworthy workingmen known as railroad employees? By their brawn and brain and with their own hands they have constructed all of our railroads, made every cut and fill, driven every tunnel, built every culvert and bridge, placed every crosstie, laid every rail, erected every depot, built every car, constructed and operated every engine, and run every train in the United States. Yet it is proposed in this bill to constitute a lot of railroad dignitaries and coupon clippers as the guardians of these men. The proposition is an insult to labor. If I believed that any class of these railroad employees needed guardians, I should never give my consent to turn them over to the care and keeping of their employer—that inanimate thing known as a railroad corporation, dominated and controlled by men whose lives are devoted to the manipulation of stocks and bonds and the accumulation of money, whose church is the temple of greed and whose god is gold. May the Lord deliver us from the charity and altruism of such men.

VIEWS OF THE MINORITY.

The undersigned submit the following as our views in opposition to the passage of S. 5382 as reported by the committee:

Before submitting our objections to the bill as it now stands we desire to state that it is our judgment that the bill as reported is a great improvement over the bill as it passed the Senate and over H. R. 20487, relating to the same subject matter, which was introduced in the House by Mr. BRANTLEY, of Georgia, and which was also considered by the committee. We therefore cheerfully join with the majority in the recommendation that each of the committee amendments be adopted. We have no criticism to offer to any of said amendments except as to the amendment relating to the jurisdiction of State courts. We think the bill could be improved by adopting a substitute for this amendment or by striking out the last sentence thereof, but if neither of said changes can be secured we favor the adoption of this amendment in its present form. But we can not join with the majority in recommending the passage of the bill as reported without further amendment.

It is our judgment that the bill in its present form, if not designed, will operate primarily in the interest of the railroads and will relieve the railroads from the burden of paying damages in personal-injury cases under our present employers' liability act, the validity of which was upheld by the Supreme Court of the United States at its October term, 1911, in the case of Mondou v. New York, New Haven & Hartford Railroad Co. et al. (See U. S. Reports, vol. 223, p. 1.) The bill if enacted into law will not only relieve railroad companies from all liabilities by reason of their own fault or negligence for damages in personal-injury cases, but the theory and purpose of the proposed legislation is to transfer the burden of compensating injured railroad employees or, in case of death, their dependents, resulting from all accidents, from the railroad companies to the general public, the effect of which policy must necessarily result in a general increase in freight and passenger rates to meet the increased burden imposed upon said companies by reason of the passage of this act.

Section 3 repeals the existing employers' liability act and provides that the proposed law shall be compulsory, and shall constitute the sole and exclusive remedy for compensation of railroad employees engaged in interstate commerce for injuries received by accident while so employed. It is our judgment that section 3 should be so amended as to leave in full force and effect our present employers' liability act, with a proviso making it optional with the employee, or with both employer and employee if deemed advisable, to elect at any time before the date of the accident as to whether in case of injury or death compensation shall be claimed under this act.

In our judgment the proposed legislation is revolutionary both in theory and principle and of doubtful constitutional validity, but if deemed and held to be constitutional, it is nevertheless new, untried, and wholly experimental in Federal practice, and may therefore in its actual operations disappoint the expectations of its friends and supporters among the laboring people and result in great detriment to railroad employees, the particular class of persons for whose benefit the passage of this bill is urged. Doubts as to the constitutional validity of the proposed act in the minds of the proponents of the measure are suggested by the fact that an amendment has been incorporated by the committee as section 33 which reserves all rights of employees under existing laws in case this act should be held invalid. This we regard as one of the most salutary provisions in the bill. In view of the excellent and substantial remedies provided for injured employees under our present laws we think it unwise, unsafe, and an act of the grossest injustice to deprive them of such remedies and supersede these laws with this or any other new and wholly experimental law.

In our judgment the administrative features of the proposed act are in the interest of the railroads. In our view of the general proposition the administrative features of the bill are exceedingly unjust, arbitrary, complicated, technical, and cumbersome. Such regulations must always and of necessity result to the detriment of the person who is required to maintain an action under them, which in this case is the railroad employee or his dependents. Under the provisions of this proposed act compalnants in personal-injury cases are denied the right to bring an action directly in either Federal or State courts to recover compensation for injuries received in railroad accidents. All proceedings must be first instituted before an adjuster appointed by a Federal district judge. There is no possible way, under the terms of this bill, in which an injured employee can get his case either into a Federal court or a State court without first going before an adjuster, who is without judicial power, but who nevertheless is authorized to go through the formality of a trial, and who in the performance of his duties in conducting such trial or hearing exercises the functions of a court and acts in the capacity of a judge. His findings are binding upon nobody, and the whole proceeding before him is absolutely useless without both parties assent to his decision. Exceptions to his findings by either party nullify all proceedings before him, and the case must be tried de novo in the Federal court, or if removed to the State court, as provided in the bill, must be tried de novo in the State court. Hence, a double trial and double cost to the employee in such cases. Thereafter the case may be taken to the appellate court and to the Supreme Court of the United States.

Section 11 provides for a review of any case tried before the adjuster at the instance of either party at any time within two years from the date of the accident whenever it is alleged in a proper complaint that the injury complained of in the original action has increased or diminished or ceased altogether, and the adjuster thereupon is empowered to review, modify, set aside, or annul any agreement, award, findings, or judgment previously rendered in said cause. Thus it will be observed that this adjuster is authorized and empowered under the provisions of this bill to review, modify, set aside, and annul a decision of the Supreme Court of the United States if the same case should again be brought before him within two years of the date of the accident. To those who believe in the doctrine of res adjudicata and who have been taught that the judgments of the Supreme Court are final unless subsequently reviewed by that same high tribunal this particular provision of the bill is as novel as it is absurd and as absurd as it is novel.

The bill also in effect relieves the railroad companies from the added penalties now enforceable in damage suits against railroad companies for noncompliance with our safety-appliance acts. In the safety-appliance acts passed by Congress failure to comply with the law by furnishing the required equipments, in addition to fines that may be imposed for such failure, there are provisions that forbid the railroad companies in case of such failure to plead the negligence of an employee as a defense in any action brought against such company for damages in personal-injury cases. This provision is nullified by the provisions of this act, for all compensation under this act is fixed, arbitrary, and limited in amount, and it becomes wholly immaterial whether an employee who is injured was, under its provisions, careful or negligent. The same compensations under the terms of this act are paid for like injuries in all cases.

The limitations as to the giving of notice of the injury and as to the time of bringing action or instituting proceedings under the provisions of this bill we regard as arbitrary, unjust, unfair, and unreasonable, and we have found no precedents, either under our State or Federal laws, except where specific liens are involved, in which the period of limitation fixed for bringing an action is so short as that provided in this bill. Within 90 days, unles for reasons stated in the bill the time for giving notice of the accident is extended to six months, and within six months in all cases, the injured employee is required to give notice of the injury received by accident, and in case of death his dependents are required to give such notice to his employer. The giving of this notice is made jurisdictional, and hence upon failure to give the required notice within the said period of 90 days or 6 months, as the case may be, the employee is forever barred from his right to compensation under the terms of this act. This requirement, if enacted into law, will result in barring by limitation the rights of hundreds of employees or their dependents each year on account of the short period of limitation. This provision we regard as unjust and unreasonable from the standpoint of the employees, but will result in incalculable benefit to the railroad companies.

We also object to the passage of this bill because it creates a large number of Federal officers, to be known as adjusters. The bill provides that the judge of the Federal court shall appoint one or more adjusters for each judicial district in the United States. There are at present 67 districts, and there will be at least 67 adjusters and as many more as the district judges in their discretion may see proper to appoint. The duties and mission of these adjusters are to try to settle and adjust disputes and controversies for compensation provided for in this act between the railroad companies and their employees, and yet it is expressly provided that these Federal adjusters shall be officers of the United States and shall receive an annual salary of not less than $1,800 nor more than $3,000, to be fixed by the Attorney General, to settle and determine controversies that are properly within the jurisdiction of our law courts and which could, in most instances, be more readily settled by agreement of the parties or by a trial in the first instance in the courts than under the plan proposed. The decision of the adjuster settles nothing unless both parties are willing to be bound by it. Exceptions filed by either party to his findings nullify the proceedings before the adjuster and the trial proceeds de novo in the court having jurisdiction of said cause.

The bill as originally introduced gave the Federal courts exclusive jurisdiction in all cases arising under this act. An amendment was adopted by the committee, the purpose of which is to give State courts jurisdiction concurrent with Federal courts in cases arising under this act, but it is expressly provided in said amendment that the provision shall not be effective until the legislatures of the respective States shall prescribe that the practice and procedure of the Federal court in the enforcement of the provisions of this act shall be followed by the State courts in the trial of causes which originate under the provisions of this act and are afterwards transferred to State courts for final determination as provided in said bill. This we regard as exceedingly unfortunate and unjust. We believe that the bill should be so remodeled and drafted as to give State courts concurrent jurisdiction in all cases arising under the provisions of the act without requiring any action on the part of State legislatures to give validity to such provision of the act. The amendment referred to does not do so, but imposes upon the railroad employees the necessity of securing legislation in their respective States before they can exercise the right to remove their cases from the Federal court to a State court for a trial and determination. This provision, in our judgment, will operate to the benefit of the railroads by enabling them to have these cases tried in the Federal courts.

The rates of compensation provided for in this bill are so at variance with the amounts that may be recovered under the existing law and in many instances are so small that they are wholly inadequate to the necessities of the injured employees or their dependents that if we pass this bill without incorporating in it an optional provision giving employees the right to elect whether they will seek compensation under this act or under our general employers' liability act, we may expect a general storm of protests and indignation from the rank and file of railroad employees throughout the country against our action.

In conclusion, we submit that our primary and fundamental objection to the passage of this bill, as reported, is that it repeals the Federal employers' liability act and contains no optional feature. If the employers' liability act was not repealed and an optional feature was incorporated in the bill, it is our judgment that the importance of the objections herein made, while not altogether removed, would be greatly minimized.

Respectfully submitted.

I also desire to submit for your consideration Serial No. 8 of the hearings of the Committee on the Judiciary, House of Representatives, Sixty-second Congress, third session, on H. R. 20487 (S. 5382), and will ask that the same be printed as an appendix to my remarks. This serial embodies a detailed statement made by me before the Judiciary Committee of the House in opposition to the passage of this bill, together with numerous letters and protests by railroad employees from my own State and from other sections of the country against the passage of this bill.

APPENDIX.

EMPLOYERS' LIABILITY AND WORKMEN'S COMPENSATION.

COMMITTEE ON THE JUDICIARY,
HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,
Washington, D. C., January 20 and 21, 1913.

The committee met at 10.30 o'clock a. m., Hon. HENRY D. CLAYTON (chairman) presiding.

Present: Messrs. WEBB, HOUSTON, FLOYD, THOMAS, GRAHAM, DAVIS, MCGILLICUDDY, BEALL, STERLING, NORRIS, and DODDS.

The CHAIRMAN. The committee will come to order. Mr. FLOYD desires to make a statement.

STATEMENT OF HON. JOHN C. FLOYD, M. C.

Mr. FLOYD. Mr. Chairman, since this bill has been under consideration, I have received from the railroad employees of my State many protests against the passage of the bill in its present form. And I feel it my duty to them to incorporate these protests in the record, and also incidentally to state my views concerning several different propositions embodied in the proposed legislation.

I wish right at the outset to state some fundamental objections that I have to the bill as a whole. The first objection I have to it is that it seeks to eliminate trial by jury in personal-injury suits, and I think it practically does so.

In the first place, the trial is before an adjuster, and in this trial before the adjuster there is no provision for trial by jury whatsoever. The findings of the adjuster are made prima facie correct, and if an appeal from his decision is taken the case goes to the Federal district court. Exceptions must be filed within 20 days after the findings of the adjuster are made as a basis for an appeal. Within five days after these exceptions are filed the opposite party, if he desires a jury trial, must notify the clerk of the court of that fact and pay a $5 jury fee as a prerequisite to having the case tried by a jury. And if he fails to do that he must try his case de novo in the Federal court without a jury.

Mr. STERLING. Not a jury fee, is it?

Mr. FLOYD. A jury fee of $5; yes. If you will examine the bill, you will find it is so provided therein.

Now, I desire to give you an illustration of how that would work in my State. The western district of Arkansas has three divisions of the court, and the district extends over the extreme southwestern part of the State, arcund the western part of the State, and the northern part of the State. One of the courts is located at Harrison, in the northern part of the State; another at Fort Smith, in the western part of the State; and another at Texarkana, in the extreme southwestern part of the State. No one can tell where that adjuster would reside. But let us suppose that he resided at Harrison. The railroad communication between Texarkana and Harrison would be 300 or 400 miles, involving numerous delays and transfers. If he should be called to Harrison to try his case before the adjuster and should take the train, the railroad attorney could immediately file his exception after he had take a train for home, and it would be an utter impossibility for that man to get home and ascertain that exceptions had been filed and get his application for appeal and jury fee back there in five days. It would be a physical impossibility for him to do it.

I wish to show you by the record in this case that it was the purpose of those who framed this bill to eliminate jury trials in these cases.

Mr. DAVIS. Your objection there goes to the time allowed for filing exceptions?

Mr. FLOYD. No; my objection goes to any device that will deprive a man of his constitutional right to a trial by jury in this class of cases.

Mr. DAVIS. The particular inconvenience that you are using as an illustration, as you stated, I take it is solely that the time allowed for filing the exceptions is not sufficient. In other words, the difficulty of travel from Texarkana to Harrison?

Mr. FLOYD. No; not wholly. I wish to show you that while this particular provision of the bill is so constructed that it pretends to give him the right of trial by jury, it is done in such a complicated way that it virtually destroys the trial by jury. Now, I wish to show you from the record in this case that it was the intention of the makers of this bill to deprive claimants for damages in personal-injury suits of the right of trial by jury. I read from page 65 of Senate Document No. 338, Sixty-second Congress, second session, as follows:

"The CHAIRMAN. What would you think of our power to provide that a jury trial should be waived—should be deemed to be waived—unless an employee, upon entering employment, has reserved it?

"Mr. FREUND. That is an interesting suggestion. I had not thought of that.

"The CHAIRMAN. We have laws in many States that provide that jury trials shall be waived unless demanded at a certain time. Of course that is after the cause of action has arisen. Now, whether we could go back of that and provide that the jury trial should be deemed waived unless the right to it was reserved by the employee when entering the employment is a matter for consideration.

"Mr. FREUND. I can not say that there is any rule that a jury trial should be waived at any particular stage. Trial by jury is a right purely of the individual. He may waive it.

"Senator CHAMBERLAIN. Do you think it would result in the employee waiving that right as a condition of securing employment? It would work a hardship on the employee if he was required or requested to waive a jury trial.

"Mr. FREUND. That is a matter of consideration by Congress. I do not know whether that would be a constitutional question in itself. I think it would not, perhaps, be quite fair to the employee if he has a right to jury trial that he should be compelled to waive it. I have my doubts about that.

"The CHAIRMAN. My inquiry was wholly tentative.

"Mr. FREUND. I believe that as long as we have a Constitution we ought to observe it. I am not in favor of schemes that try to beat the Constitution in some way because it is inconvenient."

Right in this connection I wish to state that I fully indorse that sentiment expressed by Mr. Freund, and I think that this bill is devised with that very purpose in view in so far as the jury provision is concerned. That is, I think the provision relating to a jury trial is a scheme to try to beat the Constitution because it is inconvenient.

Mr. NORRIS. Of course the object of the bill is to avoid litigation. A jury is one of the incidents to litigation.

Mr. FLOYD. I understand that.

Mr. DAVIS. Let me ask you this question in that connection: Is not the whole theory of workmen's compensation acts to substitute for the very uncertain assessment of the jury a fixed standard of values and compensation? Is not the very purpose of the bill to get away from assessment by juries?

Mr. FLOYD. I think, in so far as this bill is concerned, and the men that prepared it, that was the very purpose in view, to get away from a trial by jury in these personal damage suits.

Mr. DAVIS. Does not that lie at the bottom of all workmen's compensation acts, to a larger or smaller degree?

Mr. FLOYD. I am not prepared to answer that question.

I will now proceed to read further from the statement of Mr. Freund:

"I am quite loyal to the Constitution, but I believe that some time it will have to be changed in some respects.

"Mr. BRANTLEY. What would be the value of the compensation law if we had the jury trial left?"

Now, that is Mr. BRANTLEY, the author of the House bill, asking that question. Let me repeat the question: "What would be the value of the compensation law if we had the jury trial left?" What stronger argument can I make to sustain my contention stated at the outset that the deliberate purpose of the drafters of this bill was to take away from the injured employee his right of trial by jury than to call attention to this question interjected at this point by the author of the House bill?

Mr. Freund proceeds:

"I do not believe it would be used to any extent. If you have a clause relating to attorney's fees—that is why I mentioned the two together—I do not believe the employee would seek delay by a jury trial unless he was spurred on, unless he was urged to do it. I mean that I do not believe there would be any very serious obstacle in the way of the operation of the act.

"Mr. BRANTLEY. You think the compensation fixed by the act would be accepted generally in lieu of trial?

"Mr. FREUND. I think in nine cases out of ten—yes, in ninety-nine cases out of a hundred—there would be no question of a jury trial. I think if the jury trial should be abolished there should be a clause in the act stating that that should be severable, so that the invalidity of that would not invalidate the whole act."

Mr. Freund insists on leaving a provision somewhere in the bill for jury trial, so that if the court should hold that, under Article VII of the Constitution, Congress did not have the right to deny the trial by jury that that saving clause would preserve the constitutionality of the act. And you will remember that during the hearings that I conceded the constitutionality of the act on that very ground, and contended that the provision for a jury trial was all that saved it. But I insist that the bill does not contain any just or fair or reasonable provision for a jury trial; that the sentiments expressed by the proponents of the measure which I have quoted were carried out in the drafting of the bill as far as they felt they could possibly carry them out and preserve the constitutionality of the act.

Now, I will not take the time to read other discussions upon the same subject, but the subject of jury trials is discussed on pages 58, 218, 254, 266, 369, 375, 877, 878, 1011, and 1132 of Senate Document No. 338 already referred to. And the same views are expressed throughout by the various persons who appeared before the commission to discuss that question, all agreeing that it was desirable to eliminate the jury trial if it could be done, and expressing doubts as to whether an act affirmatively eliminating jury trials would be constitutional. It was insisted by some of the proponents of the measure that the jury trial ought to be preserved, not for the purpose of ascertaining the amount of damages under the law, but for the sole purpose of determining whether or not the person claiming damages was an employee of the railroad. And you will notice that where the jury trial is demanded, and where the injured employee has paid his fee as required in the proposed bill, it is left in the discretion of the district court to propound interrogatories, and to submit to the jury the issue to be tried.

Mr. DAVIS. Is not that true of every jury trial under the Federal practice? Has not the court the right to propound to the jury special interrogatories on any question of fact involved in any cause?

Mr. FLOYD. Certainly, they have that right, but in this case in actual practice you would find that that provision could be used for carrying out the purpose in the minds of the makers of the bill to submit the question as to the liability of the railroad company to a jury and not the question of the amount of damages.

Mr. MCGILLICUDDY. You think, Mr. FLOYD, they could eliminate the question of compensation and submit only the question of negligence?

Mr. FLOYD. Undoubtedly they could under this bill as drafted. What would the jury know about it if the district judge should propound an interrogatory, and submit nothing to them except the question of the liability of the company under the circumstances?

Mr. MCGILLICUDDY. I have never understood that under the bill he could do that.

Mr. DAVIS. I think if he did he would certainly have a reversal.

Mr. FLOYD. It is susceptible of such construction. It is within the judge's discretion to propound special interrogatories. He can submit whatever he pleases to the jury, and he can limit the issues. And on the question of compensation I wish to say that under the terms of this bill they have largely eliminated any necessity for a jury as to that, because if the adjuster should perchance allow the man the maximum amount the jury would have no discretion, except to cut him down. They limit the amount he may recover by ironclad rules of law to a fixed amount, and they could not go beyond that.

That is my first fundamental objection to this bill. I do not know what others may think about the jury system. I know it is often criticized. But I do not think that anything was ever invented in the jurisprudence of the world that has done so much for the benefit of humanity, and especially the poorer classes of humanity, as that same much-abused jury system. And I am never by my vote going to aid in the passage of any bill that directly or indirectly destroys the right of trial by jury.

The CHAIRMAN. You do not mean, Brother FLOYD, that the jury system itself is abused. You mean it is maligned.

Mr. FLOYD. I mean maligned, certainly.

To repeat, that is my first fundamental objection to this proposed law, and it would seem to me that this great committee which has during this Congress gone beyond what previous Congresses have done in upholding jury trials and has reported out a bill granting jury trials in contempt cases ought not to pass a bill to deny jury trials in personal-damage cases. And that is the effect of this bill as drafted.

I do not say that it completely eliminates all provisions for jury trials, for it does not, but in practical effect, it destroys the efficacy and the efficiency of jury trials in proceedings provided for under the terms of this bill.

Now, as to the second objection.

Mr. STERLING. Have you said all you are going to say on that question of giving the State courts jurisdiction, Mr. FLOYD?

Mr. FLOYD. No, indeed; I am going to come to that next. If you want to ask me any further questions about the jury provision of this bill I would be glad to answer you.

Mr. GRAHAM. Could your objection which you have just stated be removed by extending the five days to such time as you would consider reasonable?

Mr. FLOYD. Not by that amendment alone, because the adjuster in this case performs the functions of a court and acts in the capacity of a judge, and the original trial is before this adjuster. He has the power to subpœna witnesses, to hear them, and there is no provision in the bill that that testimony taken before that adjuster shall be preserved. But after he has heard orally the testimony of the witnesses that appear before him, and that testimony is locked in his own bosom, it provides that he shall make written findings of facts, that these written findings shall be filed with the court, and they are made prima facie evidence of their correctness. If the witnesses that testified before the adjuster should die between the time that the trial was had before the adjuster and the time of the trial in court, or if any other contingency should happen to prevent the employee from producing the witnesses, and the adjuster had made a wrong finding, had made a finding not substantiated by those facts, his findings would control in the district court, the burden would be upon the employee to overturn those prima facie findings of the adjuster. I do not think that is right. I do not think that is fair. The adjuster might be an unbiased man, he might be an accurate man; but, on the other hand, he might be an inaccurate man, however unbiased, and then he might be very much biased, and a reflection of his views might not give the district court or the jury that is to try the case in the district court any real and true conception of what the evidence in fact disclosed.

Mr. MCGILLICUDDY. Mr. FLOYD, what would you suggest as a preliminary tribunal to try questions of facts, having in mind the principle of compensation, not negligence? If not an adjuster, what would it be, or what should it be?

Mr. FLOYD. If I had any suggestion to make on the subject I would make this suggestion, to preserve the right of trial by jury in any court of original jurisdiction in which the case was brought, with a proviso that by consent of the parties the determination of facts might be submitted to a master or to an adjuster, whatever you choose to call him, and then when they had given their consent to that arrangement, it would be reasonable to bind them by his findings. But I would preserve in its full force the jury trial, and would oppose any scheme devised to deprive either party of trial by jury guaranteed under the Constitution where the amount in controversy is over $20; and then if a convenient method of ascertaining the facts was desired, I would leave it for the parties, by agreement, to say to the court, we are willing, instead of having a jury in this case, that the court may designate an adjuster or a master—call him by whatever name you please—to hear this testimony and report it back to the court.

Mr. MCGILLICUDDY. As a matter of fact you would never get an agreement of that kind in actual practice. The parties would always want to submit their case to the jury—the plaintiff would.

Mr. FLOYD. If that be true, and I think it is true, ought that fact not to condemn this proposed law at the outset, because that is only another argument that we are doing something that will not meet the approval of the parties most concerned in the result of the litigation, the parties seeking to enforce legal rights in the court.

If you have no further questions on that subject, I wish to proceed to consider another objection that I have to the bill, and that is, that it takes away from the State courts the jurisdiction that they now have in personal injury suits, and gives the sole and exclusive jurisdiction of these cases to the Federal courts. Under the existing Federal liability law, the act of 1908, as amended by the act of 1910, the State courts are given concurrent jurisdiction with the Federal courts in all suits for damages—in personal injury cases against the railroads.

Mr. DAVIS. Let me ask you a question. Have cases under that law been held removable as arising under a law of the United States?

Mr. FLOYD. I am not sure about that.

Mr. DAVIS. My impression is that they would be, but I am not sure about that.

Mr. FLOYD. But that would be immaterial to the substantial merits of the proposition, because in all cases which would not be entitled to removal under the general Federal statutes, the cause would have to be tried in the State courts.

Mr. DAVIS. That point was in my mind. Cases brought under the liability law are of course brought under a statute of the United States, and as such, regardless of the citizenship of the parties, would be removable unless there is something on the face of the law to prevent it. My impression, although it is only an impression, is that cases under that law have been held removable because they involve the construction and application of a law of the United States.

Mr. FLOYD. If you will permit me, Mr. DAVIS, I am of the very strong impression that the contrary principle is announced and declared in the decision affirming the constitutionality of the employers' liability act of 1908 and the amendatory act of 1910. They hold that the act simply confers upon the State courts jurisdiction, and when it does that the Federal statute, being a part of the law of the land, may be enforced by the State courts, and I think on investigation that you will find that on questions of removal that the same law will apply to removals in such cases as will apply in any other class of cases.

Mr. STERLING. That law expressly provides that they can not be removed when they are commenced in State courts.

Mr. DAVIS. It does so provide.

Mr. FLOYD. Its constitutionality has been upheld.

Mr. STERLING. Since that amendment, do you understand it could be removed?

Mr. DAVIS. I am asking for information.

Mr. FLOYD. Mr. STERLING brings to my attention the fact that that law does expressly provide that cases brought in State courts shall not be removed, and the constitutionality of that amendatory act has been upheld by the Supreme Court of the United States.

Mr. STERLING. Did they pass on that in the cases they decided last year?

Mr. FLOYD. Yes, sir; that is my understanding. They passed both upon the law and upon the amendment, and it is in the decision upholding the amendment that I think you will find that very question discussed.

Mr. STERLING. I know they answered every question that was raised by counsel on either side.

Mr. FLOYD. Let us look at this proposition now with that view alone. It certainly would be to the great advantage of injured employees to have an opportunity to adjudicate their cases, whatever the method or whatever the system adopted be, in the local courts of their respective communities. It would save them hundreds of dollars in expense.

Mr. NORRIS. Right on that point I wish to ask you this question: Could not we reach that in this bill by the proper amendment and give the State courts jurisdiction?

Mr. FLOYD. Oh, I think so; and amendments of that purport will be offered. If that was the only defect in it, I think we could reach it easily by an amendment, and I shall vote for such an amendment when it is offered. I do not think that I have an amendment prepared just in that form, because my amendments are drafted along another line, with a view to preserve in its entirety the existing law. But if another member of the committee submits such an amendment, I shall cheerfully vote for it.

I think we are making a serious mistake in attempting to pass this bill. We cut down the amounts that employees may recover under the existing law. We fix an absolute and arbitrary maximum limit of recovery for personal injuries, and yet we provide that they can not take their claims into their local courts, State courts—that they must take them into a Federal court. Well, in sparsely settled communities, where Federal courts have extensive territorial jurisdictions covering half and in some instances the whole State, taking these two propositions together, limiting the amount they can recover and making recovery more expensive and at the same time requiring them to go into foreign jurisdictions, to leave their homes, to appear in a court 100 miles distant, and in the case I have already cited 300 miles away by the nearest public conveyance, to assert their claims against the railroad company, it seems to me the proposition is too unjust.

Mr. NORRIS. If that applied to all the cases it would be very serious, I think myself; but it is at least the theory of the law that if it is enacted those things will very, very seldom occur; that they will not get into any litigation; that they will never have a trial. It will be adjusted in the first instance, as the law provides it shall be.

Mr. FLOYD. In answer to your first suggestion, I wish to observe that the law will apply to every case.

Mr. NORRIS. It will be possible in every case; that is true. It has to be, under the Constitution.

Mr. FLOYD. But the principle of law will apply in every case, and it will deny every man the right to a trial in the State court. He must enter upon his trial in the Federal jurisdiction whether that court be convenient or inconvenient to him.

Mr. DODDS. It would have an influence to make the claimant accept less, perhaps, by reason of the fact that if he resisted he would be put to large expense.

Mr. FLOYD. I think so, and that is the evil of it. While the amounts are small that the employees are entitled to recover, the difficulties of recovery are so great that I think the practical operation of this law would result finally, after the railroad companies had tried a number of cases, in compelling every man injured to accept just that amount which the railroad companies would voluntarily give him and no more. That is what I think would be the final effect of the operation of this law.

Mr. NORRIS. Can you not assume that the adjuster will do what is right if there is such a trial, if it gets that far? Of course, the believers in this law think it will never get that far, that it will be settled without any trial. That is the theory of the law; and if it does not have that effect, the law will be a failure without a doubt. And, then, as you said a while ago, if the adjuster goes that far and gives the employee the maximum amount under the law, then the railroad company would take it up; then the very objections you urge to the adjuster's judgment being practically final would redound to the benefit of the workman rather than the company, because they would have to overcome it when they got into court.

Mr. FLOYD. It would in that particular instance, it is true, but you forget that the trial in the district court is not the end of the litigation. This bill gives the right of appeal from the district court to the circuit court of appeals and to the Supreme Court of the United States.

Mr. NORRIS. Of course, we have to do that to make it constitutional.

Mr. FLOYD. Certainly you do; but instead of it being framed in a way to prevent litigation it is so devised, it seems to me, that the only thing about the bill that would prevent litigation is what I have already suggested, that the difficulties in the way of the injured employee to recover against these tremendous odds that are given to the railroads in the bill would be such that he would be compelled in the last analysis to accept just such compensation as the railroad companies would voluntarily pay him. It is a wrong assumption, in view of the history of railroads in the past, to say that because these amounts are small that the railroad companies would not go to law over them.

A few years ago I had occasion to stop for a few days in a city in a neighboring State. I had some business there, and I was invited by a railroad attorney, with whom I was acquainted, to make his office my headquarters while I was in the city. During the time I was there he called my attention to a brief of several hundred pages and wanted me to look over it. He was very proud of his brief. I examined it, and to my astonishment I discovered that the amount in controversy was $1.75. He had carried it up to the supreme court of the State. I asked him, how is it that you can afford to go to all this expense of preparing this elaborate brief and conducting this case through the various courts and appealing it to the supreme court of the State in order to settle a controversy where only $1.75 is involved. "Why," he said, "it is this way: The railroads employ their attorneys by the year, they employ their stenographers by the year, and while the amount in controversy in this case amounts to nothing, if we win this suit, or if we lose it, it will have cost this litigant so much money to assert his rights that 100,000 claims of a similar character for $1.75 each will never be presented to the railroad company."

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. Floyd, if you will permit me, those of us who believe in workmen's compensation law had in mind that very condition, and it is the object of the law to make such a thing impossible. We desire to avoid litigation. If we are mistaken about it, of course, we are wrong. But we want to avoid it, and we know now that in the present conditions what the railroad companies do, and an employee who undertakes to get into litigation with them realizes, to begin with, that he has got to travel with them as long as there is a court to go to. We want to avoid that.

Mr. FLOYD. I believe that the sincere advocates of this bill have that in mind, but they overlook the fact that in constructing this bill they have nowhere in it put any obstructions against the railroad companies to pursue this litigation to the highest court in the land, but on the contrary it expressly provides that they may.

Mr. NORRIS. Of course, we have to do that. You must concede that we have to do that under the Constitution.

Mr. FLOYD. You have to do that in order to make it constitutional.

Mr. NORRIS. Yes.

Mr. FLOYD. Whenever you do that you fail to accomplish by the legislation the very object you seek to accomplish.

Mr. DAVIS. Have they not in the very opening paragraph of the bill, as I recall it, put the very strongest obstacle in the path of the railroad companies doing that, by imposing on them that absolute liability?

Mr. NORRIS. That is the object of it. That is what we want to do.

Mr. FLOYD. I will have something to say later about that absolute liability. I do not care at this time to go into that, but later on I will be glad to do so. I wish you would call my attention to it again, because I have some views I wish to express on that particular point.

For the present I wish to pursue this particular subject a little further. There is nothing that has occurred in recent years that has varied or caused the railroad companies to vary from their long-established custom to make litigation so difficult that claimants will be afraid to bring suit against them. Within the last three or four years an incident occurred in my own State that illustrates the methods of the average railroad company. The legislature of the State had enacted a law requiring the railroad companies to build bridges or crossings wherever a public road crossed their tracks, the law requiring them either to make overhead bridges or to prepare for crossings on the level of the tracks. In this case a deep cut was made right across the public road. The statutes of the State fixed a penalty of $5 a day for every day that they neglected to put in that overhead crossing, and yet they neglected it. The district attorney had to bring suit against them. He recovered in damages, under the statute, $2,000 for their neglect and failure to comply with that law, and then they paid that $2,000 and built the overhead crossing. Under this law there is nothing to prevent the railroad companies from carrying their litigation to the highest courts. At this point I believe I will mention the different ways in which I think that the shrewd railroad agents or the shrewd railroad attorneys can get advantage of the injured employee under the terms of this bill. There are several devices in this bill whereby settlements may be effected. In the first place, it provides that by mutual agreement in writing these damages may be settled, and this written agreement filed with the adjuster shall be binding upon the parties. That is No. 1. I think that a shrewd, well-posted railroad agent or railroad attorney, meeting a poor, unfortunate injured employee, would, in nine cases out of ten, get the best of that employee on a contract, because he would not make it unless he did get such advantage.

Mr. DAVIS. He can do the same thing under the present law, can he not?

Mr. FLOYD. Yes; he can do the same thing under the present law, but there is not the inducement to do it under the present law that there would be under the new law.

Mr. DAVIS. There would be more, because the risk of recovery is greater, according to your theory.

Mr. FLOYD. I think not, but I will have something to say on that later.

Mr. DODDS. And would not the employee himself have information and believe that he is better protected than he is now under the present law?

Mr. FLOYD. Not in my State. If there is a railroad employee in the whole State of Arkansas that favors this bill, I have failed to hear from him. I have here protest after protest bitterly complaining against its passage, stating that it will absolutely ruin them and their organizations if it is passed. And I have the first single letter to receive from anybody in my State asking me to support this bill.

Device No. 2 provides for a committee. It provides that the injured employee may select one, the employer may select one, and these two may select the third. This committee, composed of three individuals, may hear the evidence and may make an award, and that award, when filed with the adjuster, becomes binding.

Mr. DAVIS. Again, that is true under the present law, isn't it?

Mr. FLOYD. There is opportunity No. 2 for the shrewd railroad agent to get the advantage of the employee.

I do not know. Mr. DAVIS, as to any provision in the existing law for arbitration of that kind. Of course they might arbitrate their controversies under State laws or by mutual agreement.

Mr. DAVIS. Let me ask you this: It is purely a voluntary proceeding under this bill. Of course, if it is a voluntary proceeding under this bill, the parties would have the same voluntary rights in the absence of the bill; and is not that true that in every State of the Union an arbitration of that sort may be consented to in writing, may be entered into, and with the consent of the court?

Mr. FLOYD. Of course, that is true in my State, with the right of appeal. But, to resume my argument, that is opportunity No. 2, in my judgment, under the provision in this bill for the railroad to get advantage in the settlement.

Mr. DAVIS suggests that they might do the same thing under the present law, but under the existing law the amount that a man may recover in these personal-injury suits is not limited. It is left to the discretion of the jury; and the inducement to make settlements under the existing law, if a man has a cause of action, is nothing as compared with his inducement to make settlement under this kind of a law, which absolutely and arbitrarily limits the amount that he may recover at the end of the litigation.

Device No. 3 is the trial before an adjuster.

The third proposition which I wish to consider is that this whole matter of adjustment is turned over to an adjuster appointed by a Federal judge—a district judge—with a provision that the adjuster shall be a competent person who shall not be related to the judge, but with no provision that he shall not be related to the railroads; and a judge could appoint the claim agent of the railroad to be an adjuster under the terms of this bill.

Mr. DAVIS. Do you think he would since the Archbald case?

Mr. FLOYD. I doubt whether he would since the Archbald case; but we ought not to leave it within his power to do such a thing under any circumstances. The only qualification provided for an adjuster in this bill is that he shall be a competent person. He is not required to possess any other qualifications than to be a competent person in the judgment of the judge.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. FLOYD, I think you are striking a point in the bill that if there is a way under the Constitution to amend it, it ought to be amended. I do not like that, either.

Mr. FLOYD. There are plenty of ways under the Constitution to amend it, if you will permit an interjection.

Mr. NORRIS. Yes; I think so; but under the Constitution that adjuster would have to be appointed either by the judge or by the President or by the head of a department, would he not? He would be an officer of the United States, I presume.

Mr. FLOYD. The bill provides that he shall be an officer of the United States enjoying a salary, but it provides that the judge shall appoint him and the Attorney General shall fix his compensation at not less than $1,800 nor more than $3,000 per annum.

Mr. NORRIS. If we amended—and I should like to have you discuss this; I have thought about it a good deal—I have rather come to the conclusion, under the Constitution, that we would have to provide that if the judge did not appoint him he must be appointed either by the President or by the head of a department. That would be the Attorney General, I presume. Because the Constitution provides that the President shall appoint ambassadors and all officers of the United States, excepting that Congress may provide by law that such appointments may be made by the head of a department or by the court. I have thought of this, and I should like to get your idea on it, that we could provide by law, for instance, that these appointments should be made by the President or by the Attorney General, or even by the judge. The Civil Service Commission, for instance, participates in making those appointments by submitting names to the officials for them to select from. That could not make it binding under the Constitution, because the appointment, to be legal, must be made by one of those three officials. But if we pass that kind of a law they would never go outside of the list that the commission submitted. But we could devise some other methods of suggesting names to the official who did have the appointing power, and the effect would be that no official would go outside of that list. That is the basis of our present civil-service law in many cases.

Mr. FLOYD. Do you think that would give you better men than the judge would select?

Mr. NORRIS. I am inclined to think so. I have a prejudice against the judges of the Federal courts appointing these adjusters. I think that is a weak point of the bill.

Mr. FLOYD. I think so, too; but I have not gone carefully into the proposition you are discussing as to providing a better means of selecting the adjusters in case we agree to that kind of a provision. I have already suggested that, in my judgment, there should not be a permanent adjuster; that the court in which the case originated should have the authority, by consent of the parties, to waive the jury and submit the findings of facts to the adjuster.

Mr. NORRIS. Of course that would still leave the appointment of the adjuster in the hands of the Federal judge.

Mr. FLOYD. That would leave his appointment in the hands of the Federal judge, but by consent of the parties litigant in every instance at the time the case was up for consideration. There would be this difference; he would not be a permanent officer.

I have another serious objection to that provision of the bill providing for adjusters, in that it provides for at least one, and there may be more, in every judicial district in the United States; and, if I remember correctly, there are 67 of them.

Mr. NORRIS. Yes.

Mr. FLOYD. And when you go to figure on the cost of paying these adjusters, with their compensation fixed between $1,800 and $3,000, we are incorporating into the law a very great item of expense to do work which may be done better in the courts which are already maintained and must still be maintained at the public expense at a very high cost.

Mr. NORRIS. That is true; it would be expensive. But what we want to do—I think we are all agreed on that—we want an adjuster who is competent and unbiased.

Mr. FLOYD. Absolutely; we could not afford to stand for any other principle——

Mr. NORRIS. No.

Mr. FLOYD (continuing). Than to have an absolutely impartial adjuster, if we adopt the system of having adjusters at all.

Mr. NORRIS. But if we could avoid it we would have to have some machinery. If there is any other system to get rid of these adjusters, I would be glad to consider it, but it seems to me there must be something if we take that out of the law to put in its place, or our law would fall of its own machinery. It would not be workable.

Mr. GRAHAM. The salary proposed is not too big, I am certain. The adjuster would be kept busy in his own judicial district.

Mr. NORRIS. That is more or less of a guess, as I take it. Nobody knows now. The theory of the law is that most of these cases will be settled as a matter of form without any litigation and without any trouble; that they will never even get to the adjuster. If it should turn out that they would all go to the adjuster, I would not favor the law. We only put the adjuster in, as I understand it, and that method of settlement, to avoid the constitutional limitations that we have. But the theory is that this machinery will not be in continual use, that the difficulties will be settled as they come along without any trouble, without going into court, without getting into any litigation of any kind. If that theory does not work out, then the law, of course, will fail. But we are met with the constitutional provisions about every man having a right of a jury trial, and so on, and in the appointment of the adjuster we are met with the other constitutional provision limiting the officials who can make this appointment. So we have got to provide this machinery. But the theory of the law is that it shall be so circumscribed, and the recoveries made so definite and certain that the machinery will not be used.

Mr. FLOYD. You mean, Mr. Norris, that the theory of the advocates of the law is that?

Mr. NORRIS. Yes.

Mr. FLOYD. That the machinery will not be used?

Mr. NORRIS. Yes.

Mr. FLOYD. If you will pardon me for expressing my own opinion, there is the fatal mistake that they are making. There is nothing in this proposed law, in my judgment, that will cause the railroad companies to change their former policies in regard to litigating cases of this character.

Mr. NORRIS. Do you not think that, as Mr. DAVIS mentioned awhile ago, that the provision of the law that fixes these recoveries at a definite sum will be beneficial?

Mr. FLOYD. I desire to answer that a little later on in discussing another branch of the case. I have some decided views on that question. I will answer now that I do not think that this bill, if enacted into law, would have the least effect in that regard. Some one interjected some provisions into this bill that controvert the very theory that no doubt every sincere friend of the bill has in regard to it, namely, that it will lessen litigation and tend to produce speedy settlements. If that is the purpose of the bill, and if the men who framed the bill had that alone in view, I want to ask why they put in section 11, by which, after an employee has gone before the adjuster, has gone before the district court, has gone before the circuit court of appeals, and has appealed his case to the Supreme Court, and it has been affirmed, allows this Federal adjuster to review the case, and gives the employer the right to summons him to appear before the adjuster at any time within two years from the date of the accident to ascertain whether or not his injuries have increased or diminished or ceased altogether.

Mr. DAVIS. Will you let me make a suggestion there?

Mr. FLOYD. Yes.

Mr. DAVIS. I think the reason that the clause went into the bill is because the bill clearly divides them into two classes, permanent and temporary. Where the injury is permanent the finding of the adjuster is final, and where it is recognized as being temporary and the purpose is to compensate for a temporary injury, there must be some machinery to determine when that temporary injury has ceased.

Mr. FLOYD. True enough; but let me go on with my argument in regard to this provision and see whether or not it is calculated to prevent litigation.

There is no question that a new proceeding may be instituted under section 11 at any time within two years after the injury has occurred, and there is no limitation in section 11 to any particular kinds of injury. It may be, in fact, that it would be practically limited to that particular class of cases referred to, but that does not matter. It is still true as to that particular class, and it is that particular class of injuries which will be the source of the most litigation.

A railroad company, like anybody else, when they have a clear, unquestioned case against them, will usually surrender, but if there are any complications, any element of doubt, then they never surrender until they have carried their case to the highest court. What would be the effect of that provision? The practical effect of the provision in section 11 is that the employer, within two years from date of the injury, may summons the injured employee to appear as often as he sees fit before the adjuster for rehearing to ascertain whether or not his injuries have increased or diminished or ceased altogether, and the penalty for his refusal to appear is that his compensation at once ceases. If he does not appear to answer the summons his monthly allowance ceases.

Mr. MCGILLICUDDY. Does not that section give the injured employee that same right if his injuries have increased?

Mr. FLOYD. Oh, yes.

Mr. NORRIS. I can imagine that there might be some cases where the decision perhaps would be that the injured employee was entitled to a certain amount, and it might develop, even after that was adjudicated, that this injury had increased so as to result in more serious injury, and he ought to have the opportunity to have that matter taken up, had he not?

Mr. FLOYD. Your whole fundamental theory of the proposed law is that you are going to wipe out all the distinctions and give them all equal damages for like injuries, whether injured by their own negligence or otherwise.

Mr. NORRIS. That is the theory; but there are a lot of injuries that we know sometimes get better or that sometimes get worse—that no human mind can foresee in advance—and we ought to make some provision for that. If a man recovers entirely from the injury, then his compensation ought to cease.

Mr. FLOYD. I am not controverting that proposition. My criticisms are to this bill and its construction. I wish to pursue that argument further to show what the result of this section 11 will be in connection with other provisions of the bill. Suppose a railroad employee is injured. He goes before the adjuster and gets a satisfactory allowance under this bill—that is, as satisfactory as it can be under the low rates of compensation allowed. His case is taken to the district court and is tried there de novo. The employee recovers judgment, and it is satisfactory to him. He gets the maximum. It is then appealed to the circuit court of appeals and subsequently to the Supreme Court of the United States, and it is finally adjudicated in his favor in the Supreme Court before the end of two years. Yet that does not end the litigation. The adjuster, at the instance of the railroad company, under the terms of this bill, can summon him again for trial, review the case, modify, set aside, or annul a decision of the Supreme Court of the United States. There is no escaping from that conclusion.

Mr. NORRIS. That would only be in cases where, subsequent to the first adjudication, there had been a change, either better or worse, in the condition of the man who was injured.

Mr. FLOYD. He could be cited for that reason whether there had been any change or not.

Mr. DAVIS. You must assume that in any law; and does not your assumption involve corrupt action on the part of the adjuster?

Mr. FLOYD. No; I am not assuming corruption upon the part of the adjuster.

Mr. DAVIS. You are assuming that the adjuster would do that without any adequate cause.

Mr. FLOYD. I am not assuming that on the part of the adjuster. He might have adequate cause; but here is the great Judiciary Committee of the House considering a bill under the provisions of which, if it should become a law, it would be possible for a Federal adjuster to annul and set aside the decision of the Supreme Court of the United States in a personal-injury case where the employee had been compelled by the railroad company to fight his case up to the Supreme Court.

Mr. NORRIS. Would you want to eliminate section 11?

Mr. FLOYD. Absolutely; yes. There should be an end of litigation somewhere.

Mr. NORRIS. It might be possible to eliminate; but if you do, it would work the other way—that employee who only received in the first adjudication a small amount, that his injury would increase away beyond the expectations of any authority that examined him.

Mr. FLOYD. Yes.

Mr. NORRIS. And he would have the right to go in and get additional compensation?

Mr. FLOYD. But in arguing this question I am answering the suggestion that this bill is going to prevent litigation. It is going to multiply litigation. It does not involve the proposition suggested by Mr. DAVIS that I am claiming that this adjuster would be corrupt at all. It gives the railroad people, if their case should be finally adjudicated within one year, or the employee, either, another whole year to start that whole procedure over again, and it does not limit either party to one such citation. They may make as many other citations as they please within the time specified.

Mr. GRAHAM. Is it not really a new proceeding? If they reach a different conclusion from the one first reached they would not reverse the Supreme Court. They would act on a different state of facts?

Mr. FLOYD. It is a new proceding, but it is an answer to the contention that the law is so fixed that it will avoid litigation. It makes possible not only the one new proceeding but makes possible a half a dozen or more new proceedings. It controverts the contention that the bill will prevent litigation.

Mr. GRAHAM. Is not that true about every lawsuit—every legal remedy? We have an adjudication between parties to-day on an existing statement of facts. Now, between the same parties there might arise to-morrow, growing out of the same general subject matter, new proceedings based on a changed state of facts.

Mr. FLOYD. I do not know of any provision in the existing law that enables a railroad company that has been finally adjudged to pay damages in a personal-injury suit to hve a rehearing of the whole matter before any other court or tribunal. If that is in the law it is something entirely new to me, and I am opposed to putting any such provision in the law. That is my objection to this provision of the bill.

Mr. NORRIS. If there was any probability that a case like you cite coming up a second time——

Mr. FLOYD. That is an extreme case, but it shows the possibilities for litigation under this bill.

Mr. NORRIS. But it would just as often result to the detriment of the employee as it would to the railroad company.

Mr. DAVIS. My suggestion is this: You and I might have litigation to-day about a piece of real estate in which I am adjudged the lawful owner, and the Supreme Court confirmed that decree. As soon as the court does that I go and buy an outstanding title. I may go and litigate with you again on that. That is not overruling the decree of the Supreme Court as between ourselves, but is a new adjudication on a new state of facts.

Mr. FLOYD. This suggestion was made, and it is tenable, under the proposed law, for the sole purpose of answering the suggestion made by Judge NORRIS that the friends of this bill stood for it because they believed it would lessen litigation, keep down and prevent litigation. And I suggested the successive steps that might be taken in one of these cases as showing the possibilities, and, I grant you, the extreme possibilities of litigation under the framework of this proposed bill.

Mr. GRAHAM. But Judge Norris answers that, Judge Floyd, by saying that a great majority of the cases probably would not reach the adjuster at all. But even if some of them reached him twice there would still be a diminution of the cases.

Mr. FLOYD. I wish to mention that in connection with another suggestion later on. I wish to answer that very point, and I would be glad if you would call my attention to that when I come to the discussion of that branch of the subject.

Mr. BEALL. Let me see if I understand your interpretation of section 11. Suppose this matter has been referred to the adjuster and he has rendered his decision, and it then goes to the court. The finding of the adjuster is approved by the court, and it is then appealed to the circuit court of appeals. Say, that it is affirmed there, and then goes to the Supreme Court of the United States. Suppose it is affirmed there, and that decision handed down within the two years after the original findings, a railroad company can file an application with the adjuster for a new hearing. He is granted no discretion; he is compelled to do it?

Mr. FLOYD. Absolutely; the employee must appear or lose his compensation from the date of his refusal to do so. His pay ceases when he refuses to submit to a rehearing or reexamination of his case.

Mr. BEALL. Suppose upon that new hearing the adjuster adheres to his original decision. Has the railroad company the right then to go from that adjuster on this new application into the court again?

Mr. FLOYD. Undoubtedly, and take that case again to the circuit court of appeals and to the Supreme Court after the decision in the first or original case involving the same injury had been duly affirmed.

Mr. BEALL. If the trial court reaffirms the decision of the adjuster, they can then appeal it anew to the circuit court of appeals, and from there to the Supreme Court of the United States?

Mr. FLOYD. I think so. That is the way I construe it. And to show you that section 11 provides that he may do that very thing, I read:

"At any time before the expiration of two years from the date of the accident, but not afterwards, and before the expiration of the period for which payment of compensation has been fixed thereby, but not afterwards, any agreement, award, findings, or judgment may be from time to time reviewed by the adjuster upon the application of either party after due notice to the other party upon the ground that the incapacity of the injured employee has subsequently ended, increased, or diminished."

Judgment refers to the judgment of the district court, the judgment of the circuit court of appeals, and judgment of the Supreme Court of the United States.

Mr. GRAHAM. Suppose a case—that there is a railroad wreck and an employee is injured; that he receives a traumatic injury on the head. He claims an epilepsy results from that injury, and that case is tried before the adjuster. The proof seems to establish the presence of epilepsy, a dreadful disease, entitling him to very big damages, and he gets the big damages. But after receiving them it turns out that it did not result in epilepsy; that he got more than he was entitled to. Then, what injustice would be done by a review or the rehearing of that case on the new state of facts? And, reverse that. Suppose that he was injured, and that after the adjustment was had the injuries resulted in enlargement of the bony matter of the skull, a consequent pressure upon the brain, and epilepsy. He received no compensation for that injury. Why should he not be able to reopen it and present the new state of facts and get compensation commensurate with the injury?

Mr. FLOYD. I think, Judge Graham, you are confusing this proposed law with existing law. No man can recover very large damages under this proposed law, and this bill proposes to compensate injured employees regardless of their fault or negligence. The man who is grossly negligent when injured, unless he is intending to destroy his own life or the life of another or is drunk, can recover under this bill the same amount of damages that the most careful employee of the railroad can recover for a like injury incurred without fault.

Mr. GRAHAM. Yes; but there is a minimum and a maximum.

Mr. FLOYD. There is a maximum; that is true.

Mr. GRAHAM. He may have been allowed the minimum when he should have been allowed the maximum.

Mr. FLOYD. But the theory I have of the proposition is that by putting in a provision to protect an extreme case you will subject the employee to litigation in hundreds of cases in which there is no merit whatsoever, instituted for the sole purpose of compelling railroad employees generally, in the last analysis, to take what the railroad companies are willing to pay them in settlement for these damage suits.

Mr. GRAHAM. I was addressing my objection more particularly to the increase in litigation, and that does not offer any insuperable objection to me if the additional litigation is in the interest of justice.

Mr. FLOYD. But that last case mentioned is an extreme case. I mentioned it to show you the limitations and the effect of the law.

Mr. NORRIS. But all cases under section 11 are extreme cases.

Mr. DAVIS. Let me ask you there, as a practical matter—of course it must be a mere matter of opinion with all of us, because it is purely experimental—do you believe that under section 11 there will be as many instances of a reopening of the case and a readjustment and readjudication as there are now under the present practice of appeals, reversal of new trials and reappeals, rereversals, and additional new trials?

That goes to the question of diminution of litigation.

Mr. FLOYD. I am answering the argument of the friends of this bill. I am not committed to this bill on that theory or any other. I am answering the contention of the friends of this bill that their object is to prevent litigation. I am trying to show that it will not eliminate, but multiply, litigation.

Mr. DAVIS. I am suggesting that under this bill there will be less litigation.

Mr. FLOYD. Before I am through I am going to largely concede that premise—I may just as well do it here—I admit that the machinery under this bill is so complicated that in many cases employees will surrender their rights and compromise rather than go to law for the small amounts allowed. There are two trials before you can get the case disposed of in the district court. You must have a trial before the adjuster; there is no escape from it. The notice is made jurisdictional. The case must be taken before the adjuster first, and for that trial the employee must summons his witnesses. He must get them there. They are heard orally by the adjuster. What they say is locked up in his memory. He makes his findings in writing and they are made prima facie evidence, and if the case is appealed to the district court he has to have another trial de novo. He has to get all of these witnesses back before the district court. He has to retry his case. There you have multiplied litigation. There are two trials under this proposed new law where you have but one under the existing law. You bring your suit at present directly in the State court or Federal court. You have it tried, and then you go to the court of appeals.

Mr. DAVIS. Will you let me restate that proposition? You have a possibility of two suits, under the existing law you are bound to have one.

Mr. FLOYD. You are bound to have one under the new law.

Mr. DAVIS. Not necessarily.

Mr. NORRIS. Oh, no.

Mr. FLOYD. Unless you compromise. Under the present law you are not bound to have one suit. Hundreds of cases are compromised under the existing law.

Mr. NORRIS. There would be very few cases, I think, Mr. FLOYD, that there would be a controversy in. If a man has his arm cut off the law specifically states what compensation he shall get. In the majority of cases there would be no litigation whatever. If that is not true, then the law is a failure. I admit that.

Mr. FLOYD. That is an assumption, and in a measure it is true and in a measure it is not true, because you can raise many other questions in one of these personal-injury cases.

Mr. NORRIS. Oh, yes.

Mr. FLOYD. You can raise the question as to whether he is an employee at all, or as to whether or not he was entitled under the terms of the law to be compensated.

Mr. DAVIS. That would be a very unusual case, though.

Mr. FLOYD. Even in those cases where the amount is fixed there has to be an adjustment. He has to have his witnesses. He has to go before the adjuster and produce his testimony.

Mr. DAVIS. And you can see yourself how much simpler that proceeding would be than the ordinary jury trial.

Mr. NORRIS. In the first place, he would not need a lawyer.

Mr. GRAHAM. It was the experience of those who addressed the committee that where it had been in operation it did have the effect of reducing greatly the number of cases that went to the adjuster.

Mr. FLOYD. I have studied very carefully other compensation laws, and I am frank to say that I read all the reports that the committee cited, and the laws in foreign countries, and I have not been able to find just this kind of a law in any of the books.

Mr. DAVIS. Does not that argue that this is the best law that has been devised up to the present time?

Mr. FLOYD. It may be a basis for that argument——

Mr. NORRIS. Of course, the authorities are necessarily limited.

Mr. FLOYD. They ought to cite authorities on the point. This is a brand-new proposition.

Mr. NORRIS. That is true.

Mr. FLOYD. We are promulgating an entirely new scheme of legislation, and that is why I am protesting against this bill being reported out in its present form. We have worked for years on legislation for railroad employees along well-established lines, and finally evolved what I think, from the railroad employees' standpoint, the finest system of laws that were ever devised—the Federal liability laws of the United States, namely, the act of 1908 and the amendatory act of 1910.

That brings me to a further objection, and, I will add, the most serious objection to this bill.

Mr. GRAHAM. There is one objection you urged to which I should like to call your attention. Taking your own district as an illustration, you gave three points at which your court is held.

Mr. FLOYD. Yes.

Mr. GRAHAM. And you assumed that the adjuster would live near one of those points, perhaps the extreme northern one. Why could not he go to the other two points, as the court does? That is, instead of bringing the litigant and witnesses to him, why could he not go to that point where the Federal court was held nearest the litigants?

Mr. FLOYD. It might be that he could. It might be that he would, but there is no provision in the law that requires it.

Mr. NORRIS. He would not necessarily have to go to a place where court was held. He could go where the witnesses were, regardless of where court was held?

Mr. DAVIS. The Senate amendment provides that he shall go to the most convenient place.

Mr. FLOYD. It may be that some of these criticisms that I am making of the bill will be obviated by amendments made in the Senate bill. It is the House bill that I have particularly studied, and I am very glad to welcome any amendment whereby it is bettered, I am sure.

I desire now to state my principal objection, my fundamental objection, to this bill, and that is the provision that makes it the sole and exclusive remedy for injured railroad employees. I think if we pass this bill in its present form we ought to pass it for the avowed purpose of relieving the railroad companies from excessive or heavy damages that they are liable to under existing laws, and not under any pretense that we are doing something for the benefit of the laboring people, because I do not believe we are.

Mr. NORRIS. Has it not been the universal testimony here of all those who appeared—I remember particularly Mr. LEWIS, a Member of the House of Representatives, who has given a great deal of study to questions of this kind. He gave it as his opinion that if this bill were passed it would largely increase—and he gave the figures; I do not remember them now——

Mr. FLOYD. Yes; and I have those figures in mind.

Mr. NORRIS (continuing). The amount of money that the railroad companies would pay and that their employees would receive.

Mr. FLOYD. I remember that, and I have some notations here in regard to that very proposition.

Mr. NORRIS. Of course, on that point it must necessarily follow that his figures were only an estimate, and no one can give anything but an estimate, because we have never had a law like this.

Mr. FLOYD. I desire to discuss in this connection that very proposition.

Mr. NORRIS. Do you remember what his figures were?

Mr. FLOYD. I do not remember Mr. Lewis's figures.

Mr. DAVIS. Mr. Brantly gave it as about $16,000,000. Mr. Lewis said he thought it would not stop short of $50,000,000.

Mr. FLOYD. The commission's report, as I remember it, is $15,000,000. I have figured on that basis.

Mr. NORRIS. I was under the impression that Mr. Lewis gave it as his opinion that it would be $20,000,000.

Mr. FLOYD. The most reliable statistics on the subject show that under previous laws, and including such time as the present law has been in force, the amount recovered against railroad companies in damage suits is about $10,000,000 a year.

It is claimed by the friends of this measure that such recoveries would be increased to $15,000,000 a year under the terms of this bill. Assuming that that is correct, that the aggregate amounts of these judgments under this proposed compensation act, if enacted into law, will amount to $15,000,000, then what do we find? Under the existing law these judgments are due at the termination of the litigation and are payable in cash. Under this bill the larger amount recovered is distributed in partial payments, and the actual amount, assuming that $15,000,000 is a correct amount, that the railroads will pay the first year will be $1,875,000.

Mr. NORRIS. That is, the actual amount of increase, you mean?

Mr. FLOYD. No; the actual amount paid. The sum mentioned is one-eighth of $15,000,000, which is the actual amount paid. The railroad companies reserve the remainder of that $15,000,000 under their own control and for their use. Figuring the interest on money due the railroad employees that the railroad companies are holding and controlling at 5 per cent per annum, this interest would reduce the actual amount of cash that they would have to pay the next year. In other words, they would have to pay out of their proceeds $1,218,750 the second year, and the residue of the annual payment, $1,875,000, would be made up by the interest that they had received from the money that was due the railroad employees.

Mr. DAVIS. $1,875,000 to be added to the second year payment?

Mr. FLOYD. I anticipated that question. It would not affect the result one particle, because under the existing law recoveries amount to $10,000,000 a year, and each year would stand absolutely alone. And the third year they can come in for another $10,000,000 and the fourth year for another $10,000,000, and each fund would be a segregated fund that would go to the employees.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. Floyd, it seems to me that while those figures might work for the first year, they would not afterwards, as you have given them.

Mr. FLOYD. Let me go right on with these figures. You catch my point?

Mr. NORRIS. I think so.

Mr. FLOYD. For the third year it would be $1,279,688, supplemented by the interest on the remainder, which would bring it up to $1,875,000; the fourth year, $1,343,672; the fifth year, $1,410,856; the sixth year, $1,481,399; the seventh year, $1,555,469; the eighth year, $1,643,262; a total of $11,808,094 which the railroad companies would have paid of their own money. The remainder paid would be money derived from interest on amounts withheld from the railroad employees.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. Floyd, that is in eight years, is it not?

Mr. FLOYD. That is in eight years. That is the limit of time in which it is distributed.

Mr. NORRIS. But the second year in which your figures would be in operation there would be another eight-year period commence?

Mr. DODDS. Each year would have to stand upon its own footing.

Mr. FLOYD. Each year would have to stand upon its own footing.

Mr. NORRIS. You do not mean to say that if this bill were enacted into law that they would only pay $11,000,000 in eight years?

Mr. FLOYD. No; they would pay $15,000,000 in the eight years.

Mr. NORRIS. Yes.

Mr. FLOYD. But I mean to say that the difference between the $15,000,000 and the $11,808,094 would be derived from interest at 5 per cent on money withheld from employees which under existing law they would have received the first year.

Mr. DODDS. It would show the difference between the present worth of what they would pay and what they would actually pay.

Mr. NORRIS. Exactly; but you know you have taken one eight-year period. After your eight-year period had operated one year another eight-year period would begin, etc., and so on all the way through.

Mr. FLOYD. Certainly; but that does not affect this result.

Under the existing law they would have been paid $10,000,000 in the first year. These same employees, had they recovered in that year the larger amount under this bill, would be paid the $15,000,000 distributed over eight years.

Mr. NORRIS. I understand that; but you do not mean to say that if this law were in effect they would only pay each year the several amounts that you have given there?

Mr. FLOYD. No; I mean to say that in the eight years they would pay the full $15,000,000, but I mean to say that the difference between $15,000,000 and $11,808,094 would be made up of accumulated interest on money withheld from employees. The railroads would pay each year $1,875,000, but I mean to say that amount would be reduced each year by interest that the railroad companies would collect or derive from money withheld.

Mr. NORRIS. I think that is correct, but you do not mean to say that if this law were in effect they would only pay something over $1,000,000 a year?

Mr. FLOYD. No; that is not my point at all. They will pay in the course of eight years the full $15,000,000.

Mr. NORRIS. Yes.

Mr. FLOYD. That is, the railroad employees will receive it. But I claim that nearly $4,000,000 of it will be derived from interest on the money that the railroad people were withholding from them.

Mr. NORRIS. Then under your analysis they would pay something more—$11,000,000 a year instead of $10,000,000 that they pay now—would they not?

Mr. FLOYD. They would pay actually of their own money, ignoring this question of interest, $11,808,094.

Mr. NORRIS. What I mean is, that that would be the total sum of those figures you have given, $11,000,000, and something over?

Mr. FLOYD. That would be the total.

Mr. DODDS. That would be the present worth of what they would be required to pay. That is, they would be required to pay $15,000,000 instead of $10,000,000?

Mr. FLOYD. That is it. That would be the present worth of what they were required to pay.

There is another point about it. I contend that it is not going to cost the railroads this increased amount of money. They will recoup from interest on the money of employees nearly $4,000,000 of such increase. But the entire body of those injured employees are not going to survive for the period of eight years. Many of them are going to die from the result of their injuries and other causes, and whenever one of them dies his compensation ceases, and the railroad company will be saved an indeterminable sum in that way.

Mr. NORRIS. Here is another point I think we ought to consider, Mr. Floyd. You have not given credit there for any hospital expenses, and such items as that that they have to pay under this law, have you?

Mr. FLOYD. No, sir.

Mr. NORRIS. It is not counted in this?

Mr. FLOYD. No; I have not given attention to that. I have tried to analyze this one naked proposition, assuming the estimate, $15,000,000, to be correct.

Mr. DAVIS. I think the answer to that is this: You start with the premise that the estimate given the committee of $15,000,000 is entirely correct.

Mr. FLOYD. I am not assuming that it is correct at all.

Mr. DAVIS. You must, in making that comparison.

Mr. FLOYD. Yes; for purposes of calculation.

Mr. DAVIS. Everybody admits that it is purely a matter of opinion. There is no actuarial basis on which that can be fixed. If it should transpire that the railroad companies are not paying out under this law what they should pay, then there will happen what, in my judgment, will sooner or later happen anyway, perhaps before the law has been in force any great length of time, and that is an increase in the rates under the schedule. My answer to your proposition would be—and I am not entirely satisfied myself that the rates given in that schedule are correct—that as long as there are some statistics on which to base it it must in all fairness be kept down to a reasonable minimum until the statistics are present to show what it is.

Mr. FLOYD. In reply to that, I would suggest that that is merely an assumption, and, in my opinion, under these schedules, as provided in this bill, the railroad employees will not and can not by any possibility recover nearly so much as the $10,000,000 a year which they recover now, because under existing law practically all defenses are cut off except those provided for in this bill.

Mr. DAVIS. What do you think will happen when they make that appear to a committee of Congress?

Mr. NORRIS. They would increase the compensation.

Mr. FLOYD. Sure they would increase the compensation. I am in favor of that. If I support his bill at all, I am in favor of increasing the maximum compensation on every item. The Senate just the other day allowed a girl $8,000 for losing her scalp, and $4,800 is the premium put upon a life by this bill.

The most serious objection I have to this bill is that it is not optional, but is made the exclusive remedy and repeals all existing liability laws on the subject. I desire to argue that question quite at length, and I want to show from the records of some of these organizations that their representatives, who have been appearing before us regarding this legislation and urging its passage, have not reflected what I understand to be the wishes of the rank and file of laboring people on that question.

Mr. GRAHAM. You contend that it should be optional?

Mr. FLOYD. Optional; yes. I am opposed to disturbing the Federal liability law of 1908 as amended by the supplemental act of 1910. I want to give my reasons for taking this position. You will recall that during the course of the hearings, when Mr. BRANTLEY was before the committee, that I stated to Mr. BRANTLEY that if he would strike out section 3 and leave it optional with the employee to seek compensation under this act or under our liability laws that all my objections to the passage of this bill would cease; that I would never say another word against it.

Mr. NORRIS. Of course. I think this is true on that point, Mr. FLOYD, that if we do make it optional, then the reason for increasing the compensation named in the bill has disappeared, practically, has it not?

Mr. FLOYD. I did not catch that question, Mr. NORRIS.

Mr. NORRIS. I say if we do make this optional, then the reason that many of us think exists now for increasing the compensation named in the bill would disappear at once, because the class of employees who would sue under the law would be that class to whom negligence could not be attributed, I take it, and those who would come under the law would be those who could not recover if the law did not exist. And it is conceded that if we can make a distinction between those two classes the man who is not negligent ought to get more than the man who is.

Mr. FLOYD. If it is made optional, there would be no occasion for changing the rates of compensation fixed in the bill.

Mr. DAVIS. I desire to ask Mr. FLOYD what he is going to contend in discussing the question as to the time when the electional remedy should be made, whether before or after the occurrence of the injury?

Mr. FLOYD. I would say after the occurrence of the injury; and I have some amendments prepared which make the provision in section 3 optional, and provide that when the party desires to seek compensation under this bill, and takes the initial step for compensation under the bill, he thereby waives his right under the liability laws, and that the filing of a suit under the liability laws shall be deemed a waiver of his right to claim compensation under this act. He should be required to put himself in one class or the other when he commences an action to recover damages for the injury incurred.

Mr. DAVIS. I understand the New Jersey system to be that 60 days at least before the occurrence of the injury he must elect the status.

Mr. FLOYD. Before I conclude for to-day I wish to put in the record a matter for you to study and consider. The representatives of organized labor have been here. The leaders have been here asking us to pass this legislation. In my State railroad employees were forbidden to make any comments on this legislation until the day the bill passed the Senate. The day the bill passed the Senate the lodges in my State, the locals, were notified that they might then say what they pleased about the compensation bill, and protest after protest, which I will not take time to read, but which I will put in the record, I have here, and the protests are universal in so far as the people of my State and the railroad employees of my State are concerned.

Here is what purports to be, and I presume it is, genuine Circular of Instructions No. A–22, Grand Lodge, Brotherhood of Railroad Trainmen, office of president, Cleveland, Ohio, June 19, 1911. Here is the legislative committee's report on workmen's compensation. It is as follows:

"We recommend that the convention go on record as favoring the adoption of strong liability laws in every State, Province, and Territory, eliminating the common-law doctrine of fellow servant, assumed risk, and contributory negligence. We also favor the principle of workmen's compensation, but, realizing the narrow limits of our national and State constitutions, we urge all persons having to do with legislation to concentrate their efforts in behalf of an employers' liability law, believing as we do that such a law will prove a solid foundation upon which to build up a system of workmen's compensation laws.

"Moved by Baker (186) and Waid (420) that the report of the committee be adopted. It was discussed by Feick (158), President Lee, Overhiser (416), Reese (438), McKinley (206), and President Lee. Motion to adopt report of the committee carried."

Whence comes the demand to repeal all existing liability laws? It certainly does not come from an organization which reflects the sentiments embodied in that legislative report and adopted by the Brotherhood of Railroad Trainmen.

I believe, if it is the pleasure of the committee, that I will postpone expressing my views on other points until our next meeting.

Thereupon the committee adjourned.

COMMITTEE ON THE JUDICIARY,
HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,
Washington, D. C., Tuesday, January 21, 1913.

The committee this day met at 10.30 o'clock a. m., Mr. EDWIN Y. WEBB (acting chairman) presiding.

STATEMENT OF HON. JOHN C. FLOYD, OF ARKANSAS.

The CHAIRMAN. Gentlemen, if the committee will come to order we will proceed with Mr. FLOYD'S continued argument against the compensation bill.

Mr. FLOYD. Mr. Chairman, there is only one other general proposition pertaining to this bill that I desire to discuss. I stated the proposition at the conclusion of my remarks on yesterday. My chief and principal objection to this bill, which is fundamental, is to that provision which repeals all employer's liability laws on the subject—Federal and State—and makes this proposed law afford the sole and exclusive remedy for railroad employees in damage suits in personal-injury cases.

The CHAIRMAN. That is embodied in section 3.

Mr. STERLING. In interstate commerce.

Mr. FLOYD. Yes; in interstate commerce; thank you.

Mr. STERLING. It does not affect State laws.

Mr. FLOYD. I think it does affect State laws in a way, because under the present laws we have a right to bring suit in the State courts.

Mr. STERLING. Yes; in interstate commerce; and it does affect State laws in regard to that.

Mr. FLOYD. I am not sure about that. It declares on its face that it shall be the sole and exclusive remedy in these personal-injury cases.

Mr. NORRIS. But isn't it true that Congress has no jurisdiction as to intrastate law?

Mr. FLOYD. The Supreme Court has so held in passing on the liability act of 1906, which was held unconstitutional; but we are dealing with a legislative proposition now, and, while the Supreme Court has so held, Congress, by the wording of the bill referred to, had undertaken to do that very thing.

Mr. NORRIS. In that bill you have made reference to.

Mr. FLOYD. But that is immaterial for the purpose of my argument. My objection to this bill is on the ground—a fact which is not disputed by anyone—that it seeks to repeal all of our existing Federal employers' liability laws in their entirety. It wipes out Federal employers' liability laws in toto and affords to railroad employees under the provisions of this new law their sole and exclusive remedy for compensation or damages for personal injuries received while engaged in interstate commerce.

Mr. NORRIS. I think that is right.

Mr. FLOYD. That much is absolutely conceded by everybody. Now, that I object to. I think it would be a serious mistake on our part to destroy the substantial remedies which railroad employees now enjoy and substitute therefor a new, untried, and experimental law like the one now proposed. It goes further, and indirectly repeals every safety-appliance act that the Congress of the United States has heretofore passed. It does not expressly repeal safety-appliance acts, but it in effect relieves the railroad companies from the penalties imposed in damage suits in case they fail to comply with the requirements of such acts.

Mr. GRAHAM. Make that clear, Judge.

Mr. FLOYD. Yes. The penalty imposed in the safety-appliance acts of Congress upon the railroad companies for their failure to comply with the requirements of these acts is that they are subjected to and made liable for damages in all cases, regardless of the fault of the employee—just as it is proposed they shall be subjected to and made liable for damages in cases under this bill, regardless of the fault or negligence of the employee. What is the effect? When we pass this bill, when we provide that injured employees shall receive a like sum for like injuries, regardless of their negligence or fault, what reason is there for railroad companies to go to great expense in order to meet the several requirements imposed on them by Congress in these safety-appliance acts?

Mr. STERLING. Penalties will exist just the same.

Mr. FLOYD. Yes; but what will it amount to? The real penalty imposed in such acts is that the railroad companies which fail to comply with the safety-appliance acts shall have no defense against an employee who is injured in their service. Express provisions in these statutes take away from noncomplying companies all their defenses when actions are brought against them in personal-injury cases.

Mr. NORRIS. Isn't there any other penalty in that connection? Can we compel them to comply?

Mr. STERLING. That is not in the safety-appliance act; it is in the employers' liability bill.

Mr. FLOYD. Isn't it in the safety-appliance act? I think it is. I don't know of any graver penalty; do you?

Mr. STERLING. There is no failure to comply with the law.

Mr. FLOYD. What is the penalty?

Mr. STERLING. I don't know what it is.

Mr. FLOYD. It is that all defenses are taken away from the railroad companies, and they can't plead the negligence or other fault of the employee when actions are brought against them for damages for personal injuries.

Mr. STERLING. Is that in the safety-appliance act or in the liability act or law?

Mr. FLOYD. I so understand it; such provision is in our safety-appliance acts and in the employers' liability act also.

Mr. NORRIS. That would be necessary there; but do you mean to say, if we passed this bill, for instance, the law that provides there shall be air on the trains can be disregarded?

Mr. FLOYD. It can be disregarded entirely, and no additional penalty would be imposed upon the railroad company by reason of that failure, because, if a man is injured under this new law he will get the same compensation whether he is negligent or otherwise.

Mr. NORRIS. But does the law provide for its enforcement, so far as the liability is concerned?

Mr. FLOYD. I am not sure as to that; I don't deny that proposition; but I am speaking of this penalty that is imposed in addition to any fine that may be imposed upon them, and this additional penalty, if the law is complied with, will cost the railroad companies millions of dollars in excess of any fines that will be imposed on them for failure to comply with those laws; because it is this additional penalty which I am dealing with that takes away from the railroad company any defense whatsoever, and leaves the railroad employee injured by reason of their failure to comply with these safety-appliance acts in the precise position in which you are proposing to put all railroad employees under this bill. I think this raises a question we should seriously consider. If I am in error I shall be glad to be corrected. I have the safety-appliance acts before me, and that is the way I construe them in regard to liability in damage suits as to the additional penalty. The fact that a fine may be imposed also in no way affects the soundness of my position.

Mr. STERLING. Your proposition, Mr. Floyd, amounts to this: They could not plead negligence, as they can now, where the injury results from the failure to comply with the safety-appliance acts.

Mr. FLOYD. Yes. It amounts to that proposition; it simply deprives them of their ordinary defenses in personal-injury suits.

Mr. STERLING. They can't plead negligence now.

Mr. FLOYD. It amounts to this, that the railroad company is deprived of any defense if it fails to comply with the safety-appliance acts and an employee is injured by reason of that failure.

Mr. STERLING. Practically no defense.

Mr. FLOYD. Practically no defense. Hence there would be no difference to the railroad companies so far as damage suits are concerned whether they complied with such laws or whether they did not if we pass this compensation act.

Mr. NORRIS. As far as damage for injury to an employee is concerned that is right.

Mr. HIGGINS. Have you the safety-appliance act here, Mr. Floyd?

Mr. FLOYD. Yes; there it is. That is all I desire to say on that particular proposition.

Now, it is insisted that we ought not to eliminate section 3—we ought not to make this proposed law optional; and it has been insisted before our committee by various advocates of the measure that we ought to follow the precedent found in the laws of European countries and be guided by the enlightened judgment of the Old World in this compensation legislation. Now, most of the laws pertaining to this subject in continental Europe are insurance propositions—compulsory insurance laws in which the employee is compelled to contribute from his earnings a certain stipulated amount from time to time, which goes into the insurance fund out of which he is paid in case of injury or accident; so the advocates of this measure can find no precedent in those insurance laws for this particular bill and the particular provisions that are embodied in this bill.

So let us consider the compensation acts proper that have been adopted in other countries and see how they compare with this proposed law. I had some difficulty—I don't know whether you gentlemen did or not—in finding in the report the compensation laws of other countries, because in the citation found in the report of the commission there is an error in part. The citation gives the Twenty-fourth Annual Report of the Commissioner of Labor, 1910, as including those laws. The error is in "1910." It should be "1909." In the Twenty-fourth Annual Report of the Commissioner of Labor of 1909 foreign insurance and compensation laws are printed in full.

Mr. STERLING. Mr. FLOYD, don't you think this would develop a complete insurance policy among the railroads of the country? It would have this advantage, that the employees would not be obliged to contribute to that. The railroads would undoubtedly indemnify themselves by insurance just as soon as this goes into effect.

Mr. FLOYD. That might be; I am not prepared to answer that question or controvert it. But I want to compare this proposed law with compensation laws in other countries and see where we must look for any precedent for it. I will not take time to read them in full, but I want to submit extracts from a number of those laws.

I submit an extract from the Alberta workman's compensation act, 1908, and I will read in this connection the optional clause only, and print the whole section:

"(b) When the injury was caused by the personal negligence or wilful act of the employer or of some person for whose act or default the employer is responsible, nothing in this act shall affect any civil liability of the employer; but in that case the workman may, at his option, either claim compensation under this act or take proceedings independently of this act; but the employer shall not be liable to pay compensation for injury to a workman by accident arising out of and in the course of the employment both independently of and also under this act, and shall not be liable to any proceedings independently of this act except in case of such personal negligence or willful act aforesaid."

Now, there you have an optional clause such that, if substituted for section 3 of this bill, would preserve intact our present employers' liability laws and would meet with my hearty approval. I do not think the remedy ought to be cumulative; I do not think the employee ought to have the right to seek compensation under an act such as is proposed here and at the same time have the right, as an additional cumulative remedy, to go into court under our liability laws and get redress there also.

Mr. HIGGINS. Would you be willing, Mr. Floyd, to let the employee make his option at the time of his employment?

Mr. FLOYD. I would not, under any circumstances. I think he ought to be given the right to exercise his option after the action accrues, and in an amendment I have prepared to section 3 it is provided that when he files his petition for compensation under this act, he waives his right to claim damages under the employers' liability act, and when he files a suit under the employers' liability act, he waives his right to compensation under this act.

Mr. NORRIS. Judge, I want to ask you a question about the Alberta law that you have just read. That is just a little different from what most of the people want who claim, like you do, that a man ought to have his option. I will say I agree with you if he has an option, he ought to have a right to exercise it after the injury. But you will notice that Alberta act provides that this right to sue the company only exists where the company is negligent or some employee is negligent for whose acts the company is liable. Now, if the employee would, we will say, decide to pursue the remedy provided in that exception in that law you have read, and it should be determined at the end of the suit that the company was not negligent; then he would fail, wouldn't he?

Mr. FLOYD. Certainly.

Mr. NORRIS. Now, in that case he would not have any remedy whatever, would he? He would be cut out entirely.

Mr. FLOYD. He would, and I don't think it would be unjust. If you give an employee two remedies and he selects the wrong one he must abide the consequences. I know of no way to guarantee rights and at the same time obviate the possibility of errors.

Mr. NORRIS. There might be a case now where the company is liable, and he might think they were negligent and commence his action on that theory, and the evidence might develop conclusively that they were not negligent; then the employee would be cut off from compensation.

Mr. FLOYD. I will not take issue with you as to that. It might easily happen.

Mr. NORRIS. It would be dangerous, it seems to me.

Mr. FLOYD. And in some of these optional clauses in foreign acts a provision is made, as you suggest, that if the employee fails in his action under liability laws, he may seek his remedy under the compensation act; that is, if he fails under the first, he may seek his remedy under the other, notwithstanding. But I am not inclined to that view. I do not believe an employee ought to be permitted to have cumulative remedies in such cases.

Mr. GRAHAM. But the policy you have laid down would be a departure from the theory underlying this bill—a theory of public policy—that the man should get something. In that case he would get nothing.

Mr. FLOYD. The injured employee is given the right to get something under the law. But you can't frame a law that will protect the injured man, or any other claimant, in all his rights under all circumstances and in every contingency. He may have a claim under the compensation act and may neglect to put in his claim and he would get nothing although he had a just cause. It would be difficult, indeed, if not impossible, to frame any law that would guarantee any man all his rights and at the same time protect him against loss in unforeseen contingencies that may arise.

Mr. WEBB. It seems to me the Alberta law would induce more employees to take compensation under the compensation bill. If there were any doubt of the right of the injured employee to recover on the ground of negligence of the railroad company or employer, he would not take any chances; he would seek his remedy under the compensation act.

Mr. HIGGINS. Under the common law are not the rights of the employee preserved?

Mr. FLOYD. I assume so.

Mr. GRAHAM. If he seeks his remedy at law he would have to assume all the common-law provisions. If he resorted to the common law he has to take it as he finds it.

Mr. THOMAS. Referring to your statement, I would like to call attention to the further penalty provided of $100 a day in addition to the penalties you have stated.

Mr. STERLING. That is for our record.

Mr. FLOYD. Put that statement in the record. I had not looked up the matter of fines, having investigated specially the penalty imposed in damage suits.

Now, I submit, without reading it in full, the Alberta workman's compensation act, section 3:

"Alberta.

"[Workman's compensation act, 1908.]

"LIABILITY OF EMPLOYERS TO WORKMEN FOR INJURIES.

"SEC. 3. If in any employment to which this act applies personal injury by accident arising out of and in the course of the employment is caused to a workman, his employer shall, subject as hereinafter mentioned, be liable to pay compensation in accordance with the first schedule to this act.

"(2) Provided, That—

"(a) The employer shall not be liable under this act in respect of any injury which does not disable the workman for a period of at least two weeks from earning full wages at the work at which he was employed.

"(b) When the injury was caused by the personal negligence or willful act of the employer or of some person for whose act or default the employer is responsible, nothing in this act shall affect any civil liability of the employer; but in that case the workman may, at his option, either claim compensation under this act or take proceedings independently of this act; but the employer shall not be liable to pay compensation for injury to a workman by accident arising out of and in the course of the employment both independently of and also under this act, and shall not be liable to any proceedings independently of this act, except in case of such personal negligence or willful act as aforesaid.

"(c) If it is proved that the injury to a workman is attributable to the serious and willful misconduct of that workman, any compensation claimed in respect of that injury shall, unless the injury results in death or permanent disablement, be disallowed.

"(3) If any question arises in any proceedings under this act as to the liability to pay compensation under this act, including any question as to whether the employment is one to which this act applies, or as to whether the person injured is a workman to whom this act applies, or as to the amount or duration of compensation under this act the question, if not settled by agreement, shall, subject to the provisions of the first schedule to this act, be settled by arbitration, in accordance with the second schedule to this act.

"(4) If within the time hereinafter in this act limited for taking proceedings an action is brought to recover damages independently of this act for injury caused by any accident, and it is determined in such action that the injury is one for which the employer is not liable in such action, but that he would have been liable to pay compensation under the provisions of this act, the action shall be dismissed; but the court in which the action is tried shall, if the plaintiff so choose, proceed to assess such compensation, but may deduct from such compensation all or part of the costs which, in its judgment, have been caused by the plaintiff bringing the action instead of proceeding under this act. In any proceeding under this subsection when the court assesses the compensation, it shall give a certificate of the compensation it has awarded and the directions it has given as to the deduction for costs, and such certificate shall have the force and effect of an award under this act." (Report of Commissioner of Labor, 1909, pp. 2436–2437.)

Mr. FLOYD. I also submit, without reading it, an extract from the British Columbia workmen's compensation act, 1902, containing the same optional provision found in the Alberta law:

"British Columbia.

"[Workmen's compensation act, 1902.]

"1. This act may be cited as the 'Workmen's compensation act, 1902.'

"2. (1) If in any employment to which this act applies personal injury by accident arising out of and in the course of the employment is caused to a workman, his employer shall, subject as hereinafter mentioned, be liable to pay compensation in accordance with the first schedule to this act:

"(2) Provided, That—

"(a) The employer shall not be liable under this act in respect of any injury which does not disable the workman for a period of at least two weeks from earning full wages at the work at which he was employed;

"(b) When the injury was caused by the personal negligence or willful act of the employer or of some person for whose act or default the employer is responsible, nothing in this act shall affect any civil liability of the employer, but in that case the workman may, at his option, either claim compensation under this act or take the same proceedings as were open to him before the commencement of this act; but the employer shall not be liable to pay compensation for injury to a workman by accident arising out of and in the course of the employment both independently of and also under this act, and shall not be liable to any proceedings independently of this act except in case of such personal negligence or willful act as aforesaid;

"(c) If it is proved that the injury to a workman is attributable solely to the serious and willful misconduct or serious neglect of that workman, any compensation claimed in respect of that injury shall be disallowed.

"(3) If any question arises in any proceedings under this act as to the liability to pay compensation under this act (including any question as to whether the employment is one to which this act applies) or as to the amount or duration of compensation under this act, the question, if not settled by agreement, shall, subject to the provisions of the first schedule to this act, be settled by arbitration in accordance with the second schedule to this act.

"(4) If, within the time hereinafter in this act limited for taking proceedings, an action is brought to recover damages independently of this act for injury caused by any accident and it is determined in such action that the injury is one for which the employer is not liable in such action, but that he would have been liable to pay compensation under the provisions of this act, the action shall be dismissed; but the court in which the action is tried shall, if the plaintiff shall so choose, proceed to assess such compensation and shall be at liberty to deduct from such compensation all the costs which, in its judgment, have been caused by the plaintiff bringing this action instead of proceeding under this act. In any proceeding under this subsection when the court assesses the compensation it shall give a certificate of the compensation it has awarded and the directions it has given as to the deduction for costs, and such certificate shall have the force and effect of an award under this act.

"(5) Nothing in this act shall affect any proceedings for a fine under the enactments relating to mines and other industries or the application of any such fine, but if any such fine or any part thereof has been applied for the benefit of the person injured the amount so applied shall be taken into account in estimating the compensation under this act. (60 and 61 Vict. (Imp.) 1897, c. 37, s. 1.)

"3. (1) Proceedings for the recovery under this act of compensation for an injury shall not be maintained unless notice of the accident has been given as soon as practicable after the happening thereof and before the workman has voluntarily left the employment in which he was injured, and unless the claim for compensation with respect to such accident has been made within six months from the occurrence of the accident causing the injury, or in case of death, within six months from time of death: Provided always, That the want of or any defect or inaccuracy in such notice shall not be a bar to the maintenance of such proceedings if it is found in the proceedings for settling the claim that the employer is not prejudiced in his defense by the want, defect, or inaccuracy or that such want, defect, or inaccuracy was occasioned by mistake or other reasonable cause." (Report of the Commissioner of Labor, 1909, pp. 2467–2468.)

Mr. FLOYD. I now submit an extract from the laws of the Cape of Good Hope workman's compensation act, 1905, section 22, making that statute optional:

"[Workman's compensation act, 1905.]

"SEC. 22. If any workman become permanently totally incapacitated for work by reason of a personal injury, for which an employer or principal is liable to pay compensation under the provisions of this act, such workman shall, subject to the provisions of sections 29, 30, and 31 of this act, and in addition to the provisional order, have a right of action in the magistrate's court of the district in which he received such injury, against the employer or principal for the recovery of a sum not exceeding three years' wages at the rate of wages drawn by such workman at the time of the injury, less any wages received under any provisional order as hereinbefore mentioned, provided such sum shall not exceed £600 [$2,919.90] in all. Regard shall be had in fixing such amount to the workman's necessities." (Report of the Commissioner of Labor, 1909, p. 2476.)

Mr. FLOYD. Now, I submit an extract from the laws of Denmark, of January 7, 1898, workman's insurance, article 12. The act is optional in regard to this insurance provision:

"Denmark.

"[Law of Jan. 7, 1898, workman's insurance.]

"ART. 12. If a workman or his survivors have claimed or received money payments in accordance with the provisions of the present law, he or they shall have thereby waived the right to make at the same time or subsequently a claim against the employer or others under the other existing laws concerning legal claims for damages. If, on the other hand, an injured workman or the survivors of a deceased workman have made a claim against the employer or others under these general laws, above mentioned, he or they may not, at that time, appeal to the present law or call for a decision from the council, nor subsequently, unless the council, after becoming acquainted with the details of the case and after receiving a petition, shall give its consent." (Report of Commissioner of Labor, pp. 2479–2480.)

Now, I submit an extract from the laws of France, act of July, 1907——

Mr. HIGGINS. Mr. FLOYD, under the Denmark statute the employee has to contribute.

Mr. FLOYD. Yes; but it is not compulsory; it is optional with him whether he so contributes or not, but if he does not he receives no benefit under that statute.

Mr. HIGGINS. But he is subject to the liability law whatever it is.

Mr. GRAHAM. And it practically takes the place of our voluntary associations.

Mr. FLOYD. I submit an extract from the act of July, 1907, France, voluntary affiliation with legislation regarding industrial accidents. The act leaves it to the voluntary act of the employee whether or not he will participate under the provisions of this law:

"France.

"[Act of July, 1907, voluntary affiliation with legislation regarding industrial accidents.]

"ART. 2. The legislation regarding industrial accidents becomes thereafter applicable in full force to all of his workmen, employees, and domestic servants who shall have declared in the pass book (carnet), mentioned in the preceding article, their voluntary affiliation plainly signed and dated by themselves.

"If the workman, employee, or domestic servant does not know how to or can not sign, his declaration of voluntary affiliation shall be received by the mayor, who shall mention the same in the pass book. The same applies to the affiliation of minors and married women, without necessity for them to obtain the consent for this purpose of the father, guardian, or husband." (Report of the Commissioner of Labor, 1909, pp. 2507–2508.)

Mr. FLOYD. I submit an extract from the laws of Great Britain, workmen's compensation act of 1906. This contains the same optional provision in the identical language of the Alberta law, Alberta being a Province of Great Britain.

"Great Britain.

"[Workmen's compensation act of 1906.]

"An act to consolidate and amend the law with respect to compensation to workmen for injuries suffered in the course of their employment [21st December, 1906].

"*Be it enacted by * * * Parliament assembled, and by the authority of the same, as follows:*

"1. (1) If in any employment personal injury by accident arising out of and in the course of the employment is caused to a workman, his employer shall, subject as hereinafter mentioned, be liable to pay compensation in accordance with the first schedule to this act.

"(2) Provided that—

"(a) The employer shall not be liable under this act in respect of any injury which does not disable the workman for a period of at least one week from earning full wages at the work at which he was employed.

"(b) When the injury was caused by the personal negligence or willful act of the employer or of some person for whose act or default the employer is responsible, nothing in this act shall affect any civil liability of the employer, but in that case the workman may, at his option, either claim compensation under this act or take proceedings independently of this act; but the employer shall not be liable to pay compensation for injury to a workman by accident arising out of and in the course of the employment both independently of and also under this act, and shall not be liable to any proceedings independently of this act, except in case of such personal negligence or willful act as aforesaid.

"(c) If it is proved that the injury to a workman is attributable to the serious and willful misconduct of that workman, any compensation claimed in respect of that injury shall, unless the injury results in death or serious and permanent disablement, be disallowed." (Report of the Commissioner of Labor, 1909, p. 2553.)

Mr. GRAHAM. Which was earlier, the British law or the Alberta law?

Mr. FLOYD. The notation on the extracts submitted will show when each was adopted. I don't have in mind now which was the earlier statute, but the date of each act is noted on the papers delivered to the stenographer. I submit an extract from the law of the Netherlands relating to legal insurance of workingmen.

Mr. STERLING. That does not apply to railroads, Mr. FLOYD, does it?

Mr. FLOYD. It applies to railroads and also to other industrial corporations, as I understand.

Mr. STERLING. All employees of labor, practically.

Mr. FLOYD. I think a general distinction between those foreign laws and our laws is that they include a great many industries in addition to railroads—practically all of the industrial corporations and concerns of the country.

Mr. STERLING. That applies to all the insurance acts of other countries?

Mr. GRAHAM. There is not any reason there for confining it to railroads as there is here.

"The Netherlands.

"[Law of Jan. 2, 1901, relating to legal insurance of workingmen.]

"AS TO THE EFFECT OF THE INSURANCE UPON THE CIVIL LAW.

"ART. 87. The civil liability of the employer for pecuniary damages sustained by an insured workman in the course of his employment ceases under reservation of the provisions of the next paragraph and of article 88, as well as with the further reservation that the liability extends to damages done to the property of the person injured by the accident.

"Should an insured person whose daily earnings exceed 4 florins [$1.61] meet with an accident while at work, the liability of the employer remains; the court, however, in estimating the compensation, must take into consideration what has already been awarded to the plaintiff by reason of this law.

"ART. 88. The civil liability of the employer arising out of articles 1406 and 1407 of the Civil Code is not removed if the insured person has met with an accident and the head or director of the establishment is duly convicted for a violation of any of the provisions in titles 7, 19, 20, and 21 of book 2 of the Penal Code.

"If the head or director of the establishment is convicted by default by a judge on account of any of the violations referred to in the preceding paragraph, the civil liability mentioned in articles 1406 and 1407 of the Civil Code shall not be invoked before six months of the date of such judgment by default, unless the head or director of the establishment has filed an appeal before such time.

"ART. 89. The Royal Insurance Bank acquires the right to the amount which the insured person or his surviving relatives may derive from articles 1406 and 1407 of the Civil Code.

"Every settlement with regard to these rights which the insured person or any of his surviving relatives makes without the intervention of the board of directors of the Royal Insurance Bank shall be null and void." (Report of the Commissioner of Labor, 1909, p. 2656.)

Mr. FLOYD. Now I submit an extract from the laws of South Australia, workmen's compensation act of 1900. Paragraph G makes it optional.

"South Australia.

"[Workmen's compensation act, 1900.]

"1. This act may be cited as 'The workmen's compensation act of 1900.'

"2. In this act—

"'Dependents' means the wife, husband, parent, grandparent, child, grandchild, and stepchild of a workman wholly or in part dependent upon his earnings at the time of his death.

"'Employer' includes any body of persons, corporate or unincorporate, and the legal personal representative of a deceased employer.

"'Engineering work' means any work of construction or alteration or repair of a railroad, harbor, dock, canal, sewer, or tunnel, telegraph, telephone, or electric power, and includes any other work for the construction, alteration, or repair of which machinery driven by steam, water, or other mechanical power is used.

"'Factory' means any manufactory, workshop, workroom, or premises wherein or whereon manual labor is exercised for the purpose of gain in or incidental to the making, altering, or repairing any article by way of trade or for purpose of gain for sale, and includes any ship or boat in port, dock, wharf, quay, or warehouse, so far as relates to machinery and plant in the process of loading or unloading therefrom or thereto, and every laundry worked by steam, water, or other mechanical power.

"'Injury' means personal injury or loss of life by accident arising out of and in course of employment or injury to health or loss of life arising out of or consequent upon any employment declared by proclamation to be dangerous to health or dangerous to life or limb: Provided, That no such proclamation shall issue except on addresses of both Houses of Parliament.

"'Proclamation' means proclamation by the governor in the Government Gazette.

"'Workman' includes every person who is engaged in an employment to which this act applies, whether by way of manual labor or otherwise, and whether his agreement is one of service or apprenticeship or otherwise, and is expressed or implied, is oral or in writing, and includes seaman and the personal representative and the dependents of a deceased workman.

"3. This act applies only to injuries to workmen employed by employers—

"(i) On or in or about a railway, waterwork, tramway, electric-lighting work, factory, mine, quarry, or engineering or building work.

"(ii) On or in or about any employment declared by proclamation to be dangerous or injurious to health or dangerous to life or limb: Provided, That no such proclamation shall issue except pursuant to addresses of both Houses of Parliament.

"4. When personal injury arising out of and in the course of his employment is caused to a workman his employer shall be liable to pay compensation, except in the following cases:

"(a) When the injury is attributable to the serious and willful misconduct of the workman injured, and to no other cause; or

"(b) When the workman is not disabled for at least one week from earning full wages at the work in which he was employed.

"5. The compensation for which an employer shall be liable pursuant to the preceding section shall be subject to the scale and conditions in the first schedule.

"6. (1) Where personal injury is caused to a workman by the personal negligence or willful act of his employer, or of some person for whose act or default such employer is responsible, such workman may, at his option, either claim compensation under this act or take proceedings to recover compensation independently of this act.

"(2) No employer shall be liable to pay compensation both under this act and independently of this act. (Report of Commissioner of Labor, 1909, p. 2699.)

Mr. FLOYD. I submit an extract from the law of Sweden, the law of July 5, 1901, relating to compensation for injury resulting from industrial accidents.

Mr. HIGGINS. Do these extracts just relate to the optional feature?

Mr. FLOYD. Some of them do, and some of them embody the entire section in which the optional feature appears. But I cite the particular page in the commissioner's report in which you can find the full body of each of the acts referred to.

Mr. STERLING. Are you citing those countries where it is not optional—in these extracts?

Mr. FLOYD. No, sir; I am citing those where the law is optional and am not citing all of the insurance laws. I will make a statement in regard to other acts not cited at the conclusion.

Mr. GRAHAM. Are you citing the State laws in the United States?

Mr. FLOYD. No, sir; I have not gone into that.

Mr. HOUSTON. Do you state how many different countries have the optional feature and how many have not?

Mr. FLOYD. I could not state it offhand, but I think I have here in these different papers extracts from the laws of practically all foreign countries where the optional provision appears in the law; I am not sure as to that, however.

Mr. STERLING. Mr. Floyd, have you read the New York decision declaring the compensation law unconstitutional?

Mr. FLOYD. No, sir; I have not read it.

"Sweden.

"[Law of July 5, 1901, relating to compensation for injury resulting from industrial accidents.]

"ART. 9. If any person has the right to compensation in accordance with this law, he shall not thereby be barred from entering a claim against the employer or other person for indemnity which might be due to him in accordance with the common law or special law: Provided, however, That the employer may deduct from such indemnity the amount of the compensation to which he is liable under this law.

"If a person other than the employer is liable for indemnity, the employer may, after duly suing the person who is liable, receive such indemnity, instead of the person to whom it is due, provided he pays a corresponding compensation in accordance with this law." (Report of the Commissioner of Labor, 1909, p. 2709.)

Mr. FLOYD. Now, I submit an extract from the laws of Switzerland, Federal law, June 25, 1881, article 6, liability laws. Article 2 and article 8 make this law optional.

"Switzerland.

[The Swiss laws here reproduced are not, accurately speaking, compensation laws, but are liability laws of a very inclusive and stringent type, and are published as showing probably the nearest approach to the force and value of a compensation act that can be attained under the form of liability laws.]

[Federal law June 25, 1881, art. 6, liability laws.]

"The court shall determine, after consideration of all the circumstances, the amount of the damages, which, however, in the most serious cases (arts. 1 and 3) shall not exceed six times the annual earnings of the employee or workman, and shall in no case exceed the sum of 6,000 francs [$1,158].

"The court is not restricted to this maximum when the injury or death was caused by any act of the employer which would render him liable to a criminal prosecution.

"The costs of medical treatment, maintenance, and burial are not to be included in the above maximum."

[Federal law of Mar. 28, 1905, relating to the civil liability of railways, steamboats, and the postal service. (Recueil Officiel des Lois et Ordonnances XXI, p. 351.)]

"ARTICLE 1. Every railway shall be liable for damage resulting from the loss of life or injuries sustained by a person in the course of the construction or operation of its lines, or while engaged in accessory work involving railroad risks, unless it is able to prove that the accident was due to superior force [act of God], to the fault of a third party, or to that of the injured person himself.

"No one shall be regarded as a third party within the meaning of the present article who is an officer or employee of the road, engaged either in transportation or in the construction of its lines.

"ART. 2. In case of death, damages paid shall cover expenses, including those of burial. If death does not occur immediately, they shall include the expense of treatment and compensation for loss from disability. When, through the death of the injured person, other persons are deprived of their means of support they shall be likewise compensated for such loss.

"ART. 3. Personal injuries shall entitle the injured person to reimbursement for expenses and to damages for total or partial disability. If the injured person has been mutilated or disfigured in such a way as to interfere with his employment, the judge may also allow him a compensation for such injury.

"ART. 4. When the injured person realized exceptionally high returns from his labor the judge, taking all the circumstances into consideration, may reduce the compensation in such manner as seems just.

"ART. 5. If the accident is in part due to the fault of the injured person, the judge, taking all the circumstances into consideration, may reduce the compensation proportionately.

"ART. 6. There shall be no ground for compensation if the connection with the railway of the person killed or injured was the result of his own criminal act or act of bad faith.

"ART. 7. If the connection with the railway of the person killed or injured arose from his having knowingly violated any police regulation, the judge may reduce the compensation or even absolve the road from all liability.

"ART. 8. In case of negligence of the railway or of the persons named in paragraph 2 or article 1, the judge, considering the particular circumstances, especially when fraud or gross negligence has been shown, may allow to the injured party, or in case of death to his family, an equitable sum, independent of reparation for actual damages.

"ART. 9. The compensation may be allowed in a capital sum, or as a pension, or in a capital sum combined with a pension. The judge may determine freely the method of payment without being bound by the opinions of the parties. He shall take, whenever necessary, proper measures to insure the payment of the pension." (Report of Commissioner of Labor 1909, p. 2716.)

Mr. FLOYD. I submit an extract from the law of the Transvaal workmen's compensation act. I failed to get the date of that. Section 4 embodies an optional feature.

"Transvaal.

"[Workmen's compensation act.]

"PROVISIONAL ORDER TO RECOVER PERIODICAL PAYMENTS OF COMPENSATION.

"SEC. 3. Save as in section 2 is provided, if personal injury is caused by any accident to a workman necessitating his absence from work for a longer period than one week, the employer and every principal shall be liable to pay to such workman compensation as in section 7 is provided.

"SEC. 4. (1) Any such workman who is desirous of obtaining compensation under this act shall give or cause to be given notice of such injury, at his option, either to his employer or to any principal. Such notice shall be given within 14 days of the injury, and if not given within such period no compensation shall be payable under this act to a workman unless he shall have obtained from the magistrate of the district in which he received the injury a certificate that the time for giving notice should, having regard to all the circumstances, have been extended. If he shall have obtained such certificate and give notice to the employer or such principal within a period of one week after the receipt of such certificate, the notice of injury shall be deemed to have been given within the time required by this subsection.

"(2) The employer or the principal to whom notice has been given may, on receiving such notice, require the workman to submit himself for examination by a medical practitioner named by the employer or such principal.

"(3) If the employer or such principal shall not, within one week after transmission to him of such notice, agree with the workman for payment of compensation for the injury, the workman may transmit to the clerk of the court of resident magistrate for the district in which such injury was received notice in writing of such injury and of the name of the employer or such principal, and with such notice shall transmit a certificate by a medical practitioner to the effect that, in his opinion, the injury necessitates or has necessitated the workman's absence from work for a longer period than one week. Such clerk shall cause such information and certificate to be at once laid before the magistrate of the said district." (Report of the Commissioner of Labor, 1909, p. 2719.)

Mr. FLOYD. Now, in regard to those countries where the law is compulsory, and where it is not an insurance plan but a compensation plan, I am not able to give you full details as to just what foreign countries have such compulsory laws. I think that that is the case in Germany, but there is a very marked distinction between Germany and the other countries referred to.

Mr. GRAHAM. But is compulsory in Germany.

Mr. FLOYD. It is compulsory in Germany; but there is an economic condition in that country which does not exist in this country or in the other countries referred to. The Government owns the principal part of the railroads in Germany; they have Government ownership of railroads there, and where your claim is against a sovereign you have no recourse except by some compulsory or arbitrary law, because a citizen does not have the right in any country, to my knowledge, to sue the sovereign on a matter of personal damages.

Now, I desire to submit certain protests received from railroad employees of my State against the passage of this bill. I will not ask to read them. I will simply call attention to the different letters in such a way as to identify them and will have them printed in full in the record. First, I submit a letter from Mr. W. W. Dunn, secretary of the Order of Railway Conductors, dated Little Rock, Ark., May 12, 1912, protesting against this legislation, and in connection with it I desire to submit and have printed my letter in reply, in which I call attention to certain minor objections to this bill which I have not discussed before the committee.

Mr. GRAHAM. Do you know the attitude of the organization he represents is the same now as it was when that was written?

Mr. FLOYD. It is the same, only stronger against it.

ORDER OF RAILWAY CONDUCTORS,
Little Rock, Ark., May 12, 1912.

Hon. J. C. FLOYD,
Congressman, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: As representative of approximately 1,000 conductors in the State of Arkansas, wish to register an emphatic objection to the so-called employers' liability and workmen's compensation act. The bill, framed as at present, is the worst piece of legislation to railroad through Congress that the men have ever had to fight. It has not one redeeming feature; it is all bad.

After years of struggle we succeeded in getting rid of the fellow servants' assumption of risk and contributory-negligence laws in the employers' liability law passed in 1908, and now the railways are trying to wipe out all those years of earnest effort in this damnable compensation act.

It is not necessary for me to go into the bill with you gentlemen, for no doubt you are more familiar with it than I am; but, for example: I lose a leg on my run to-night; adjusters award me $30 a month; company gives me service at $50 per month; six months, I die; payments stop; my family gets nothing. If I refuse service because I can do better through relatives, influence, or sympathy, payments stop. If I take service at $85 per month somewhere else, that cuts off $15 of my payments. So the system of the bill is all wrong. For the sake of crippled railroad men, their wives and orphans, and justice, defeat or delay this infamous measure.

Yours, truly,

[SEAL.] W. W. DUNN, Secretary.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,
Washington, D. C., May 16, 1912.

Mr. W. W. DUNN,
Secretary Order of Railway Conductors, Little Rock, Ark.

DEAR SIR: I am in receipt of your favor of May 12 protesting against the passage of the so-called employers' liability and workman's compensation bill. As a member of the Judiciary Committee of the House, I have carefully considered this bill and am utterly opposed to it in its present form. I have heretofore been doing and propose to continue to do all I can to prevent favorable action on same by the committee or in the House. I fully concur with you in the several objections you urge to the bill and could add many more. I regard it as a bill in the interest of the railroads and against the interest of employees. I have served in the State legislature and have served a number of terms in Congress, and I regard this as one of the worst legislative propositions that I ever saw brought forward in the name of virtue.

Section 3 repeals every law now on the statute books in favor of workingmen, whether common law, State or Federal law, and provides that the sole and exclusive remedy for injured railroad employees shall be under the provisions of the proposed act.

The employers' liability act passed by Congress in 1908, the validity of which was upheld by the United States Supreme Court only about two months ago, is to be repealed by the passage of this act.

Every administrative feature of the proposed law is in favor of the railroad companies. All trials must be before a Federal court or before an adjuster appointed by the judge of a Federal court. The right to go into a State court and try your case is denied. The right of trial by jury is denied in the first instance, as there is no provision for a jury trial before the adjusters, who to all intents and purposes act in the capacity of judges and perform the functions of courts in adjudicating claims. The only way in which you can secure a trial by jury under the terms of the law is to except to the findings of the adjuster and take your case to the court, where you may demand a jury, and then the case is tried de novo. Hence, a double trial and therefore double costs to protect your rights. The findings of the adjuster are made prima facie correct, and the burden of proof is placed upon the employee. Even then the law limits the amount you may recover to the arbitrary and low rates fixed in the bill. So the jury has no discretion except to cut you down and give you less than the law fixes as the maximum rate of compensation for the particular injury—they can not give you more.

The bill denies to employees freedom of contract. The bill provides that an injured employee may employ counsel, but that the counsel need not be a member of the bar. It provides that any contract made for attorney or counsel fees must be filed with the adjuster, but further provides that the adjuster or the court shall have power to arbitrarily fix the attorney's fee in all cases. This is true even where you have a written contract with the attorney and have filed it with the adjuster.

This power to fix attorney's fees, given to the adjuster and the court, may be abused to the detriment of the laborer in two ways. The adjuster or court can fix the fees so high that no employee, out of the meager allowance under the terms of the bill, can afford to pay them, or can fix them so low that no good or reputable lawyer could afford to take the cases. I will simply say I regard the proposed bill as one of the most unjust, unfair, and outrageous legislative propositions ever presented to Congress, and will further state that you can rest assured that it will have my determined opposition at every stage of its progress, both before the Judiciary Committee and in the House. It is urged here by the advocates of the measure that laboring men and labor organizations all over the country favor it. Such representations are calculated to secure many votes from those who know little about the bill and who are made to believe that employees generally favor the legislation. But I have studied it and know it to be a vicious, bad bill for employees. I am opposed to it, no matter who favors it. I am unwilling to see crippled and maimed employees of our railroads and the near and dependent relatives of those who are killed have the substantial remedies guaranteed to them under the existing law taken away from them and for them to be made destitute and penniless even by their own consent. In its every feature it is a railroad bill, pure and simple, and it ought not to pass.

You are at liberty to use this letter in any way you see fit.

Yours, truly,

J. C. FLOYD.

Mr. FLOYD. Now, I submit a letter from A. N. De Mers, chairman of legislative board, Brotherhood of Locomotive Firemen and Engineers, dated Little Rock, Ark., May 15, 1912, protesting against the passage of this bill in its present form:

LITTLE ROCK, ARK., May 15, 1912.

Hon. J. C. FLOYD,
Congressman, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: It affords me pleasure to write you on behalf of the engineers and firemen, members of our organization, numbering about 2,000, protesting against Senate bill No. 5382, now pending before the House, and known as the exclusive liability and workmen's compensation act.

The title of this act sounds good to hear it spoken, but when you read through this bill you can read between its lines—"mighty trusts." In connection with our protest I desire to say that the laboring people have not the slightest degree of knowledge as to the merits of this bill, they do not know that it repeals all other "liability laws." The few who have had a chance to learn the requirements of this bill are at a loss to believe that Congress would pass this measure without knowing the principles contained therein. The labor leaders who are now advocating this measure are "false prophets," not representing the wishes of the laboring people, but the interest of the "mighty trusts" for personal gain. In repealing the good laws now on the statute books, which stand as a monument to your great work, you would write the darkest page in the history of this country.

I ask you, in the name of our people, to give them a chance to learn what they are to pay for this supposed great compensation law. I ask you not to consider the pleas of the supposed representatives of the working people who are in Washington fighting for this measure, claiming that the laborers want it. I tell you now, and you can show them this letter, they are the hirelings of the mighty trusts, working not for the people but for the undoing of the people; they are lower than the serpent who lays as though dead only to jump and strike you a death blow.

I have not the ability to argue the demerits of this measure as I would like to, yet the position of the men I represent is clear; they don't want this measure; they ask you as their Representative to use your every effort to kill this proposed law; protect the weak, the rich will protect themselves; they have in the past; this you know better than I.

In closing I again ask that you do all in your power to prevent the passage of this bill at this time. If it is good now it will be good later; the working people would rather wait and have a chance to learn something about a matter that is of so much concern to them. Thanking you for your assistance and wishing you every success, I am,

Very truly, yours,

A. N. DE MERS,
Chairman Legislative Board,
Brotherhood of Locomotive Firemen and Engineers.

Mr. FLOYD. Now, I submit a letter from Mr. W. D. Jackson, secretary of the Brotherhood of Railroad Trainmen, Lodge No. 49, dated Little Rock, Ark., May 22, 1912, protesting against the passage of this bill:

LITTLE ROCK, ARK., May 22, 1912.

Hon. J. C. FLOYD,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: In answer to yours concerning the compensation bill will say that the railroad employees of this State appreciate your position on this bill very much, and we urge you to do all within your power to defeat this bill or amend it so it will not repeal our present laws we are now enjoying. If this bill is such a good one for the employees, why not leave the matter elective, so we can get our relief in our State laws if we so desire? I think that the "backers" of this bill know that if the law is made elective and does not repeal our present laws that this law will die of "nonuse."

The by-laws of our organization prohibit us from opposing legislation unless permission is secured from our president, and this permission was withheld from us until the day the bill passed the Senate, giving us no show to enter our protests to our various Senators. The rank and file of the railroad employees of the United States have not the slightest idea of the contents of this bill, and as an illustration as to how well they are informed I will give you one as follows: I was in Pine Bluff last Saturday night and was called into a meeting of the car men's union, and they asked me about this bill, and I asked them the question of how many present had ever seen the bill, and, to my surprise, of the 235 men in the hall not one of them had ever seen the bill. This will give you some idea of how well informed the rank and file of those who will be affected are informed of its contents.

Thanking you for past favors, I beg to remain,

Yours, very respectfully,

W. D. JACKSON,
Secretary Brotherhood of Railroad Trainmen, Lodge No. 49.

Mr. FLOYD. I now submit a letter from Mr. Frank Pace, an attorney, of Little Rock, Ark., dated May 24, 1912, together with an analysis of the bill from his viewpoint. There are certain personal references in that analysis and criticism of the bill which I will omit from the printed record.

Mr. GRAHAM. Just draw your pencil through them.

Mr. FLOYD. I have done so.

MAY 24, 1912.

Hon. J. C. FLOYD,
Member of House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

DEAR MR. FLOYD: I have been carefully considering the workingmen's compensation act that is at present before Congress, and have carefully gone into it in detail for the purpose of determining what its effect would be upon the workingmen were it to become a law, and I have reached the conclusion that it is about the worst piece of legislation, from the workingmen's standpoint, that has ever been presented to Congress.

The railroads are back of this bill, without a doubt, and are urging its passage, because in it they find an advantage more far-reaching than has ever been accorded to them since legislation upon this subject began. Everybody is in favor of a compensation act that would be fair both to the railroads and to the workingmen, and a compensation act that is fair to the workingmen would be adopted by them in preference to the existing laws. The railroads have taken up the sentiment for a compensation act, fixed up this bill to suit themselves, and named it a compensation act, and are trying to put it through Congress before its true meaning and intent and effect can be known. The railroad men in Arkansas, within the past month, have in a measure become aware of the character of this bill, and I can truthfully state that there is not 5 per cent of the railroad workingmen in this State who favor its passage, and any man who supports that measure from our State will forfeit the vote of the entire organization. In fact, they are more unanimous upon this subject than upon any subject that has ever been presented to them since I have been in Little Rock. This but reflects what the workingmen of the entire United States will do when the provisions of this bill are known to them. Up to the present time the measure has been so quietly, rapidly, and silently put before Congress that the real men who are interested have learned but little about it. The workingmen here feel and expressly declare that there is a combination between the railroads and some of their leaders in Washington who have proven false to their trust to push this bill through without giving it that publicity it ought to have and acquainting those who are vitally interested in it with what there is in it. The engineers recently assembled in national convention indorsed it; but this was done through the effort of a few leaders and without a proper understanding of the measure by those who were in convention assembled, but this will be the last convention that will ever indorse it. This summer all of the conventions of the various trainmen's orders will meet, and the matter will be thoroughly thrashed out if the bill does not pass Congress before that time, and you will find the sentiment so strong against it that if the bill is not passed until fall it will never be heard of again.

We have been representing the railroad men of Arkansas since I came to Little Rock, not only in personal-injury suits, but in much of the other business that they have, and naturally they come to us for a discussion and an interpretation of this act; and our opposition to it does not arise from the fact that it may interfere with our practice, because if it were a fair act we would make no opposition to it, and then the argument that has been advanced in Congress that lawyers get one-half of all that is paid to injured employees by the railroad companies is so unreasonable and untrue that it should have no weight with anyone. I made an investigation of that matter, so far as it obtains in our State, and the record for the last year shows that more than 90 per cent of the claims that were paid by the railroads to injured employees was paid without the intervention of a lawyer. Lawyers rarely ever get any cases except those where the railroad company denies all liability, and in cases of that kind, when a lawyer conducts it through all the courts of the State and collects the money, he has earned whatever he charged, even if it be more than one-half of the amount recovered. The effect of recent litigation has been to make the railroad companies pay more liberally the injured employee in 90 per cent of the cases that are settled without the assistance of an attorney.

The Arkansas trainmen would not object to the bill if it were amended, striking out that portion of it making the act exclusive and leave them to pursue their remedy under the law as it now exists, or under the new act, if they prefer it, but under no condition do they want it passed making that their exclusive remedy. They want the matter passed until fall, so that they may have an opportunity to investigate the bill and be heard upon it before it is finally acted upon in Congress. I know that you are a member of the Judiciary Committee, and I want you to write me fully about the present status of the bill, and how your committee feels toward it; whether you think they will pass upon the bill favorably or report it unfavorably, and whether committee action upon the matter can be delayed until it will be impossible for the bill to be taken up at this term by the House. Kindly write me fully about the matter and I will appreciate it very much.

I inclose you a copy of a criticism of the bill, in a condensed way, that I prepared at the request of some of the organizations here. The Arkansas trainmen, as soon as they can get their committee together, will send a representative to Washington to oppose the measure. He will possibly be there in 10 or 15 days, and I hope that the committee will not act upon the matter until he can reach there.

Yours, very truly,

FRANK PACE.

Any inaccuracies in the criticism inclosed will be due to the fact that it was hurriedly prepared, much of it being reproduced from speech of Hon. HOKE SMITH.

PACE.

THE RAILROAD TRAINMEN OF ARKANSAS ARE BITTERLY OPPOSED TO THE WORKMAN'S COMPENSATION ACT.

This act, which has recently passed the upper branch of Congress, and is now pending before the House, is stirring the railroad trainmen of Arkansas like no other measure that has ever been presented to Congress. It is only within the past three weeks that this bill has received their attention and consideration, and as they become more familiar with it and learn more of its details the more apparent it becomes to them that it is a railroad bill, pure and simple, dressed up in a workingman's clothes, for the purpose of deceiving the railroad employees as to its true purpose and intent. The railroad men of Arkansas have learned enough about it within this short space of time to know that they do not want the bill passed and are going to exert every effort within their power to defeat it. All railroad men are in favor of a fair compensation bill, drafted upon lines that will be fair both to the railroad and to the employee, but to name the present bill a compensation bill is a misnomer and the whole bill belies the title.

The suspicions of the railroad trainmen were aroused in the first place by the fact that the railroad company was not opposing the bill; in other words, it is evident that the railroads throughout the United States are perfectly satisfied with the bill, and when one reads the provisions of the bill, it causes no surprise when the statement is made that the railroads do not oppose the bill, because the bill is so drafted that the railroads are the only ones whose interests are cared for, and this is done at the expense of fairness and justice and right toward their employees. In fact, every railroad in the United States is back of the bill, with all their power and money, trying to secure its speedy passage before the railroad men, whose material rights are affected, can have secured information about the contents of the bill; in other words, the railroads are trying to railroad this measure through Congress, because they know that if the trainmen of the United States are made to realize the true meaning of this bill, its purposes and its object, before its passage in Congress, that there will be such a protest throughout the entire United States against its passage that its defeat will be assured.

This bill was introduced by Senator SUTHERLAND, of Utah * * *. The bill was introduced in the Senate on the 20th day of February of the present year and reported by the Judiciary Committee on April 3, and passed the Senate on the 6th day of May, and it is now up to the House, where speedy action is at the present time being urged. It has taken more than six years by the successive acts of Congress passed upon by the Supreme Court of the United States before the railroad employees received the place in the protection of their rights that they now occupy. This bill is exclusive; it wipes out all of this legislation that it has taken six years of constant effort upon the part of the railroad employees to secure. Why should there be so much haste about its passage; why not give the employees an opportunity to be heard upon this measure that is of so much vital importance to them and that undoes and wipes out that for which they have worked for a period of six long years? As a result of their efforts during the past six years the railroad company in a suit for personal injuries can no longer set up the defense that the injury was caused by the negligence of a fellow servant, neither can they any longer set up the defense of contributory negligence, neither can they any longer wipe out a claim upon the defense that the risk was assumed. The only defense that they can make now when an employee is injured is that the injury was an accident for which no one is responsible, or that the injury was due solely to the negligence of the injured employee. It is only within the past two months that the full breadth and extent of these acts of Congress were determined by the Supreme Court of the United States, and under the law as it now exists the railroad men are satisfied and can get adequate compensation for injuries that they may receive, and now when they have just come into their own and are about to receive the benefit of this law they are met with this new act proposed in Congress, and are told that it is being passed for their benefit and that it is better for them that the law as it now exists, * * * and when they saw it passed through the Senate, silently, quietly, and rapidly, like a thief in the nighttime, they have begun an investigation, and that investigation has revealed to them the most iniquitous measure that they have ever been called upon to meet.

In the very outset this bill declares itself to be exclusive of all legislation upon the subject. The railroad men would not object to the bill if it was passed in addition to the laws that now exist and would not strike out present legislation, because that would leave them the remedies they now enjoy and give them this new relief, if they saw fit to adopt it. If this measure is to be passed for the benefit of the employee, and will, as the railroad representatives in Congress claim, inure to his benefit and give him speedier and more complete relief than he can secure under present laws, why should it be necessary to declare in this bill that it shall be exclusive by its terms and strike down all other legislation upon the subject, because if it is better for the railroad employees than the legislation that now exists the railroad employees would adopt it in the future in securing relief when injured, and the laws that they enjoy at the present time would die of nonuse, but those who are pushing the bill through know that if this bill were passed with its present provisions no railroad employee would ever avail himself of it, but would pursue his remedy under the present laws, and this law would die of nonuse.

The workmen's compensation act is a sugar-coated pill, it is something that it pretends not to be, and it is time for the railway trainmen of the United States to tear the mask off of it and look it squarely in the face and see it as it is. Under the present law the injured employee can enforce his rights in the court of his own selection, in the State courts or in the Federal courts of the United States, and he can try his case in any county in the State through which the railroad runs, and also he can have a right to a trial by jury. Under the present bill his cause is first heard, not before a jury, but before an arbiter appointed by the Federal court. There will be possibly two arbiters in Arkansas, one at Little Rock and one at Fort Smith, and all of the witnesses that the employee desires to be used in this investigation he must pay the expense of bringing for miles before this arbiter at an appointed hearing. He must submit to an examination by a physician appointed by the arbiter, and then, if the arbiter believes that he is injured, he classifies him and determines according to the provisions of this bill the amount of pay he shall receive for his injury.

If the employee is not satisfied, he then has a right of appeal to the Federal district court, and there has the right of a pretended trial before a jury, because, by the terms of the act, the finding of the arbiter is to be taken as prima facie true, and the burden is upon the employee to show that the arbiter's findings are not correct. Thus it requires the expense of two trials, neither one of which gives to the employee a fair hearing under the law, before a judgment can be obtained. From the judgment of this court either party may appeal it to the higher courts for a final determination of the case, making more litigation than under the provisions of the present law.

But the worst provision of the bill comes in the pretended compensation. Where a man is killed outright, his widow, where there are no children under the age of 16, gets 40 per cent of the wages, to be paid monthly for the period of eight years. If she dies or remarries all compensation stops and the railroads are discharged from the payment of any further sum on account of his death. For the purposes of this act, the wages of any man shall be no more than $100 a month. If the deceased employee is receiving as much as $250 per month, his wages are counted at $100 for the purposes of this act. If he is receiving less than $100, his widow only receives 40 per cent of the wages that was being paid him. If there are children—4, 6, 8, or 10, it makes no difference how many—under the age of 16, the widow and children together receive only 50 per cent of the wages of the deceased employee for the period of eight years. An employee might be killed who was earning $200 a month, leaving a widow and six children under the age of 16 years, and the full compensation they would receive would be $4,800, to be strung out in monthly payments over the period of eight years.

The bill provides that this may be compromised and settled for a lump sum, of which the railroad company would take advantage, and the widow and children would settle for possibly from $2,400 to $3,600, which would mean that they would take nothing for loss of companionship, loss of moral training and guidance by the children, and no compensation for the death of the father and husband, except possibly the salary he would have received had he lived for a year and one-half. Under the terms of the bill provision is made for the payment of stipulated damages for injuries that are definite and fixed and can be determined, like the loss of a leg, the loss of an eye, or the loss of an arm. Reference to one of these will be sufficient to show the inadequacy of the provisions of the bill. These are denominated permanent partial injuries. The bill provides that the loss by separation of one leg, at or above the knee joint, one-half of the salary earned by the employee shall be paid him monthly for the period of 66 months. To the engineer making $2,400 a year, under the provisions of this bill, for cutting his leg off above the knee he would get $3,300, to be paid at the rate of $50 a month. To the trainman making $50 a month it would pay $1,650, at the rate of $25 a month. If the loss of the leg should be below the knee, the engineer would get $2,400, to be paid $50 a month, or $1,200 to the employee making $50 a month. Take an engineer 45 years old; he is master of his business; he is too old to learn another occupation; you cut off his leg just below the knee; his business is gone; his occupation is gone; you give him $2,400, to be paid $50 a month. This would leave him without a job; he can not even get the $2,400 in one sum with which to start into some little business; but if he wants a lump sum, he must compromise with the railroad company and take whatever he can get. Thus you have him with a family on his hands; a complete settlement with the railroad company for $2,400, what he could earn in one year; nothing paid him for the pain and suffering, nothing for the deformity, nothing for depriving him of his only means of earning a livelihood, because he can not hope to continue in the railroad service in that condition, and all of this is settled in full with the railroad company for the sum of $2,400.

Take a young apprentice, 20 years old, making $50 a month. He loses his leg below the knee; he gets $1,200, to be paid him monthly at the rate of $25 a month. No consideration is taken of his wrecked future prospects or the pain and suffering that he endures, but monthly he receives this measly stipend until he has received $1,200; but if he desires to get it in a lump sum, so that he may establish himself in some kind of business, he must take whatever the railroad will give him, possibly $600 or $800 for the loss of a leg. The illustrations serve to show the inadequate and unjust provisions of this bill toward the injured employee, but the further we proceed the worse the bill becomes. Under the provisions of this bill, if an injured employee is offered work by the railroad company, or goes to work elsewhere, and gets 90 per cent of the wages he was receiving at the time he was injured, the railroad company is relieved from paying him any further damages and all pay stops. If the railroad company offers him work, and he declines to take it, that will pay him 90 per cent of his former wages, then all pay stops and the railroad is discharged from paying him anything further. If he works and receives less than 90 per cent of the wages he was receiving at the time he was injured, the railroad company is required to pay him only the difference between what he makes and what 90 per cent of his wages would be. Thus, if he is able to labor at all and does labor, what he earns is practically deducted from the amount the railroad is required to pay him, and they are relieved from paying him any compensation at all. In other words, although a man is injured, if he has the nerve and courage to get out and work in his unfortunate condition, the result of his labor inures to the benefit of the railroad company, and they are thus relieved from the responsibility of paying him for an injury that they placed upon him.

The great bulk of injuries are those injuries where the extent of the injury can not be definitely ascertained and determined. Sprained backs, fractured limbs, internal injuries—in all of these cases the extent of the injury is left to the adjuster, and the amount of compensation that the injured party is to receive is left to his discretion after he has determined the character and extent of the injury and the injured employee begins to receive the monthly pay. At any time in the future the matter may be called up for trial anew before the adjuster, and the whole hearing gone over again; thus, the injured employee is always under a strain of uncertainty and doubt, never knowing the amount he is to receive, dependent entirely upon the whim and caprice of the adjuster and the number of examinations that the railroads see fit to ask for before the adjuster; thus a man disabled and sick and without money can be continuously subjected to repeated examinations and adjustment of his pay, and if he wants his interests protected he must appear at each examination, pay the expenses of the witnesses that he desires to use, and in this manner, sick in body and exhausted in purse, these repeated examinations will drive him to an abandonment of the entire case and the yielding up of any future payments. To realize the unjustness of this bill, you have only to read it, and to study it will make any trainman rise up and denounce its provisions.

In addition to the above, I can not refrain from calling the attention of the public to one provision of the bill, and that is, that if a railroad employee is killed and leaves no widow, but leaves children over the age of 16 years and not yet of full age, those children do not receive any compensation at all on account of the death of their father unless they are mentally or physically deformed, so that they can not make a living. And if there is no widow and but one child left, who is under the age of 16 years, that child only receives 25 per cent of the monthly wages of the parent until the child arrives at the age of 16 years, and this payment is discontinued when the child arrives at the age of 16 years. For instance, if a father should be killed who was earning $2,400 a year and had a girl 12 years old, she would receive only $25 a month until she reached her sixteenth year, or $1,200 for the loss of her parent, and that paid to her in monthly installments of $25 a month, turning her loose upon the world at the age of 16 years without a dollar in the world and without a protector to provide for her.

Mr. FLOYD. Now I submit a letter from C. J. Rollins, dated Jacksonville, Fla., July 5, 1912, protesting against the passage of the bill.

Mr. GRAHAM. Pardon me, Mr. FLOYD, do those communications protest in a general way, or do they ask for changes in it and are then for its passage with the changes?

Mr. FLOYD. They protest in a general way, and they particularly protest against its passage in its present form—they bitterly oppose section 3, which repeals the employers' liability act. I don't know that any of them go to the extent of saying that they would oppose the bill in any form, but their protest is against the injustice, as they claim, of taking away their rights under the existing law and substituting as their exclusive remedy this new compensation act with its arbitrary and low rates of compensation.

JACKSONVILLE FLA., July 5, 1912.

Representative FLOYD,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: I am writing you in defense of the employers' liability act of 1908, which is far superior to the workingmen's compensation act being discussed by the Congress of the United States.

I was injured by the Atlantic Coast Line Railroad Co. in June, 1910. I recovered $6,500 under the employers' liability act. If I had been under the compensation act that is now being discussed by the National Congress I could have only recovered $912 for the two years; and for the two years under the employers' liability act I recovered $3,900 clear of attorney's fees and costs of court, making a difference of $2,988 in favor of the employers' liability act.

This workmen's compensation act is in no sense in favor of the workingman; it is clearly in favor of the railroad company. The railroad companies have tried to railroad this bill through under disguise of it being a law for the working class of people, as they are being hit so hard by the working class under the present employers' liability act.

If the Const Line Roalroad was polled on the third division you would find that there would be at least 90 per cent in opposition to the compensation act. The only working class of people I find in favor of the compensation act are those who are ignorant of the meaning of this compensation act. This compensation act says railroad men in some cases are not capable of handling large amounts to their advantage if recovered under the employers' liability act, and that paying them by the month under the compensation act would be of more value to them.

I do not think the more intelligent class of railroad men should be made responsible for a few ignorant ones.

I hope you will do all in your power to oppose the compensation act and uphold the employers' liability act.

Yours, very truly,
C. J. ROLLINS,
P. O. Box 1366, Eastford, Fla.

Mr. FLOYD. Now I submit a letter dated Pine Bluff, Ark., May 18, 1912, written by W. L. Meek, J. F. Smith, and J. A. Moore, committee on resolutions, Brotherhood Railway Carmen of America:

Hon. JOE T. ROBINSON,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

We, the members of Cotton Belt Lodge No. 7, Brotherhood of Railway Carmen of America, in regular session, passed the following resolution, for which we earnestly beg your support:

Be it resolved, That inasmuch as the workmen's compensation Senate bill, which is No. 5782, not being in harmony with our demands, and being, we consider, a detriment to railway organizations, we cast a unanimous vote, with 75 per cent of our members being present at said meeting, against the passage of said bill. We have a membership of 255.

Respectfully submitted.

W. L. MEEK,
J. F. SMITH,

Mr. FLOYD. I now submit a letter, dated Argenta, Ark., May 18, 1912, signed by W. E. Pearsall, legislative committeeman, Brotherhood of Railroad Trainmen, Lodge No. 449:

ARGENTA, ARK., May 18, 1912.

Much has been said and written recently with reference to this bill, which passed the Senate a few days ago, resulting in 64 votes for and 15 against. Those who have written and discussed this bill through the press most prominently are persons that its provisions will probably never affect; but the rank and file that will be directly affected, should it become a law, has not as yet been heard from individually, the reasons being that a large majority do not fully understand the real purport of the bill, as between the present liability laws, and have not familiarized themselves as regards the many technicalities embodied in it with reference to the methods of adjustments for personal disability or death, as they have had only a limited time to consider it, and I, being one of the rank and file, do not hesitate to frankly express my views. I note the act is silent as to adjustments of temporary disability, except that it is specific in deducting the first 14 days of such injuries, and also specific in the maximum rate of $100 per month, with 50 per cent deductible in the adjustments of permanent-disability claims, and it is very natural to presume that the railway claim agents will immediately establish this basis in making settlements with employees for temporary disability, owing to the fact that this principle is recognized in the bill as being an equitable basis for disability of all classes.

After carefully studying the provisions of this act, and its terms being such a radical departure from American principles and also the old common English law, wherein it seeks to deprive the employees of common carriers engaged in interstate traffic of the privileges guaranteed them by the Federal Constitution, also State constitution, with equal rights with other classes of citizens of having a trial by jury of their peers in both civil and criminal cases, as was instituted by our forefathers, this being the basic principle of the American Government, why should we depart from it at this age?

The real purpose of the words "exclusive remedy" contained in the act were embodied in this bill for the express purpose of depriving the railway men from exercising their rights as other classes of citizens should they desire to avail themselves of such privileges, which is even accorded live-stock shippers, should their cattle or live stock be injured or killed while in transit, to recover losses.

Is it possible the American workmen are to be retrograded by class legislation and the owner of dumb brutes would have more extensive remedies for their loss than would the employees? Why not make it optional for adjustments to be made for death or disability under provisions of this act or under liability laws? In my opinion, the compensation act has the wrong phraseology for its title. It would be more in keeping with its drastic, despotic principles to substitute as its title "Sutherland-Taft live-stock compensation bill," as Senator SUTHERLAND, of Utah, being the godfather of the bill, who sat as the high priest at the hearings of the commission that conceived the philanthropic principles upon which it was founded, and President Taft having the distinguished honor of transmitting this bill by special message to Congress, with a few more frills attached, recommending its speedy passage, in order that the railway men of the United States might be immediately relieved of their burden of constitutional rights which are guaranteed in the Declaration of Independence.

Let us review a few provisions of this bill.

First. It debars an injured employee or the heirs of a deceased employee from recourse through the courts, provided they have not been proffered reasonable compensation for death or injury, yet they do have the privilege of having a Federal juror pass upon the decisions rendered by the autocratic "adjuster," who is appointed to such position by a Federal district judge, and this adjuster will grant them the privilege of employing counsel to assist in reviewing the case and his decision as rendered; and to him is granted the exclusive authority to name the fee that such attorney may receive for his services, and if he so desires he could make such small fees as to force plaintiffs to employ a "quack lawyer," who would be incompetent to handle such cases and combat with the best legal talent which can be obtained by the defendant.

Second. The maximum allowance for compensation is restricted to a specific amount, which, in my opinion, is not liberal enough for death and permanent-disability cases, as compared with the average settlements as have been made in the past few years, more especially so in States where the "fellow-servant" doctrine has been eliminated and liberal liability laws have been enacted. Almost every brakeman, switchman, and locomotive fireman employed on railroads in the western and southwestern zones who has regular employment will learn the maximum allowance for death in approximately four years, and the majority of conductors employed regularly can earn the amount in approximately three years, and the majority of the engineers regularly employed can earn the amount in approximately two years and six months.

The argument as set forth by those who champion the bill set up one of the reasons for the adoption of the exclusive compensation was on account of the excessive fees being enacted by lawyers from litigants. I am free to admit that such may be the case in many instances, but before accepting this argument, investigation will develop that the plaintiff in many instances of litigation is brought about by the fact that liberal settlements were not offered. If so, this condition of affairs would not exist. Extreme remedies in either direction will never correct evils which may exist. This bill, surrounded by so many technicalities, which seeks to take advantage of the poor, unfortunate man who may be in poor financial circumstances to defend his case and prove his disabilities to the satisfaction of the adjuster; and I rather believe there will be just as many attorneys employed in cases of disability and death under the provisions of the "compensation act" as have been in the past under liability statutes, for this bill does not provide for automatic compensation by any means.

Another bad feature of the bill is that it provides the same compensation for death or disability for the employee who did not exercise due care and was negligent in causing his death or disability as the one that did exercise due care and through no fault of his own caused his death or disability. Where is the argument to sustain such position? Show me where the equity comes in, in any phase of it, and I will eat the paper on which the bill is written.

To any railroad man that is undecided as regards the merits or demerits of this bill I would respectfully refer him to report of the commission and the hearings held before the commission that drafted the bill, and after you have read this report and hearings and carefully analyzed them and the full provisions of the bill, and compare it with the liability laws that we now have, should you then decide it is what the railway men need, in lieu of our present liability laws, I will have nothing more to say on the subject, as you would be an object of sympathy rather than that of criticism.

I have carefully read the report of the commission, which contains every word that was uttered both for and against the bill, and I was very favorably impressed with the arguments presented in opposition to this bill by President J. S. Carter, of the Brotherhood of Locomotive Firemen and Enginemen. He offered statistics as evidence and the result of his investigation of two months' duration in England and Switzerland in the year 1909. He especially investigated this subject. I note he made special reference to the workmen's compensation act which was passed in Switzerland, and when the workmen of that country discovered the many objectionable features in the bill they repudiated that act by placing the referendum on it, and I only wish we had the same privilege in the United States should this bill become a law, as I feel quite sure it would be a very popular law shortly after a trial has been given it.

I think the railroad men of the United States owe Mr. Carter a debt of gratitude for the able manner and the forcible arguments he presented to the commission in opposition to this bill. The members of the Brotherhood of Locomotive Firemen and Enginemen should immediately start a subscription and present Mr. Carter one of the best silver services that can be purchased in this country, for he deserves great credit for his efforts in their behalf.

The railroad men in general owe a debt of gratitude to Senators HOKE SMITH of Georgia, SMITH of Arizona, REED of Missouri, STONE of Missouri, CULBERSON of Texas, DAVIS of Arkansas, GORE of Oklahoma, ASHURST, BRYAN, HITCHCOCK, KERN, LEA, MARTINE, MYERS, POINDEXTER, and SHIVELY for their noble efforts to defeat such despotic legislation.

Should this bill become a law, I am of the opinion it will be attacked upon constitutional rights, and any unbiased judiciary would so construe the act, in my opinion, which I trust will be its final destiny.

Legislative Committeeman Brotherhood of Railroad Trainmen, Lodge No. 449.

Mr. FLOYD. I submit a letter from Little Rock, Ark., dated July 13, 1912, by W. D. Jackson, chairman State legislative board of the Brotherhood of Railroad Trainmen, together with certain resolutions adopted by the Brotherhood of Railroad Trainmen in opposition to this legislation.

LITTLE ROCK, ARK., July 13, 1912.

HON. J. C. FLOYD,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: Inclosed you will find resolutions adopted by our State legislative board while in session and also a copy of resolution adopted at a meeting of the railroad employees of Little Rock and Argenta, which was largely attended by organized and unorganized employees, and will say that there was not a man present but what was bitterly opposed to this bill.

I desire to thank you for your kindness and prompt attention given our communications; and if any time we can be of any service to you, we stand subject to your commands.

I hope to be in Washington at an early date to appear before the committee against this bill.

Yours, very respectfully,
W. D. JACKSON,
Chairman State Legislative Board.

At a joint meeting of the railway employees held at O. R. C. Hall, corner Markham and Chester Streets, Little Rock, Ark., July 10, 1912, called for the purpose of discussing the merits and demerits of the employers' liability and workmen's compensation act now pending in Congress, the following resolution was unanimously adopted:

COMMITTEE ROOM, July 10, 1912.

We, your resolution committee, appointed at a call meeting of the railway employees to discuss the employers' liability and workmen's compensation act now pending in Congress, do hereby respectfully submit the following resolution for your consideration:

Whereas an open meeting of the railway employees called to discuss the merits and demerits of the so-called employers' liability and workmen's compensation act now pending in Congress; and

Whereas the sentiment here to-night of the railway employees assembled has been unanimously in opposition to the proposed measure by all the crafts represented here at said meeting: Therefore be it

Resolved, That we express ourselves as being bitterly opposed to said bill and condemn it in severest terms as being vicious and unjust legislation in its present form to our crippled and maimed brothers, their widows and orphans; and be it further

Resolved, That we as organized labor and individuals do hereby pledge ourselves to do our utmost to defeat or postpone this infamous bill until all who will be affected thereby shall have an opportunity to fully understand its contents; and be it further

Resolved, That a copy of these resolutions be spread upon the minutes of this meeting and a copy be sent to the press and a copy to each of our Representatives in Congress from the various districts and also to local lodges of railway employees in this vicinity who will be affected thereby.

Respectfully submitted.

LITTLE ROCK, ARK., July 11, 1912.

To the legislative board of the Brotherhood of Railroad Trainmen assembled:

We, your undersigned committee, appointed to draft resolutions protesting against the passage of the pending employees' compensation bill in Congress, beg leave to report as follows:

Be it resolved, That the legislative board of the Brotherhood of Railroad Trainmen, of the State of Arkansas, in meeting assembled, bitterly protest against the passage of the employees' compensation act pending in Congress and repudiate it in its entirety. Therefore be it further

Be it further

Resolved, That all members in the State use their undivided and collective efforts to their best advantage to do whatever they consistently can to assist in defeating this bill.

G. F. HILL.

Mr. FLOYD. I submit a letter dated Little Rock, Ark., July 16, 1912, from W. D. Jackson, State chairman legislative board of Arkansas for the Brotherhood of Railroad Trainmen; and also an additional letter from the same party, dated Little Rock, Ark., July 15, 1912, on the same subject:

LITTLE ROCK, ARK., July 16, 1912.

HON. J. C. FLOYD,
Congressman, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: Inclosed find letter which I think will cover the matter thoroughly.

It gives our cause for not being able to get away, as you will note. The president of the trainmen knows we are bitterly opposed to this bill, and he is doing all within his power to keep us away from Washington; but if he don't look out we will be there regardless of his opposition to us going. The truth of this matter is we have been very unnecessarily delayed in convening our board, for the grand lodge officers knew we were going to put up a fight against this bill.

Why the presidents of the various organizations are so red-hot for this bill is more than we can understand, for God knows it is not a good law for the men they represent; and it seems to us that our president is blocking us all he possibly can to keep us from being heard on the measure.

Your suggestion that it is best not to agitate a meeting of the committee to consider the bill is a good one, for we think it best to let it peacefully sleep in the hands of the committee; and let us hope that it gently rests there until the adjournment of Congress.

If they get to talking on the bill any more, wire me, and I will leave at once for there.

To say that the railroad employees of Arkansas appreciate your loyalty to use in protecting our interests as our Congressman is placing it very mildly, and hope to some day be able to repay you in our humble way.

It certainly is good luck for us that you are on that committee, and we well realize what a fight you have put up for us on this bill.

Yours, very respectfully,
W. D. JACKSON,
State Chairman Legislative Board of Arkansas for the Brotherhood of Railroad Trainmen.

LITTLE ROCK, ARK., July 15, 1912.

HON. J. C. FLOYD,
Congressman, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: Our legislative board has just adjourned its regular biennial session, at which the compensation bill pending in Congress was very thoroughly discussed, and, in fact, we spent more time carefully considering this measure than we did on all the rest of our local legislation.

We gave the measure very careful consideration in every respect, and the entire board to a man was bitterly opposed to this measure, and we wired our president if we could send a representative to Washington to appear before the Judiciary Committee on this bill and pay the expenses out of our general fund, and he wired us back that we could not; so, you see, we were blocked again on our fight. So the board then agreed to take up a subscription among the membership of the State to defray the expenses, and that is being done now.

The State chairman of the Brotherhood of Locomotive Firemen and Enginemen has given me written authority to represent that organization, as he is unable to go in person, and I will kindly ask you on behalf of the Brotherhood of Locomotive Firemen and Enginemen and the Brotherhood of Railroad Trainmen of Arkansas to arrange with the committee to give me an opportunity to be heard in opposition against the bill.

I would have been in Washington some time ago, but, as we have been unable to get our board together sooner, and then being delayed on account of the financial end of it and having to take up collection over the State makes it very hard on us, but nevertheless we are making preparation to appear before the committee. The only fear we have is that the bill will be out of the committee before we can get our subscription taken up.

Anything you can do for us will certainly be highly appreciated by the railroad employees of Arkansas.

Yours, very respectfully,

W. D. JACKSON,
State Chairman Legislative Board of the Brotherhood of Railroad Trainmen.

Mr. FLOYD. I now submit a communication dated August 9, 1912, addressed to myself and the members of the Judiciary Committee, from Mr. W. D. Jackson, chairman of the legislative board of Brotherhood of Railroad Trainmen, in which he gives his views at length in regard to the bill, and also attaches certain petitions, letters, and protests from other workingmen in opposition to this legislation.

WASHINGTON, D. C., August 9, 1912.

Hon. J. C. FLOYD AND MEMBERS OF THE JUDICIARY COMMITTEE,
Washington, D. C.

GENTLEMEN: I am State chairman of the legislative board of the Brotherhood of Railroad Trainmen of Arkansas and vice general chairman of the general board of adjustment of the Missouri Pacific System, and I also have a letter which authorizes me to represent the Brotherhood of Locomotive Firemen and Enginemen from that State, signed by A. N. De Mers, chairman legislative board for Arkansas, which reads as follows:

"LITTLE ROCK, ARK., July 15, 1912.

"To all Members of the House of Representatives in Congress,
"Washington, D. C.

"SIRS: This will introduce to you Mr. W. D. Jackson, legislative board chairman for the State of Arkansas, representing the Brotherhood of Railway Trainmen.

"Being unable to go to Washington at this time I desire to ask you to kindly extend to Mr. W. D. Jackson any hearing that you would extend to me as the representative of the Brotherhood of Locomotive Firemen and Engineers, representing 2,000 members in Arkansas and 80,000 in the United States. I may add that we are opposed to any law which will be compulsory upon the men. We are opposed to the repeal of existing laws. Thanking you very kindly for any courtesy extended to Mr. Jackson, and the hope that you will grant his reasonable demands on behalf of the people who daily protect the lives and property of the people of this country.

"I am, very respectfully, yours,

"A. N. DE MERS.
"Chairman Legislative Board "Brotherhood of Locomotive Firemen and Engineers."

The railroad employees of Arkansas are bitterly opposed to the compensation bill, first, that it is an exclusive remedy and takes away from us our rights of trial by jury within our State courts.

Under section 4 we would not be able to receive any benefits for injuries for the first 14 days, and in case an employee was injured and off 14 days and returned to work and was hurt on the first day of his service and off 14 more days you can readily see that he would be out of service, caused by some defective equipment of the railroads, and through no cause of his he would be unable to receive one cent for his time lost. That is a great injustice to the rank and file of the railroad employees.

In section 5 you only allow a maximum amount of $200 for the hospital service, and will say that in numberless cases this amount is a very small mite compared to the attention needed in such cases as partially and totally disabled, in which there are operations to be performed and long confinement in hospitals. You can readily see how soon $200 would be consumed in cases of this kind. It would certainly work a great injustice upon the injured employee.

In section 7 you will find that it will work a great injustice in a number of cases where you compel the employee to give notice of his injury within 30 days, in writing, of his accident. There are a great number of cases where this would be an impossibility, for the injured employee's dependents are quite often in a foreign city and are unaware of his injury, and in case of death, unless they informed the railroad company in writing of his death or accident, they would absolutely receive no compensation, or in extreme cases you allow them 90 days. I will cite you about a case in which a Mr. Reilly, who had a sister in Wyoming, was killed in Arkansas, and we were 14 months locating his sister. In this case, under this bill, the sister would not have gotten a dollar.

Section 10: The employer can subject the injured employee to numberless examinations, and by doing so keeps the employee continually before the adjuster or courts, and will work a great hardship both physically and financially upon him, and if he refuses to submit himself to examination his right to compensation then stops. This will be an untold hardship upon numberless injured employees.

In section 13 you place upon the injured employees untold hardships, whereby you compel them to pay cash in advance for all witnesses they may desire, and also, if they desire a jury, they have to pay cash in advance for that, and if the railroad companies so desire, the bill is so drawn that it will keep the injured employee continually in the courts and making expenditures of money, which nine times out of ten they will give up all hope and abandon the case on account of lack of funds to properly protect their rights.

In section 14, paragraph 4, it is provided that in a trial by jury or by court the findings of the adjuster shall be received as prima facie evidence of the facts, and also it provides that the court may submit to the jury special interrogatories if it so desires, and I consider this very dangerous and unfair.

Paragraph 5 provides that the adjuster shall fix the amount provided to be paid the attorney, and for what reason that was put in I am unable to say, but we are afraid that the amount made by the adjusters of the various districts would be so small that it would not enable the injured employee to employ competent and able legal advice; and as you well know, gentlemen, the railroad companies have always got the best legal talent that money can buy, and you can readily see, if the employee is hampered by not being able to get the best service, that a great injustice will be done him.

As for compensation for the injured employees, as it has been agreed by all of those who are in favor of the bill, the compensation is entirely too small, and I will not discuss that feature of it further, as we are all agreed upon that one particular point.

In section 9, paragraph E provides that if an employee is partially disabled and the company secures for the party employment and if the employee refuses to take the work, his compensation ceases. Under that particular part of the bill, in case of a railroad strike the company would say to the injured employee, "You go down into our shops and go to work, or go out and guard our property," and if the employee refused to do this, he would lose all right to any compensation he might have because of any injury.

Section 24 says that where an employee is permanently partially disabled and through another accident he becomes totally disabled the employer would only be liable for the partial disability. Now, in that case you could force a partially disabled employee to either go to work or else his compensation ceased, and in case that he did go to work, and was hurt in the discharge of his duty through no fault of his own, you relieve the company of any further liability. You can readily see that this is very unfair and unjust to the employee.

The railroad men of the South and Southwest can not at this time see any just cause or reason why this bill should be rushed through Congress without giving the rank and file an opportunity to be heard and give them time to set out the merits of this bill. I believe I would be safe in saying that not 10 per cent of the railroad employees of the United States ever heard of this bill. There are very few who have read it; as you know, gentlemen, the railroad employees of this country are busy men, and to read this bill it would take some time, and to understand it you have to read it over several times. As an illustration as to how well the employees of the railroads are informed upon this bill I will cite you to the following:

About a month ago I was in Pine Bluff, Ark., and was called into a meeting of the car men's union, of which there were 235 members, and they asked me to explain to them what I knew about the compensation bill. The first question I asked was, "How many men present know anything about this bill; those of you who do, please stand up," and, to my surprise, out of the 235 present there was not a man in the audience who knew anything about the bill.

This will give you a fair illustration of about how well the rank and file are informed on the bill. I notice that Mr. Gompers, who represents many thousands of railroad employees, and the American Federation of Labor are for this bill. I want to say that Mr. Gompers represents the International Brotherhood of Boiler Makers and Iron Ship Builders of the world, and at their national convention held in Little Rock last June they passed a very strong resolution, addressed to the Speaker of the House and Members of Congress, against this compensation bill. The resolution was passed by their convention unanimously. They are very bitter against the bill.

The railroad employees of some of the organizations, and mine especially, have not had a fair chance to express to the Members of Congress their opposition to this bill, because the president of their organization will not permit them to do so. The constitution of the Brotherhood of Railroad Trainmen is very drastic on the members who oppose legislation that has been approved by our national board, and should we do so our membership and protection will be taken away from us.

Our president, W. G. Lee, has been appealed to repeatedly for permission to oppose this bill, but he refused to give his consent until about the day the bill passed the Senate, and then he consented to the members of the brotherhood to oppose this bill if they so desired.

We have not had a fair chance to express to Congress our views on this subject, because the rank and file has not had time to consider the bill and take the matter up with you. The president denies to us the privilege which he assumes himself. He and Mr. Wills, the national legislative representative, are great boosters for this bill, and send out numberless circulars and letters urging you to request Members of Congress to support this bill, but when the membership attempted to circulate letters among themselves they are threatened by expulsion and are made to withdraw their letters. For example, I herewith present you with a copy of each of the two letters from Cleburne, Tex.:

C. O. WHEELER LODGE, No. 409,
BROTHERHOOD OF RAILROAD TRAINMEN,
Cleburne, Tex., May 21, 1912.

To the Senators and Congressmen assembled, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIRS: Upon receipt of President W. G. Lee's circular letter dated May 13, revoking the power of the president of Brotherhood of Railroad Trainmen to expel members for taking action on legislation relating to the employer's compulsory compensation act, we beg of you to defeat or delay final passage of such bill until the membership can have an opportunity to find out what is in it. Example first: If I should be killed, having three dependent children and wife, who would get 10 per cent each or 30 per cent and 40 per cent of $100, $470 per month, should my wife and two children die or be killed, my surviving heir would not receive their heritage, the company would retain that. Again, there is a maximum limit but no minimum limit. There certainly was not a friend of labor on that commission. The liability act is far better than can possibly be obtained from this, and if you will give us time you will now hear from the rank and file of our order. With many thanks for your efforts to defeat or delay this bill, I am, fraternally,

J. M. YOUNG,
Secretary 409, Brotherhood of Railroad Trainmen.

Brothers, the above is as nothing compared to the fact that should I become crippled by loss of one foot or hand and there should be a strike in any department of the company's service, they will say, sir, you can perform even partially these duties. I have to accept 90 per cent of my former wages and scab on those strikers or forfeit my compensation. Brother, in the name of God wake up and help to remove this mountain of an iceberg looming up before our Titanic—the organized labor of train and yard and engine service in the United States—and help to protect the little ones dependent on us for support and protection. There is something peculiarly strange that no one in authority has been able to see this before the bill had passed the Senate, and now before it passes the House of Congress we implore you to prevail upon your Senators and Congressmen to use all their influence against this bill, as the General Managers' Association will have accomplished more in this one bill to bring us on our knees than we have accomplished in all our 29 years of committee and legislative efforts combined. Trusting that all trainmen will give this the consideration we believe it merits,

We are, sincerely,

J. M. YOUNG,
Secretary C. O. Wheeler Lodge, No. 409, Brotherhood of Railroad Trainmen.

C. O. WHEELER LODGE, No. 409,
BROTHERHOOD OF RAILROAD TRAINMEN,
Cleburne, Tex., June 6, 1912.

To the officers and members of all lodges Brotherhood of Railroad Trainmen.

DEAR SIRS AND BROTHERS: Under date of May 21 we sent out letters to all lodges in the United States relative to the legislation on the employers' compulsory compensation act.

Under the authority of the following, over the signature of President Lee, dated May 18, 1912, we thought we could use our discretion in the matter, taking that circular as authority for such action, which reads:

"In compliance with this demand that the law be not passed, or at least be postponed for a time, it has been decided that so far as the proposed compensation law is concerned the last sentence of general rule 23, page 77, will not apply. This sentence reads: 'Any member of the brotherhood using his influence to defeat any action taken by a national legislative representative, or any action regularly taken by legislative representatives in meeting assembled, or of legislative boards under their proper authorities, shall, upon conviction thereof, be expelled, and the charter of any lodge using its influence in like manner may be suspended or revoked by the president.' We never dreamed that we would not be permitted to mention to our brothers that which we could mention to our representatives at Washington.

"And if, through our ignorance of same, we have caused any member or lodge to act not in accord with the best interest of the order, the members, or their families, we certainly regret it, and we therefore take this opportunity to ask your forgiveness for same and to consider this an official recall of same, as we are authorized to do by President W. G. Lee, under date of May 28, 1912, for violation of section 154, page 128, of the constitution.

"Fraternally, yours,

"J. M. YOUNG, Secretary."

You will note by the above, gentlemen, what little show we have to inform one another on the bill when our president and our laws prevent us doing so. I am confident that if this bill was put to a referendum vote of the railway employees of the United States it would lose by 10 to 1, for as soon as an employee reads the bill he becomes bitterly opposed to its passage.

Our convention went on record as follows:

"We recommend that the convention go on record as favoring the adoption of strong liability laws in every State, province, and Territory, eliminating the common-law doctrine of fellow servant, assumed risk, and contributory negligence. We also favor the principle of workmen's compensation, but realizing the narrow limits of our national and State constitutions, we urge all persons having to do with legislation to concentrate their efforts in behalf of an employers' liability law, believing, as we do, that such a law will prove a solid foundation upon which to build up a system of workmen's compensation laws." (Legislative committee's report.)

Some of the grand lodge officers claim that the above is an indorsement of this compensation bill, but I am unable to see wherein they can construe the above as an indorsement of this bill. At a meeting of the legislative board of our organization in Little Rock, held last July, the following resolution was adopted unanimously by our board:

"We, the undersigned committee appointed to draft resolutions protesting against the pending employees' compensation bill, beg leave to report as follows:

"Be it resolved, That this, the legislative board of the Brotherhood of Railroad Trainmen of the State of Arkansas, in meeting assembled, bitterly protest the passage of the pending employees' compensation act and repudiate it in its entirety.

"Therefore, we urgently request that each lodge under the jurisdiction of said State legislative board immediately pass resolutions condemning said bill and communicate with their respective Congressmen, requesting them to use their best endeavors to defeat said bill in the House of Representatives of Congress; be it further

"Resolved, That all members in the State use their undivided and collective efforts to their best advantage to do whatever they consistently can to assist in defeating this bill.

"Whereas we believe that the time for decided action is very limited, and that the far-reaching scope of this said bill is so important to organized labor that nothing should be left undone to take immediate steps to defeat the passage of same: Therefore, be it further

"Resolved, That we believe that it is essential that we send a representative to Washington, D. C., at once to appear before the Judiciary Committee of the House of Representatives of Congress to protest against the passage of this bill.

"W. E. PEARSALL,
"G. F. HILL,
"Committee."

At the session of our board I was instructed to wire President Lee, of our organization, if our legislative board had authority to send a man to Washington to appear before the Judiciary Committee on the compensation bill and pay for same out of the general fund, and he wired us back that we could only act on State legislation; and then the board passed a resolution that a subscription be taken up for the purpose of sending a representative to Washington, D. C. We have been blocked one way or another ever since this bill has been pending, and it is through no fault of ours that you have not heard stronger protests long before now. During the session of our board in Little Rock there was a notice put in the paper to all railroad employees, both organized and unorganized, that there would be a general meeting for the purpose of considering the compensation bill, and everybody was invited to attend. The meeting was largely attended, and the discussion of this bill was had from 8 o'clock until 11.30, and every man bitterly opposed it. When our legislative board was in session we did not act hastily upon the compensation bill, for we put in more time considering this bill in every phase and feature than we did on all of the rest of our matters combined; and if I understand it correctly, the adjuster has the power to reverse the decision of the Supreme Court of the United States.

While en route here to Washington, D. C., I met the general committee of the Missouri, Kansas & Texas Railroad at St. Louis, and they are representatives of several States. They are bitterly opposed to the passage of this bill. They discussed the bill thoroughly and are very anxious that the bill be amended so that it will not repeal any of our laws we may have on our statute books.

Gentlemen, in justice to the railroad employees of the United States, I appeal to you to amend this bill so that it will not repeal our laws. If the law is so much better than the one we now have, and you are inclined to be the friend of the railroad employees, why not leave the bill so that it will be cumulative, and leave it so that the employee can resort to whichever remedy he desires. I think you will make no mistake, if you desire to do the railroad employees a friendly turn, if you will amend it so that it will be elective.

Respectfully,

W. D. JACKSON,
Chairman Legislative Board of the B. of R. T.

ORDER OF RAILWAY CONDUCTORS,
Little Rock, Ark., June 10, 1912.

Hon. J. C. FLOYD, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: I have the honor to hand you herewith petitions from railway employees in Arkansas protesting against the passage of the employees' compensation act now before Congress. I have been directed by Little Rock Division, No. 131, Order of Railway Conductors, to request you and the other members of the Arkansas delegation in Congress to use your utmost power in an effort to defeat the measure.

I will thank you to let me hear from you in regard to the matter, and will say that other petitions will follow. Thanking you in advance for any favors shown in the matter, I am,

Truly, yours,

J. S. BARKMAN, Secretary.

PROTESTS AGAINST COMPENSATION BILL—RAILROAD MAN SUBMITS ARGUMENTS AGAINST MEASURE RECENTLY PASSED BY UNITED STATES SENATE.

To the Editor of the Gazette:

About two weeks ago there appeared in your paper an editorial relative to "The workman's conference act," just passed by the United States Senate and which bill is now in the hands of the Judiciary Committee of the House.

While we feel your interpretation of this bill was honest and sincere as you saw it, the article was most misleading to the public and a vast number of employees who do not take the time to go into these matters as they should. I am writing this letter hoping you will give it the same publicity you did your article, so that the erroneous impression may be in a manner corrected.

The proposed law not only vitally affects railway employees, of which there are 2,000,000 in the United States, but vitally affects every American citizen, in that one of its first provisions is for an "adjuster," an appointee of the United States Supreme Court, who is practically a dictator, and is the beginning of (or a step in the direction of) the centralization of governmental administration. It denies the right of trial by jury. It denies the right of employment of counsel by the injured party, except as approved by the "adjuster," who also has the power to fix the compensation of the counsel, which may be so low as to exclude the services of a reputable lawyer or so high that no employee, out of the meager allowance under the terms of the bill, can afford to pay them.

If the bill is so just for the employee, why is it being railroaded through Congress as it is?

The bill absolutely says no man's earning capacity is greater than $1,200 per year, and then cuts this in half as the maximum amount of damages to be recovered for permanent total disability or death, and that to be in monthly payments of not more than $50 per month and at the discretion of the "adjuster."

If a man is killed and leaves a daughter 14 years old, she is allowed $25 per month for two years, or $600 for his death, for her clothing, food, and education, and then is turned out on the world penniless.

I wish employees and the public would interest themselves sufficiently in this bill to get a copy of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of May 4, 1912, and read the speech made in the United States Senate by the Hon. HOKE SMITH, of Georgia.

I have letters before me written to the secretary of the State legislative board of the Order of Railway Conductors from the Hon. BEN CRAVENS, R. B. MACON, W. A. OLDFIELD, JEFF DAVIS, J. C. FLOYD, and others, condemning this bill as now framed in no uncertain terms.

Here are some of the objections:

It will compel every railroad man to increase his cost of living by purchasing additional insurance.

It displaces the employers' liability act.

It does not provide adequate compensation in the case of injury or death.

It takes out litigation from the State courts and puts it in the hands of one man.

The framers of this bill evidently hold human life and limb cheaply.

It is entirely in the favor of the railroads, and bears no provision in the employee's favor.

Section 3 repeals every law now on the statute books in favor of workingmen, whether common law, State, or Federal law, and provides that the sole and exclusive remedy for injured railway employees shall be under the provision of the proposed act.

The employers' liability act passed by Congress in 1908, the validity of which was upheld by the United States Supreme Court only three months ago, is to be repealed by the passage of this bill.

Why take away from us that for which we have labored and fought so many years, and which has just been declared constitutional by the United States Supreme Court, which will place the negligent employee on the same plane with the careful and considerate worker?

The ability and value to the body politic and society of every man are not the same; for example:

John Smith and Tom Jones attend the same medical school at the same time and graduate together.

Tom Jones by application and perseverance advances in the profession and becomes an eminent surgeon, becoming practically a necessity to humanity. While Jones burns midnight oil, Smith burns the candle at both ends, and is soon relegated to the rear, where he in justice belongs.

Then both are killed in a railway accident. One human life is as valuable as another in the eye of the Maker, but regarded by commercialism the same award will not be made in a monetary value.

What right has any lawmaking body to classify and discriminate between railroad men and men in any other profession? If a man lost his left hand, under the provisions of this bill he would be due $50 per month for 57 months. Should he lose a foot, there would be due him the same amount for 48 months, but if he accepted from the railway company a position as train auditor at $90 they would never have to pay him a dollar for his injury, and when the 48 months expired the company would be at liberty to discharge him, having paid him $90 a month for his work and nothing for his injury. If he refuses to accept the position offered him, he gets nothing.

An effort has been made to show this plan originated with railroad employees. True, but these employees were claim agents for the railroads. This work has been done secretly, and the only knowledge that the railroad employees have of this bill has been gained in the past 60 days.

If Congress wants to do something for railway employees, let this bill be cumulative, let it be in addition to and not in exclusion of our present laws. We are willing to take our chance in our home Arkansas courts for justice. This proposed "workman's compensation act" as now framed is the most damnable piece of legislation that was ever attempted to be railroaded through any lawmaking body. Every feature of it is bad.

Yours, truly,

R. I. FORSTER,
Chief Conductor, Division 566, Order Railway Conductors.

S. Hall, secretary of the Railway Workers' Nonpolitical Association, Chicago, Ill., together with resolutions adopted by the sixth special congress of the Railway Workers' Nonpartisan Association, while convened at the Briggs House, Chicago, Ill., August 25, 1912:

RAILWAY WORKERS' NONPARTISAN POLITICAL ASSOCIATION,
Chicago, Ill., October 20, 1912.

Mr. L. N. FAULKNER, Stockton, Cal.

DEAR SIR AND BROTHER: It is of vital importance that the attention of every railway man in the country be called to the vicious features of the pending "Brantley compensation bill," and that they be given an opportunity to study its application to them personally and those dependent upon them should the measure become a law.

We, the railroad men of Chicago, recognizing the seriousness of the menace and the importance of acting quickly, have formed an organization for the purpose of exposing this infamous measure and to bring to bear against it a strong impulse of protest from the railway workers.

We have printed a series of bulletins such as you will find inclosed and have undertaken to place them in the hands of every railroad man in the United States before the bill comes up for final passage in December.

We would request that you carefully study the bulletins and have them posted some place where railway men congregate, and that they be made a subject for discussion at your meetings, both in and out of your lodge rooms.

If you want a further supply for local distribution, or to send out over the road to isolated groups of men employed along the division, advise us, and we will forward any number of copies that you may require.

We are also inclosing a copy of a petition that we are having circulated. We will furnish other copies of this petition on request, and would ask that you aid its circulation as much as possible and return to us when filled.

We have undertaken to get 100,000 names to this petition to present to Congress in December, when the measure comes up for final passage, and would ask that every man who feels himself interested assist us in this work.

We would advise railway men in all parts of the country to follow the lead of Chicago, call meetings, and organize expressly for the purpose of fighting this measure. Interview your Congressman, find out how he stands on the proposition of compensation, especially if he is standing for reelection.

Kindly advise us of what action you take, so that we may act together and concentrate our force.

W. S. HALL, Secretary.

[Resolutions adopted by the sixth special congress of the Railway Workers' Nonpartisan Political Association, regularly convened at the Briggs House, Chicago, Ill., Aug. 25, 1912.]

Whereas there is a plan now well advanced, on the part of the "Taft administration" and those who are overzealous in their friendly interest with the large employers of labor, to have "railroaded" through Congress a measure that would deprive all railway employees in the United States of the rights which, after years of effort, they had finally secured under the employers' liability law of 1908, amended in 1910, and finally declared constitutional by the Supreme Court in January, 1912.

Said law reserves to railroad employees the right to sue under the Federal law, in the State courts, before a jury, for an award of damages in case of injury received in the service of employer; and

Whereas the proposed workmen's compensation bill (S. 5382), which passed the Senate May 2, 1912, restricts these rights by a provision that would repeal the employers' liability law, and nullifies or renders useless the safety-appliance act, in so far as it tends to benefit the workers in case of suit for damages; and

Whereas the Constitution of the United States provides that "neither slavery nor involuntary servitude, except as a punishment for crime, whereof the party shall have been duly convicted, shall exist within the United States, or any place subject to their jurisdiction."

The sworn statement of the railway managers of the United States shows a total of 239,455 employees injured in four years.

The proposed compensation bill, section 22, compels a great number of the 239,455 injured employees to accept any position offered them or be denied compensation, thereby creating a system of compulsory service that would compel injured employees to accept service against their will even in time of possible labor trouble; and

Whereas this proposed compensation law restricts the rights of 1,600,000 American railway workers, depriving them and their posterity of their rights to liberty: Therefore be it

Resolved, That we, the members of the Railway Workers' Nonpartisan Political Association, employed as actual wage earners on the railroads of the United States, do hereby protest to Congress against the passage of any measure having embodied a provision repealing the employers' liability law.

Resolved, That we denounce Judge WILLIAM G. BRANTLEY, Member of Congress, as a "quibbler" with this all-important question.

We are aware that the safety-appliance act will not be repealed, but so far as injured employees are concerned it will be a dead letter on the statute books.

Section 6 of the proposed compensation bill says: "That no compensation shall be allowed for the injury or death of any employee where it is proved that his injury or death resulted from intoxication while on duty."

Judge BRANTLEY knows that under the employers' liability law, together with the safety-appliance act, if an employee was injured and such injury was caused by neglect of safety appliance on the part of the employer, even though said employee was proven to have been intoxicated, such intoxication would not be a bar to recovery. And he must admit that the above quoted section of the compensation bill denies the right to recover if a company could prove intoxication, even though the accident was caused by a violation of the safety-appliance act.

Resolved, That we indorse Division No. 504, Brotherhood of Locomotive Engineers, of Great Falls, Mont., and that portion of their resolution in which it says: "It would tend to make the dependent families of engineers a prey to prostitution."

Resolved, That we indorse, with one exception, the proposed amendments of Senator HOKE SMITH, of Georgia, and extend to him our thanks for his fearless attitude in the interest of the workers by opposing the compensation law which the Taft administration was zealously attempting to force on the great army of railway employees.

Resolved, That we indorse the action of the Committee on the Judiciary of the House of Representatives for their postponement of action on the bill, which permitted the railway workers the opportunity of protest; and, further, we wish especially to express our thanks to Representative FLOYD for his confidence in the rank and file of the workers, and commend his ability and honesty, as shown in the line of questions he put to Mr. Gompers when that gentleman appeared before the committee and stated "that the representatives of the railroad brotherhoods and representatives of the railroad companies agreed on the schedules of the compensation bill at a private meeting."

Resolved, That we indorse W. L. Carter, international president of the Brotherhood of Locomotive Firemen and Engineers, for his stand in our behalf, and the proposed amendments by H. O. Teat, printed in the Firemen's Magazine of August, 1912.

Resolved, That we indorse the resolutions of Messrs. B. J. Jacoway, A. C. Mulford, and W. G. Beanland, committee of Division No. 175, Order of Railway Conductors, at Memphis, Tenn.

Resolved, That we denounce the Taft administration as being plutocratic in its attitude and for its attempt to force his infamous measure on railway workers.

Resolved, That where candidates for State or national offices refuse to answer straightforward questions, without evasion, on matters affecting the industry in which we are employed or affecting employees of said industry, that we refuse to give them our support and, where possible, place our own candidates in the field.

Resolved, That this body denounce as unfair to the workers, labor leaders who have in any way supported the infamous compensation bill of the Taft administration, namely, Messrs. Gompers, president of the American Federation of Labor; Stone, of the engineers; Garretson, of the Order of Railway Conductors; Lee and Cease, of the Brotherhood of Railway Trainmen; and Wills, joint legislative representative.

Resolved, That a copy of these resolutions be sent to all local unions throughout the United States, as well as to all candidates for office, both State and national.

WILLIAM J. PINKERTON,
Y. J. MERRIMAN,
W. LEE HALL,
Committee.

These letters were handed to me by Mr. W. J. Pinkerton, national chairman of this association, who was in my office a few days ago, and who informed me that he had in his possession protests signed by 50,000 workingmen against this legislation, and he submitted to my view a document which, he said, contained those 50,000 names. He said it contained the original signatures of 50,000 workingmen. I have no reason to doubt the accuracy of his statement, for I am convinced that workingmen everywhere who understand this bill are opposed to it.

Mr. STERLING. Were they railroad men?

Mr. FLOYD. Yes.

Mr. DAVIS. What is the total number of railroad employees that would be affected by this bill? Has it appeared anywhere?

Mr. FLOYD. I am not prepared to answer; I don't know; I don't recall that anyone has made a statement or given an estimate of the total number of men to be affected by the bill, but it would certainly be a very large number of the railroad employees of the country.

Now, I have here a statement which is headed: "The following is a short statement relative to the present Federal employers' liability act and the proposed Federal compensation act. This argument was presented to Congress by Avondale Division No. 334, Order Railway Conductors, Birmingham, Ala." I don't know whether that has been printed in the record or not. If not, I would like to have it printed, because it gives a very careful analysis of both our employers' liability law and this proposed compensation act.

The following is a short statement relative to the present Federal employers' liability act and the proposed Federal compensation act. This argument was presented to Congress by Avondale Division, No. 334, Order Railway Conductors, Birmingham, Ala.:

EMPLOYERS' LIABILITY ACT.

The statute makes the railroad company liable to an employee, or his survivors, when he is injured or killed, when his injury or death results in whole or in part from the negligence of any of the officers, agents, or employees of such carrier, or by reason of any defect or insufficiency due to its negligence in its cars, engines, appliances, machinery, track, roadbed, trucks, boats, wharves, or other equipment.

The statute also declares that contributory negligence of an employee who is injured is not a defense to any suit that may be brought because of the injury or death of the employee, but it provides that where there is contributory negligence—that is, where an employee is partly to blame for an injury or death—that there should be an apportionment of the damages. So that when an employee is injured and brings suit under this act, if both he and the railroad company were negligent, he would be entitled to a verdict at the hands of the jury, but the jury would have the right, if it saw fit, to reduce the amount in proportion to the amount of the negligence of the person injured or killed.

No contract, rule, regulation, or device whatsoever will enable the railroad company to avoid the payment of damages for any liability under this act. No insurance paid by the railroad company for injuries to employees under this act will relieve the railroad company from the payments of damages for injuries.

This act declares that an employee injured or killed is not guilty of contributory negligence of any kind in any case where his injury or death was caused by the failure of the railroad to comply with any of the safety-appliance statutes of the United States.

Nor can he be held to have assumed the risk of injury or death where the railroad company has failed to comply with the safety-appliance statutes.

The act also provides that suits can be brought under the statute in the courts of any States or of the United States which could have jurisdiction.

It is also provided by the present Federal law that a violation of the Federal safety-appliance acts makes the railroad absolutely liable for an injury or death to an employee and that no defense is available to the railroad where the injury or death results from such violation of the safety-appliance act. It is therefore well to state in this connection the provisions and requirements of the Federal safety-appliance acts.

Locomotives must be equipped with driving power brakes operated from the cab.

All trains must have cars equipped with continuous power brakes to enable an engineer of a train to control the speed of the train without a brakeman.

They must have couplers that will couple by impact; that is, by pushing them together.

They must have couplers that will uncouple without the necessity of men going between the cars to uncouple.

They must have grab-iron handholds on the ends of cars.

There is a standard height of drawbars of cars, and all cars must measure up to that standard.

The boilers of locomotives and its appurtenances must be in safe condition to operate without unnecessary peril to life or limb.

There must be secure sill steps on every car.

Every car must have efficient brakes.

There must be secure ladders on every car.

There must be secure running boards on every car.

There must be secure handholds or grab irons on roof of cars at top of ladder.

They can not haul cars coupled together by means of chains in any revenue train.

Locomotives must have ash pans that can be operated without going beneath the engine.

When a railroad company fails to have any of the foregoing safety appliances on their cars or engines or fails to have them in operating or good condition and an employee is injured or killed, the railroad company is guilty of negligence, and the employee, under the law, is neither guilty of contributory negligence nor has he assumed the risk of injury or death by using the unsafe appliances.

Therefore, when an employee is injured on an interstate highway and he is engaged in interstate commerce and the injury or death is caused by a failure to have any of the safety appliances in operation, the railroad company can offer no defense to the suit. It is only necessary to ascertain the extent of the injury and fix the financial loss for it.

Where the railroad company is itself an interstate highway or handles interstate freight, passengers, or express, and the employee is not engaged in the transportation of interstate commerce, his injury or death by a failure to comply with any of the safety-appliance statutes would give him the right to sue in any State independent of the Federal employers' liability act. He would then be held not to have assumed the risk of injury if he knew that the company failed to use proper safety appliances, for the Supreme Court of the United States has held that the safety-appliance act "is intended to embrace all locomotives, cars, and similar vehicles used on any railroad which is a highway of interstate commerce."

It may be said of the laws of the United States now in force that in practically no case can an employee who has been injured have his right to damages defeated if there is negligence on the part of the railroad. A casual reading of the act will make this clear, and when a failure to comply with the safety-appliance statute results in injury or death there is no defense available to the railroad.

PROPOSED COMPENSATION ACT.

The proposed compensation act contains the following features:

It is exclusive and compulsory, but it only displaces the Federal liability act.

It appoints an adjuster, who is really a special master of the United States court.

The adjuster has the right to fix the amount of compensation to be paid an injured employee under the act.

He has the right, after that amount has been fixed, to increase or diminish it.

He has the right to change a judgment of the court, even though that judgment had been upheld by the court of appeals and approved by the Supreme Court.

He has the right to stop payments provided for in a judgment of the United States court.

Appeals from his decision go to a jury, and the controversy is then between his findings and the injured employee.

It limits the employee in the employment of his attorney but it places no limit on the railroad as to the employment of an attorney.

It provides for compensation for death or injury and makes the following classifications:

Death.
Permanent total disability.
Permanent partial disability.
Temporary total disability.
Temporary partial disability.

It provides that no compensation shall be paid for the first 14 days.

It arbitrarily says that no man's wages shall be greater than $100 per month, and all calculation for compensation is based on that arbitrary declaration.

It provides for the practice before the adjuster, the method of appealing the cases, and as to who shall pay the cost. Under it the injured party will have to pay the cost if he excepts and appeals. If the injured employee excepts to the adjuster's findings, he has to pay the cost incurred thereby. If he wants a trial before a jury, he must demand it, and must pay the cost of that trial, but paragraph 4 of section 14 says that even before the jury the findings of the adjuster are prima facie evidence of the facts set forth in the findings.

That leaves the trial before the jury where it is not a trial as between the railroad and the employee, but as between the adjuster and the employee, for in the trial the employee will have to attack and overcome with evidence the findings of the adjuster.

It provides a limitation upon the employment of counsel by the employee, but does not limit the railroad company to the amount or quality of its attorneys or counsel nor to the number of its claim agents that are to be employed.

Section 20 is of more interest to railroad employees on account of its far-reaching effect than one would imagine by reading it. It means that they can say to any man earning over $100 a month when he is injured that he was not entitled to earn more than $100 per month. In future years when wage agreements are considered this limitation on a man's wages can be used by the railroad as an argument.

It provides that if a man receiving permanent partial disability—that is, his hand is cut off—and if he goes to work and he receives another partial disability—that is, his other hand is cut off—he would only be paid for the loss of both hands 50 per cent of his wages, limited to $100 per month, for a total of nine years and six months. The loss of both feet in the same way, or the loss of both eyes in the same way, or the loss of a hand or a foot in the same way, would not give him the benefit of the compensation provided for for total permanent injuries.

It provides that dependent children over 16 years of age means children unable to earn a living by reason of mental or physical incapacity.

Many have read the bill a number of times and have failed to find all the jokers.

It provides, on page 41, beginning at line 1, that whenever an employee of an interstate highway is killed or injured it shall be presumed prima facie that he was engaged in interstate commerce.

All employees would prefer to bring their suits under State acts, but the proposed act puts on them the burden of proving that they were not engaged in interstate commerce. It will be almost impossible for them to carry this burden in many cases.

It provides that no man shall be paid for the first 14 days of his injury and under that a man could be injured, stay away from work 14 days, go to work on the fifteenth day, be injured again on that day, lose 14 days more, and go to work on the fourteenth day again, lose the month's time and get nothing for his injuries.

It forces an employee to accept the services of the company's physician unless he wants to employ his own at his own expense. The amount of the physician's bills and hospital bills that a man is entitled to from the road is limited to $200, and one serious surgical operation would cost that amount, and after the railroad had paid for that the employee would have to continue the payments.

It allows the employer and employee to constitute committees for the settlement of claims, and this gives the employer a hold that will enable him to squeeze many dollars out of injured employees, for everyone knows that an employee on a committee is not likely to be very severe on his employer when he knows that his own job is at stake.

It limits the payments to a widow to a total of eight years, but the payment stops if she dies or remarries. This would eliminate half the payments to widows. Another one is that children receive the benefits of this act until they are 16. The number of girls who can earn money enough to support themselves between the ages of 16 and 21 are few, and that class would be compelled to supplement their ordinary earnings in extraordinary ways. Take the case of an engineer earning $225 a month who had two girls in school at the ages of 16 and 17. They would immediately be thrown on the world to earn a living, and to them it would mean starvation or begging. That section could be illustrated in a number of ways.

Another thing, this bill puts a premium on carelessness and recklessness; it provides for the extreme reckless employee the same amount that can be recovered by the very careful employee, and that can be best illustrated in this way: A train hand earning $100 a month carelessly neglects to set a switch to a main line behind a freight train, and a high-class passenger train, properly operated by an engineer and conductor each earning $250 a month, runs into the open switch and the careful engineer and conductor and the careless train hand are all killed. Thirty passengers may be killed and a half million dollars' worth of property destroyed, yet the company will only have to pay for the careful engineer and conductor the same amount that it pays for the careless train hand.

It provides that if the widow has 1 child or 10 children she shall be paid 50 per cent of the wages of the deceased, limited to $50 a month.

It provides for certain payments to the dependent parents, and for a very small amount to be paid other relatives in case there is no widow, children, or parents.

It says that the loss of sight in both eyes, the loss of both feet at or above the ankle, the loss of both hands, the loss of one hand and one foot, an injury to the spine resulting in permanent and complete paralysis of the legs or arms, and an injury to the skull resulting in incurable imbecility or insanity are permanent total disabilities, but it leaves open to the adjuster and the courts the question of what other things are permanent disabilities, and provides in that way for many lawsuits.

To those who have the permanent total disabilities it only pays 50 per cent of the salary, limited to $100 a month, during the life of the employee.

It provides that for the loss of the arm above the elbow joint an employee is paid 50 per cent of his wages for six years. That would mean that an employee earning $200 a month will get $3,600 for the loss of his arm. One earning $50 per month will get $1,800 for loss of his arm. The loss of the leg above the knee joint would only cost the railroad $3,300 for a man earning $100 or more a month, and for a man earning $50 a month it would cost them $1,650.

A complete loss of hearing in both ears would entitle the employee to receive 50 per cent of his salary, as limited heretofore, for 72 months. For the loss of one ear he would be paid for 36 months. It provides that for the loss of the sight of one eye the employee would be paid 50 per cent of his salary, limited to $100 per month for 30 months. The loss of the sight of an eye permanently incapacitates a railroad man from ever engaging in the service again, and if he were a conductor earning $200 a month he would get $1,500 for that permanent injury.

For the loss of other members he would get similar amounts.

It also provides that if an injured employee goes to work and receives for his work as much as 90 per cent of his wages, limited to $100 per month, the company is to pay him nothing for his injury during the time he is at work. Should he receive less than 90 per cent, the compensation shall be diminished.

That portion of the bill really means that should a conductor earning $200 a month have his left hand cut off, the company would be due him $50 a month for 57 months. Should he lose a foot, they would be due him the same amount for 48 months, but if he accepted from them a position as train auditor, or any other position that would pay him $90 a month, they would never have to pay him a dollar for his injury, and when the 48 months or the 57 months expire the company could discharge him, having paid him $90 a month for his work, and nothing for his injury.

An effort has been made to show that this plan originated with railroad employees. That is true, but the employees were the claim agents of the railroad. You will find the scheme fully explained on page 44, Minutes of the Association of Railway Claim Agents at Montreal, and the same page shows you that their work to have this act passed has been done secretly.

The only knowledge that railway employees have of this bill has been gained within the past 30 days, the bill having been published in the various railroad publications since the 1st of March, and in the Railroad Trainman of April, page 355, is another proof of the employees' lack of knowledge of this question.

OUR OBJECTIONS.

We object to this bill because of the provisions above stated, and further because it will compel every railroad man to increase his cost of living by purchasing additional heavy insurance.

We object to it because it displaces the employers' liability act.

We object to it because it does not provide adequate compensation in the case of injury or death.

We object to it because it takes out litigation from the State courts and puts it in the hands of one man.

We object to it because the framers of it evidently hold human life and limb cheap.

We object to it because it is entirely in favor of the railroads and bears no provision in favor of the employee.

Mr. CARLIN. Have you the figures showing the amount of money payable for accidents that would be covered by this bill—the last 12 months?

Mr. FLOYD. I have not. The last investigation I made on the subject, I think, I had before me the railroad statistics of 1910 or 1911, which showed that the actual amount of damages paid by the railroad companies for damages for personal injuries for that year amounted to $10,000,000.

Mr. GRAHAM. Sutherland made that statement in his remarks before the committee.

Mr. CARLIN. Did that include settlements or just judgments?

Mr. FLOYD. Judgments, I presume. There would be practically no difference between the judgments and the settlements, because practically all our railroads are solvent.

Mr. WEBB. He means settlements without suit.

Mr. FLOYD. I am not able to say as to that; that may have included both, or it may have included only judgments. I think the figures given cover both judgments and the voluntary settlements.

Mr. DOBBS. I think so.

Mr. FLOYD. Unless you have further questions to ask me, gentlemen, I am through, and desire to thank the committee for giving me this opportunity to present my views concerning this bill, and to incorporate in the hearings the letters and protests submitted in opposition to its passage.

Mr. WEBB stated that he desired to have printed as a part of the hearings certain letters he had received in opposition to the bill, which letters will appear in the following serial, No. 9.

Thereupon the committee adjourned.

Mr. BRANTLEY. Mr. Speaker, I yield two minutes to the gentleman from Maryland [Mr. LEWIS]. [Applause.]

Mr. LEWIS. Mr. Speaker, in the coming year 90,000 men are to be injured on our railroads and 10,000 killed. That is as much to be expected as the orderly operation of the planets themselves. Under existing law less than one-third of these victims will receive some $15,000,000, certainly not more than $20,000,000, with their lawyers to pay. Under the bill that is presented to the House to-night all the victims will be compensated and that sum will be lifted to from $48,000,000 to $60,000,000 as compensation to the victims of industry. [Applause.] We are confronted by a practical question. Are two-thirds of these victims to lose some $40,000,000 next year because lawyers would like to adapt this measure to the old legal remedial forms of procedure rather than accept it as an adequate principle in itself? It is hard on the lawyers as a class.

I am a lawyer, and I want to say that if I go back to the profession for my living, it will be very hard on me. But it will be an act of justice to the soldiers of industry such as even this great body will seldom have an opportunity to make. [Applause.]

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. LEWIS. Mr. Speaker, I ask leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the gentleman's request?

There was no objection.

Mr. BRANTLEY. Mr. Speaker, I reserve the balance of my time.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Georgia [Mr. BRANTLEY] reserves the balance of his time.

Mr. FLOYD of Arkansas. Mr. Speaker, I yield two minutes to the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. WEBB].

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. WEBB] is recognized for two minutes.

[Mr. WEBB addressed the House. See Appendix.]

Mr. HENRY of Texas. Mr. Speaker, even if I were for this bill, you should not have my consent to railroading it through this House with only 40 minutes of debate when there are one hundred and more amendments.

For 10 years we endeavored to pass the employers' liability bill, abolishing the barbaric doctrines of assumed risk, contributory negligence, and the doctrine of fellow servant. And no sooner had we abolished them and established that law than the railroads began the crusade to repeal it; and to-night they come into this Congress, in the closing hours, and endeavor to repeal that act and shut the courthouse doors of every State in this Union against these litigants.

If you give the litigant the right to elect his remedy and go into court and assert his remedy, if he sees proper, I will vote for the bill. Let the courthouse doors be open so that the litigant may assert his right in the courts. If that is done,

I shall vote for the bill; but as long as you bar litigants from the courts, as long as you deny the right of petition and redress in those forums set up to protect the rights of citizens, I shall stand in the pathway of this act, resisting it with all the vigor possessed by me.

For years, in the Committee on the Judiciary, I have studied these questions, and last year while a member of that committee analyzed this bill. I want to say in this presence here tonight that if there ever was a measure proposed to the American Congress in behalf of the great railways of this country and against the interests of those who labor for them and under them this is the measure, a railroad measure to the core, and against the laboring interests of the Republic. [Applause.]

I shall oppose it and fight it to the bitter end. It is against those who toil and favors the great corporations with unfair privileges. [Applause.]

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. FLOYD of Arkansas. Mr. Speaker, how much time have I remaining?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Arkansas has six minutes remaining.

Mr. FLOYD of Arkansas. I yield one minute to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. SABATH].

Mr. SABATH. Mr. Speaker, in the short space of time allotted to me all I can hurriedly say is this: I am heart and soul in favor of a workmen's compensation bill which will provide for compensation to employees that are injured or killed; in fact, the first workmen's compensation bill considered by this House was introduced by me during the first session of the Sixtieth Congress, nearly six years ago. Since that time I have devoted a great deal of time and have expended large sums of money in an effort to acquaint the people with the principle underlying workmen's compensation and in endeavoring to convince them of the merits of this legislation. Therefore I regret exceedingly that after struggling for six years to secure workmen's compensation I can not cast my vote for the bill which is now before the House, for it is a compensation bill in name only; it should rightfully be called the "Railroad relief measure." Nearly every section is so drafted as to be in the interest of the railroads. It provides that this shall be the exclusive remedy that employees shall have and takes away from them their present statutory and common-law rights. Since the very beginning of my fight for workmen's compensation I have contended that such legislation should not deprive the injured employees of any rights which they now enjoy, but should give them additional protection, and in this connection I wish to insert in my remarks at this point the bill which I introduced and which I claim provides equitable compensation to those injured and killed:

A bill (H. R. 21962) to provide a system of compensation for injuries, resulting in disability or death, to employees of common carriers subject to the regulative power of Congress, to civil employees of the United States Government, and for other purposes.

Be it enacted, etc., That the provisions of this act shall apply to every common carrier subject to the regulative power of Congress and to any of the employees of every such common carrier while such employees are engaged in any employment subject to the regulative power of Congress, and to all civil employees of the Government of the United States.

SEC. 2. That any common carrier (hereafter designated employer) subject to the provisions of this act may elect to provide and pay compensation for injuries sustained by any of its employees arising out of and in the course of any employment covered by the provisions of section 1, according to the provisions of this act, and thereby such employer shall be relieved from any liability for the recovery of damages, except as herein provided. Every employer subject to the provisions of this act is presumed to have elected to provide and pay compensation as provided in this act unless and until notice in writing by the employer of his election to the contrary is filed with the Interstate Commerce Commission. No such employer, however, shall be entitled to any of the privileges or advantages specified herein until a notice in writing of an election by said employer to provide such compensation has been filed with the Interstate Commerce Commission, on blanks furnished by it for that purpose.

SEC. 3. That the filing of notice of an election to provide such compensation as aforesaid shall constitute an acceptance of all the provisions of this act, and such employer shall be bound thereby as to all his employees subject to the provisions of this act for a term of one year, and succeeding terms of one year thereafter until a notice by the employer of his intention to discontinue payment of compensation under the provisions of this act shall have been given to the Interstate Commerce Commission, and to all employees as aforesaid, by written notice at least 60 days prior to the expiration of any such annual term: Provided, That no compensation shall be allowed for the death or injury of an employee where it is proved that his injury or death was occasioned by his willful, wanton, and premeditated intention to bring about the injury or death of himself or another.

SEC. 4. That when any employer elects to provide and pay compensation as provided in this act, and files notice of such election with the Interstate Commerce Commission, and thereby becomes bound to provide and pay such compensation according to the provisions of this act, then every employee of such employer who enters the employment subject to this act after the adoption of this act by said employer as aforesaid, shall be deemed to have accepted all the provisions of this act as a part of his contract of hiring, and shall be bound thereby, except as hereinafter provided. Every employee subject to this act whose contract is in force at the time his employer elects to pay compensation and who continues to work for such employer, and every such employee who enters the service of such employer after the adoption of this act by the employer shall be deemed thereby to have accepted the provisions of this act and shall be bound thereby: Provided, however, That any such employee may, within 30 days after the election of the employer to pay compensation as provided by this act, or after such new employee enters the service of such employer, notify such employer in writing that said employee does not desire to receive the benefits or compensation provided for in this act, and from the day of the filing of said notice with said employer this act shall have no force or effect as to such employee, but the liability of the employer and the right to compensation by the employee shall remain the same as though this act had not been enacted: Provided, however, That before any such employee shall be so bound by the provisions of this act, his employer shall furnish to such employee personally, at the time of his hiring, a statement in writing of the compensation provisions of this act as herein provided, which statement shall also include a notice to the employee that the employer has accepted the provisions hereof. In the event that any such employee is unable to read the English language, then, in that case, before such employee shall be held to have accepted the provisions of this act, the said employer shall cause the said provisions of said statement and the notice to the employee that the employer has accepted the provisions of this act, to be read to the said employee, or interpreted from the said English language into such language as is understood by the said employee, by a competent interpreter, and thereupon the said interpreter shall make a statement in writing, under oath, to the said employer of the fact of such reading or interpretation to said employee.

SEC. 5. That no common-law or statutory right to recover damages for injury or death sustained by any such employee while engaged in any employment subject to the provisions of this act, other than the compensation herein provided, shall be available to any such employee who has accepted the provisions of this act nor to any of such employee's dependents or his legal representative: Provided, That where the injury to the employee was caused by the failure of the employer to furnish any safety appliance for use in said employment, which is now or may hereafter be required by any act of Congress, nothing in this act shall affect the present civil liability of the employer.

SEC. 6. That the amount of compensation which an employer who has elected to adopt the provisions of this act shall pay for injury to an employee which results in death shall be:

(a) If the employee leaves any widow, child or children, or parents, or other lineal heirs, who were dependent upon him for support, the compensation shall be a sum equal to eight times the average annual earnings of the employee, but not less in any event than $5,000 and not more in any event than $7,500. Any weekly payments other than necessary medical or surgical fees shall be deducted in ascertaining such amount payable on death.

(b) If the employee leaves collateral heirs who were wholly or partially dependent upon him at the time of his death, the compensation shall be such a percentage of the sum provided in clause (a) as the contributions which deceased made to the support of such dependents bore to his earnings at the time of his death.

(c) If the employee leaves no widow, child or children, or dependents as aforesaid, the compensation shall be the reasonable expense of his medical attendance and burial, not exceeding $200.

All compensation provided for in this section shall be paid to the personal representative of the deceased employee for the exclusive benefit of the persons entitled thereto, as provided in this section in the proportion provided by law in relation to the distribution of personal property left by persons dying intestate: Provided, however, That in case the said decedent shall leave a widow or children entitled to compensation provided for in this section, compensation shall be paid for the first six months after the death of said employee in installments at the same intervals and in the same amounts that the wages or earnings of said employee were paid to him while he was living. After the expiration of the said period of six months the balance of the compensation shall be paid in monthly installments equal to 60 per cent of deceased employee's monthly earnings, but in no case to be more than $75 nor less than $30 per month.

After the monthly payments above provided for have continued for not less than six months either party may, upon due notice to the other party, apply to the probate court having jurisdiction of the case for an order commuting the future payments to a lump sum. This application shall be considered by the court, and may be granted where it is shown to the satisfaction of the court that the payment of a lump sum in lieu of future monthly payments will be for the best interests of the person or persons receiving or dependent upon such compensation, and that the payment of said lump sum will not be prejudicial to the public welfare. Where such commutation is ordered the court shall fix the lump sum to be paid at an amount which will equal the total sum of probable future payments, capitalized at their present value upon the basis of interest calculated at 5 per cent per annum with annual rests. Upon payment of such lump sum the employer shall be discharged from all further liability on account of the death of the employee, and shall be entitled to a duly executed release, upon filing which or other proof of payment with the Interstate Commerce Commission, the liability of such employer shall be discharged of record: Provided, That if the said widow or children entitled to compensation shall be residents of any foreign country the compensation due shall be paid in a lump sum at once. If there are other dependents as provided in this section, resident of any foreign country, said other dependents shall be paid compensation in a lump sum in amounts proportionate to the degree of their dependency upon the employee's earnings while living, but in no case shall the whole amount of such compensation exceed the maximum sum named in clause (a) of this section.

SEC. 7. That the amount of compensation which the employer shall pay to the employee for an injury resulting in disability shall be:

(a) Necessary medical and surgical treatment in all cases at the time of the injury, and thereafter until the degree of disability shall have been determined and the monthly or weekly payments due the injured employee shall have been fixed. Said medical and surgical treatment shall include all necessary medicines and apparatus, such as artificial limbs, crutches, and trusses, to aid in the success of the treatment and to diminish the effects of the injury. The employer may designate any duly qualified physician or surgeon to furnish the medical and surgical treatment necessary, and to prescribe the necessary medicines and facilities. Should the employee be dissatisfied with the treatment given him by the physician or surgeon designated by the employer, said employee shall have the right to select his own physician or surgeon, but in that event the employer shall be liable only for such expense as he would have been liable for had the physician or surgeon designated by him been retained by the employee.

(b) If the period of disability lasts for more than seven calendar days, and such fact is determined by the physician or physicians as provided in section 9, compensation shall begin from the day the injured employee leaves work as the result of his injury, and shall continue as long as the disability lasts, or until the compensation paid equals the amount payable as a death benefit, payments to be made weekly in an amount equal to 60 per cent of the average weekly earnings of the employee at the time of his injury, but not less than $10 nor more than $18 per week.

(c) If the period of disability does not last more than seven calendar days from the day the injured employee leaves work as the result of his injury no compensation other than the medical and surgical treatment specified in clause (a) shall be paid.

(d) If any employee shall receive any serious and permanent disfigurement to the hands or face by reason of any injury arising out of and in the course of his employment, but which disfigurement does not actually disable said employee from pursuing his usual and customary employment, such employee, unless he elects to maintain an action at law as provided in sections 4 and 5 herein, shall have the right to resort to the arbitration provisions of this act for the purpose of determining a reasonable amount of compensation to be paid to such employee for said disfigurement, but in no case shall the amount of compensation allowed an employee under this clause exceed one-third the amount of compensation that would be due him in case of his death.

(e) If after the injury has been received it shall appear upon medical examination, as provided in section 9, that the employee has been partially, though permanently, disabled so as to be incapacitated from pursuing his usual and customary employment, he shall receive compensation equal to 60 per cent of the difference between his average earnings at the time of his injury and the average amount which he is earning or is able to earn in some suitable employment or business after the injury, if such employment is secured.

(f) If permanent total disability results from any injury, compensation equal to 60 per cent of his annual earnings at the time of his injury shall be paid to the injured employee during the remainder of his life, payments to be made monthly, and in no case to be less than $30 per month nor more than $75 per month. For the purposes of this section it shall be conclusively presumed that the injury resulted in permanent total disability in the following cases, namely, the total and irrevocable loss of sight in both eyes, the loss of both feet at or above the ankle, the loss of both hands at or above the wrist, the loss of one hand and one foot, an injury to the spine resulting in permanent and complete paralysis of the legs or arms, and an injury to the skull resulting in incurable imbecility or insanity: Provided, That the specific cases of total permanent disability enumerated in this section shall not be construed as excluding other cases. In case death occurs before the total of the payments made to an employee who is totally and permanently disabled equals the amount payable as a death benefit, as provided in section 6, then, in case the said employee leaves any widow, child or children, or parents, or other lineal heirs entitled to compensation under the provisions of this act, they shall be paid the difference between the compensation provided for death and the sum of such payment, but in no case shall this sum be less than $1,000.

In fixing the amount of the disability payments regard shall be had and deduction made for any payment, allowance, or benefit which the employee may have received from the employer during the period of his incapacity, except the expense of necessary medical and surgical treatment.

SEC. 8. That the basis for computing compensation as provided for in this act shall be as follows:

First. The compensation shall be computed on the basis of the annual earnings which the injured employee received as salary, wages, or earnings in the employment of the same employer during the year next preceding the injury.

Second. Employment by the same employer shall be construed as employment by the same employer in the grade in which the employee was employed at the time of his injury, uninterrupted by absence from work due to illness or any other unavoidable cause.

Third. The annual earnings, if not otherwise determined, shall be regarded as three hundred times the average daily earnings in such computation.

Fourth. If the injured employee has not been engaged in the employment for a full year immediately preceding the injury, the compensation shall be computed according to the annual earnings which employees of the same class in the same employment or employments of the same kind have earned during such period; and if this basis of computation should prove to be impracticable, then three hundred times the amount which the injured employee earned on an average during those days when he was working in the employment during the year next preceding the injury, shall be used as a basis for the computation: Provided, That in no case shall the yearly earnings of the injured employee be computed at a less amount than three hundred times the average daily wage of adult day laborers in the locality where the injury occurred.

Fifth. In computing compensation to be paid to an employee who before an injury was already disabled and drawing compensation, or entitled thereto under this act, additional compensation shall be awarded according to the combined disability, and in computing compensation for such combined disability the employee's earnings prior to his first injury shall be taken as a basis: Provided, That if the second injury was received while the employee was working for another employer than the one for whom he was working when he received his first injury, the compensation to be paid for the combined injury shall be apportioned between said two employers according to what each would be liable for in the case of the single injury happening under his employment.

Sixth. If an employee receive an injury which of itself would only cause partial disability, but which combined with a previous injury does in fact cause permanent total disability, such employee shall receive compensation for permanent total disability. If the second injury was received while the employee was employed by an employer other than the one for whom he was working when he received his first injury, then the payment of compensation for permanent total disability shall be borne by the said two employers share and share alike.

SEC. 9. That any employee entitled to receive compensation under this act shall be required, if physically able, to submit himself for examination by a duly qualified physician or surgeon, provided and paid for by the employer, at any time and place reasonably convenient for such employee, at any time within seven calendar days after the injury and at further intervals thereafter not oftener than six weeks, if deemed necessary by the employer, for the purpose of determining the nature, extent, and probable duration of such employee's disability and for the purpose of adjusting the compensation which may be due the employee from time to time. Said examination shall be made in the presence of a duly qualified physician or surgeon provided and paid for by the employee if said employee so desires, and in the event of a disagreement between said physicians or surgeons as to the nature, extent, or probable duration of said injury or disability the Interstate Commerce Commission shall be notified forthwith of said disagreement, and within six days after receiving such notice said commission shall select a third physician or surgeon, and the majority report of said three physicians or surgeons as to the nature, extent, and probable duration of such injury or disability shall be used for the purpose of estimating the amount of compensation payable to such injured employee according to the provisions of this act. Whenever it shall become necessary to select a third physician or surgeon, as provided in this section, such third physician or surgeon shall be paid by the Interstate Commerce Commission. If the employee refuses to submit himself to examination as herein provided, or unnecessarily obstructs the same, his right to compensation shall be suspended until such examination shall have been made, and no such employee shall be entitled to receive compensation for any such period of suspension.

SEC. 10. That if any injured employee shall be mentally incompetent at the time any right or privilege accrues to him under this act, a conservator or guardian of such incompetent, appointed pursuant to law, may claim and exercise any such right or privilege, on behalf of said incompetent, with the same force and effect as if the employee himself had claimed or exercised such right or privilege; and no limitation of time herein provided for shall run so long as said incompetent employee has no conservator or guardian.

SEC. 11. That compensation, payable under this act, may be settled by agreement between the parties. Every such agreement and every award shall be in writing, signed and acknowledged by the parties and by the arbitrator or secretary of the committee hereinafter referred to, and shall specify the amount due and unpaid by the employer to the employee up to the date of the agreement or award, and, if any, the amount of further compensation that shall be paid. Every such agreement or award and every subsequent modification thereof, which modification shall be signed and acknowledged by the parties in the same manner as the original agreement or award, shall be filed with the Interstate Commerce Commission within 10 days after it is made. Upon approval of said agreement or award by said commission the parties shall be duly notified, and thereupon said agreement or award shall become effective from the date it was signed and acknowledged as aforesaid.

SEC. 12. That if compensation be not settled by agreement between the parties, then if any committee representing the employer and the employee has been organized for settling disputes under this act, the compensation shall be settled by such committee, unless either party objects by notice in writing delivered or sent by registered mail to the other party before the committee meets to consider the matter. If either party so objects, or there is no committee as aforesaid, then the compensation shall be settled by the Interstate Commerce Commission through an examiner appointed and paid by said commission for the purpose of settling controversies under this act. Said examiner shall be designated "arbitrator of compensation," and the said commission is hereby authorized and directed to employ as many of said arbitrators of compensation as may be necessary properly to execute and enforce the provisions of this act. Whenever any dispute as aforesaid has been referred to any such arbitrator of compensation the decision of said arbitrator shall be final and conclusive, subject to an appeal by either party to the Interstate Commerce Commission, and to a further appeal to the Court of Commerce, subject to the rules of practice of said Court of Commerce.

SEC. 13. That said arbitrator of compensation shall not be bound by technical rules in making his investigation, but shall give the parties full opportunity to be heard, and shall act reasonably and without partiality. He shall have power to issue subpœnas, administer oaths, require the production of books and papers, examine witnesses, and receive depositions taken before any proper officer in any State or Territory of the United States. He shall be paid such salary as the Interstate Commerce Commission may determine, and shall be allowed his actual expense of travel, together with such reasonable allowance for subsistence as said commission may determine. When not employed in connection with any proceedings under this act, the services of said arbitrator may be utilized by said commission in any suitable or appropriate employment deemed necessary by said commission in furtherance of any of its administrative duties under any act of Congress.

SEC. 14. That no said arbitrator of compensation shall act in any case in which he is interested, nor where he is related to either party by marriage, or by consanguinity or affinity within the third degree, as determined by the common law. Whenever it shall appear to the satisfaction of the Interstate Commerce Commission, upon application of either party, that the arbitrator before whom any case is pending is disqualified, or that he entertains bias or prejudice, so that a fair and impartial hearing of the case can not be had before him, it shall be the duty of said commission to supply another arbitrator to act in the case.

SEC. 15. That any agreement or award as aforesaid may be modified by a subsequent agreement or award, in the same manner and with the same effect as the original agreement or award, at any time after the expiration of six months from the date on which said original agreement or award was approved by said Interstate Commerce Commission; and before the expiration of any period for which payment of compensation has been fixed thereby, but not afterwards, any such agreement or award may be reviewed by an arbitrator of compensation upon application of either party after due notice to the other party, upon the ground that the disability of the injured employee has subsequently ended, increased, or diminished. Upon such review the said arbitrator may increase, diminish, or discontinue the compensation, in accordance with the facts, or may make such other order as the justice of the case may require, but shall order no change in the status existing before the application for review. The findings of the arbitrator upon such review shall be served on the parties, and filed with and approved by the Interstate Commerce Commission, in like manner and subject to like disposition as in the case of the original award.

SEC. 16. That the arbitrator in any case may, on his own motion or upon application of either party, appoint a disinterested and duly qualified physician or surgeon to make all necessary examinations of the employee and testify with respect thereto. The reasonable fee of said physician or surgeon shall be paid by the Interstate Commerce Commission, upon properly executed vouchers filed with said commission in accordance with its rules for the payment of accounts.

SEC. 17. That no proceedings for compensation under this act shall be maintained unless notice of the injury has been given to the employer as soon as practicable after the happening thereof, and during disability caused by such injury, and unless claim has been made within six months from the date of said injury; or in the case of the death of the employee, or in the event of his physical or mental incapacity, within six months after such death or removal of such physical or mental incapacity; or in the event that payments have been made under this act within six months after such payments have ceased. No want, defect, or inaccuracy of said notice shall be a bar to the maintenance of proceedings by the employee, unless the employer proves that he is unduly prejudiced in such proceedings by such want, defect, or inaccuracy, and then only to the extent of such prejudice. Notice of the injury shall in substance apprise the employer of the claim for compensation made by the employee, and shall state the name and address of the injured employee, the approximate time and place of the injury, and in simple language the cause thereof, if known. Such notice may be served personally or by registered letter addressed to the employer at his last known residence or place of business. Failure on the part of any employee entitled to compensation to give such notice shall not relieve the employer of his liability for such compensation when the facts and circumstances of such injury are known to such employer or his agent.

SEC. 18. That when an injury or death for which compensation is payable under this act is caused under circumstances also creating a legal liability for damages on the part of any carrier subject to the provisions of this act other than the employer, the right of the employee to recover against such other carrier shall be subrogated to the employer, and such employer may bring legal proceedings against such carrier to recover the damages sustained by the injured employee in an amount not exceeding the aggregate amount of compensation payable to the injured employee under this act. When an injury or death for which compensation is payable under this act is caused under circumstances also creating a legal liability for damages on the part of any person other than the employer, such person not being subject to the provisions of this act, legal proceedings may be taken against such other person to recover damages, notwithstanding the payment of or liability to pay compensation under this act; but if action is brought against such other person by the injured employee, or in case of his death by his dependents, and judgment is obtained and paid, or settlement is made with such other person, either with or without suit, the employer shall be entitled to deduct from the compensation paid or to be paid by him the amount so received by such employee or dependents: Provided, That if the injured employee, or in case of his death his dependents, shall agree to receive compensation or institute proceedings to recover the same, or accept from the employer any payment on account of such compensation, such employer shall be subrogated to all the rights of such employee or dependents, and may maintain, or in case an action has already been instituted, may continue, an action either in the name of the employee or dependents or in his own name against such other person for the recovery of damages; but such employer shall nevertheless pay over to the injured employee or dependents all sums collected from such other person by judgment or otherwise in excess of the amount of such compensation paid and to be paid under this act, and costs, attorney's fees, and reasonable expenses incurred by such employer in making such collection or enforcing such liability.

SEC. 19. That notwithstanding any agreement, award, or finding as hereinbefore provided, compensation shall not be paid for any case of disability while the injured employee is at work at wages which equal the established day's earnings he was receiving at the time of his injury. His failure to earn wages equal to what he was receiving at the time of his injury as aforesaid shall entitle him to compensation as provided in clause (e) of section 7.

SEC. 20. That if any employee entitled to compensation under this act shall at the time of his injury be employed and paid jointly by two or more employers subject to this act, such employers shall contribute to the payment of such compensation in the proportion of their several wage liabilities to such employee. If one or more, but not all, of such employers are subject to this act, then the liability of such of them as are so subject shall be to pay the proportion of the entire compensation which their proportionate wage liability bears to the entire wages of the employee: Provided, however, That nothing in this section shall prevent any arrangement between such employers for a different distribution as between themselves of the ultimate burden of such compensation.

SEC. 21. When payment of compensation is made to a widow for the use of herself, or for the use of herself and child or children, her written receipt therefor shall acquit the employer. When payment is made to any child or other dependent 18 years of age or over, the written receipt therefor of such child or other dependent shall acquit the employer. When payment is due to any child under the age of 18 years, the payment shall be made to a duly appointed and qualified guardian of such child under the laws of the State of such child's residence, and the written receipt therefor of such guardian shall acquit the employer.

SEC. 22. That when compensation is being paid under this act to any dependent, such compensation shall cease upon the death or marriage of such dependent or whenever such dependent shall become self-supporting. Upon the remarriage of any widow receiving compensation under this act a sum of money equal to 20 monthly payments, as provided in section 6, but not less than $1,000, shall be paid to such widow, and further payment of compensation to such widow shall cease.

SEC. 23. That no employee subject to the provisions of this act, nor any beneficiary hereunder, shall have power to waive any of its provisions with respect to the amount of compensation which may be payable to such employee or beneficiary hereunder.

SEC. 24. That any contract or agreement made by any employee or dependent within seven calendar days after an injury, with any employer or his agent, or with any attorney, with respect to the prosecution or settlement of any claim for compensation under this act shall be presumed to be fraudulent.

SEC. 25. That any contract of employment, relief benefit, or insurance, or other device whereby the employee is required to pay any premium or premiums for insurance against the compensation provided for in this act, shall be null and void; and any employer withholding from the wages of any employee any amount for the purpose of paying any such premium shall be guilty of a misdemeanor, punishable by a fine of not less than $500 nor more than $1,000, in the discretion of the court.

SEC. 26. That any employee or dependent who shall become entitled to compensation under the provisions of this act, in the event of his inability to recover such compensation from the employer on account of his insolvency or other cause, shall be subrogated to all the rights of such employer against any insurance company or association which may have insured such employer against loss growing out of the compensation required to be paid by the provisions of this act, and in such case only a payment of the full amount of compensation that has accrued to the person entitled thereto, in accordance with the provisions of this act, shall relieve such insurance company or association from such liability.

SEC. 27. That the assignment of any cause of action arising under this act, or of any payments due or to become due under the provisions of this act, shall be void. Every liability and all payments due or to become due under this act shall be exempt from levy or sale for private debt. Every liability for compensation under this act shall constitute a first lien upon all the property of the employer liable therefor paramount to all other claims or liens, except for wages and taxes, and in case of insolvency shall be enforced by order of the court.

SEC. 28. That the term "dependent" shall include all persons who are entitled to receive compensation under the provisions of section 6, and wherever the context requires it, shall be held to include the personal representative of the deceased and guardians of infants or incompetent persons.

The term "injury" shall be held to include an injury resulting in death.

The term "employee" includes an apprentice and any person who is irregularly employed at the employment in which his injury occurred, but does not include one whose employment is purely casual and not for the purpose of the employer's business. It shall include the singular and the plural and both sexes. Any reference to an employee who has been injured shall, where the employee is dead and the context requires it, include a reference to his dependents or personal representatives.

The term "child or children" shall include posthumous children and all other children entitled, by the law of the State where the injury occurred, to inherit as children of the deceased employee.

The term "disability" shall mean want of capacity or ability by reason of injury to make full wages and full time in the position where the employee was working at the time of receiving his injury.

The phrase "personal injury arising out of and in the course of his employment" shall be held to cover an employee while engaged in the service of the employer in, on, or about the premises occupied by or under the control of the employer, where the employee's services are being performed, or while such employee is engaged elsewhere in or about his employer's business where his service requires his presence as a part of such service at the time of the injury and subjects him to dangers incident to that employment. It shall not include an injury caused by the willful act of another directed against the employee for reasons personal to such employee and not against him as an employee or because of his employment.

SEC. 29. That nothing herein contained shall be construed as doing away with or affecting any common-law or statutory right of action or remedy for personal injury or death happening before this act shall take effect.

SEC. 30. That nothing in this act shall interfere with any proceeding by the Government to enforce any act of Congress regulating the appliances or conduct of any common carrier, or affect the liability of any such common carrier to a fine or penalty under any such act.

SEC. 31. That 60 days after the passage of this act every common carrier subject to the regulative power of Congress shall be liable for the following excise taxes for the purpose of paying the administrative expenses of this act, and for paying the compensation herein provided for, namely:

First. There shall be levied, collected, and paid on every car or motor vehicle used in the transportation of persons or property on the lines of every common carrier subject to this act, whether steam or electric lines, an excise tax of $6 per year.

Second. There is hereby levied, and there shall be payable by every telegraph company operated along the line of or connected with any telegraph line built, constructed, or maintained along the line of any railroad and telegraph line to which the United States has granted subsidies, or which telegraph line shall have accepted the provisions of Title 65 of the Revised Statutes, an excise tax of $50,000 for and in respect of its plant within the District of Columbia.

Third. Every express company subject to this act shall pay an excise tax of $5 per year on every wagon or other vehicle used by it in the collection, distribution, and delivery of express matter, and on every car used exclusively by any express company on any line of railroad for the transportation of express matter a tax of $5 per year shall be levied and paid.

SEC. 32. That every common carrier subject to the taxes named in this act who carries on business without having paid the car or vehicle or telegraph excise tax herein provided for shall, in addition to being liable to the payment of said tax, be fined not less than $1,000 and not more than $5,000, and every distinct violation shall be a separate offense, and in case of a continuing offense each day shall be deemed a separate offense; and unless otherwise limited, all fines, penalties, and forfeitures imposed by this act or by any section of the Revised Statutes may be recovered in any court of competent jurisdiction. All laws relating to the collection, remission, and refund of internal-revenue taxes, so far as applicable and not inconsistent with the provisions of this act, are hereby extended and made applicable to the excise taxes hereby imposed, and all penalties, fines, matters of form and procedure, heretofore enacted for the collection of the internal revenue under an act to provide ways and means to meet war expenditures, and for other purposes, approved June 13, 1898 (30 Stat. L., 448), are made applicable to the collection of the revenue and the enforcement of this act as fully as though said act had not been repealed but had continued in full force and effect; and sections 3232, 3233, 3236, 3237, 3238, 3239, 3240, and 3243 of the Revised Statutes of the United States are, so far as applicable, made to extend to and include and apply to the special excises or internal-revenue taxes imposed by this act, and to the persons, natural or corporate, upon whom they are imposed, as fully as though they or any one of them were herein set forth at length: Provided, That the provisions of this act in respect of taxation of vehicles on the lines and of mileage taxation of telegraphic lines shall be, and they are, declared to be suspended in respect of any carrier accepting this act in the manner herein set forth, and after such acceptance abiding by and complying with the provisions of this act.

Whenever the Interstate Commerce Commission shall have certified to the Secretary of the Treasury that any such common carrier has not complied with the orders of said commission in respect of paying any compensation due, it shall be the duty of said Secretary of the Treasury to collect the excise taxes hereby imposed during or for such time or times as said carrier is not complying with any lawful orders of said commission with respect to the matters contained in this act. Said excise taxes under the provisions of this act when collected and paid into the Treasury of the United States shall be, and they are hereby, specifically reappropriated, and shall constitute a permanent appropriation, to be called the "Federal compensation fund," to pay any compensation not paid by any carrier or person subject to this act, pursuant to any lawful order of said commission, and to meet the necessary expenses of administering this act; and all acts heretofore passed in aid of pensioners of the United States in respect of limitation of attorneys' fees, proof of claim, allowance, and payment and audit, are hereby, as far as applicable, extended to any funds exacted, collected, appropriated, and to be disbursed pursuant to this act.

SEC. 33. That it shall be the duty of every employer subject to the provisions of this act to make quarterly returns of accident payments and operations under this act to the Interstate Commerce Commission in such detail and form as the said commission may by general regulation require. Such reports shall be compiled by said commission, and the results made public in such manner as the said commission may determine.

SEC. 34. That it is hereby declared to be the intent and purpose of this act and the policy of Congress that the financial burden of injury and death to employees in industries subject to the regulative power of Congress, arising out of and in the course of, the operation of such industries, shall be placed upon the industries involved; and the Interstate Commerce Commission is hereby empowered and directed to make all regulations reasonable and necessary, not herein provided for, to give effect to the provisions of this act and to accomplish its declared intent and purpose. To this end the said commission shall consider the payments authorized herein to be an element of the cost of transportation or the operation of the industries affected by this act, and in any proceedings affecting rates the said commission is directed to recognize and give effect to the intent and purpose of this act.

SEC. 35. That the scale of compensation herein provided for shall be recognized by the United States Government in all industries operated by it directly or in its behalf, by contract or otherwise, and all said employees of the Government of the United States shall be entitled to all the benefits and privileges of this act, and to that end it is hereby declared that the Government of the United States has elected to accept the provisions of this act with respect to all of its civil employees, however or wherever employed.

SEC. 36. That this act shall take effect on the 1st day of January, 1913, and shall be cited as the Federal compensation act of 1913.

I am firmly of the belief that the inherent risks in railroading and other dangerous occupations should be borne by the carriers and the industries instead of by the employees or those dependent upon them, and all of the bills which I have introduced have been so drafted as to accomplish this.

Mr. Speaker, the measure now under consideration, instead of protecting the employee has the opposite effect, it safeguards the railroads from injured employees. In the first place, it limits the maximum amount that can be recovered; and not content with this, it then places every possible obstruction in the way of the recovery of that limited amount. I favor a workmen's compensation bill that will give immediate relief and just compensation without litigation. This bill which is now before the House will not lessen litigation, in fact, it will increase it, for it will be impossible for the injured employees or their survivors to recover the large judgments that they have received in many cases in the past, and the railroads, no longer having this to fear, will refuse to agree to a settlement, preferring to carry the matter to the courts.

I now wish to insert my speech of May 26, 1908, in favor of workmen's compensation:

Mr. Speaker, owing to lack of opportunity to deliver my views on my compensation bill, H. R. 16739, printed in its present form February 10, 1908, and to the inability to obtain the floor of the House for the purpose of considering my bill I avail myself of this opportunity to present to the American people, under the privilege of leave to print, the remarks which follow.

The vast importance of the subject, its novelty as applied to the employees of all carriers of all interstate railroads, require a certain elaboration of this, the first general compensation bill.

The vitally important subject of the general compensation bill has been approved in principle by President Roosevelt, and it is proper that the attention of the people should be called to the general provisions of my general American compensation bill H. R. 16739, which may be found printed in the course of these remarks.

In the course of an experience of over 12 years on the bench in Chicago, one of the greatest cities in the world, every kind and class of cases were brought before me. My duty not only consisted in enforcing the laws, but in attempting to alleviate the misery and the damages caused by our modern economic system. This last function was impressed on me by the horrible cases of breaking up of families, degradation of the widows, and ruin of the daughters, caused by the loss of the father's or brother's earning power. Years and years of litigation, appeals, new trials, and all the necessary steps of our modern procedure brought it about that the results of the litigation were wasted, and social degradation of the family, without any fault of their own, ensued. Gradually the idea became stronger and stronger in my mind that some method must be found whereby this can be changed.

Inquiry into the circumstances which had induced foreign Governments to investigate all phases of the industrial situation abroad and enact adequate remedial legislation for the specific instances disclosed as requiring further official regulation, convinced me of the similar necessity resting upon us here to take up the problem and bring about some form of relief.

The object of my compensation bill (H. R. 16739), as of all compensation acts, is to correct what heretofore has amounted to a denial of justice.

Everyone of us is sworn to support the Constitution of the United States and, by inference, to afford to the people, our constituents and our fellow citizens, due process of law. The Constitution is a growing and living organism and entity. It has protected commerce from the canal boat and the post rider to the steam railroad, electric traction, telegraph, and telephone; and there is no reason why the persons employed in interstate commerce should be left to remedies which were thought adequate at a time when the simple relation between master and servant was not interfered with by colossal machinery and a complicated system of industrial organization.

INADEQUACY OF THE AMERICAN SYSTEM OF DAMAGES.

The theory of American law is that the contract between the employer and his employee, called at common law "his servant," is ample to take care of the person who is injured by reason of the contract. The law furthermore proceeds on the theory that the damages may be sought primarily against the wrongdoer. As a matter of fact, the injured persons in the complicated system inherent in our modern industrial conditions has no redress, because the person who primarily caused the wrong is financially unable to respond in damages. The law then allows an action against the master at common law on formal proof, with burden upon the person injured to show negligence, and puts the burden, as it should in all actions, upon the injured employee or widow, to sustain the cause of action against the master.

The reason for the rule has changed so entirely and the exceptions which have been ingrafted by the courts have become so noxious that the social problem has been overlooked or pushed aside for the benefit of legal jugglery and hair-splitting distinctions by great judges. The administration of the law has become so refined, delicate, and neat, for the purpose of maintaining the rights of the possessing classes or corporations, that the more important question, the human question, the question of humanity and of social justice of the complainant, is utterly forgotten in the defense of vested rights.

I do not go as far as Lewis, who states that vested rights may always be called intrenched wrongs; but I do claim that the maintenance of a rule which was harsh when it was started, which has become unjust in its operation, which under the totally changed industrial conditions under which great operations of manufacturing, of commerce, and of interstate commerce must be carried on, becomes a pernicious and dangerous form, because under the guise of exercising the law it brings about a denial of justice, and induces a feeling of distrust for the courts which it is hard to overcome.

When it is remembered that we hold all our property, in the last instance, through the forbearance and self-control of the vast class of persons who are at risk day by day, and who, were they united, could rend and tear not only our possessions, but our very bodies, it is surprising to see the dense carelessness of the possessing community before this great—I had almost said class; but there are no classes in America; at least it is so claimed.

But, Mr. Speaker, the method which has been pursued by the courts in enforcing the strict letter of the law has brought about a feeling that injustice is done to the employee in nearly every instance, which injustice is due not to the administration of the law, but to the inherent injustice of the theory and its perverse construction. The litigation which is necessary to enforce the rights of these persons at common law brings out the extreme of the law, which is always injustice.

The suitors in these cases are our maimed fellow citizens, or, in the event of his death, his widow or the guardian ad litem for his orphans. In no case do they stand before the court equally prepared with a great corporation which defends the action. It is absurd on the part of any person who has ever practiced even a few years in any court to say that the poor man can hire a great lawyer. His social and economic condition, his lack of relation to the great leaders of the bar, his very maimed condition or the depressed position, through the loss of the father, all prevent him or them having access to any except the ordinary persons who take these cases on contingent fees. That is the average rule. But let us assume that the widow or the injured person has the very best counsel, that they have counsel who are so impressed with their duty to the public and to the court and so carried along by the desire to do justice that, although they have been defeated in one court, they will appeal and appeal, and follow their first victory from the lower courts to the Supreme Court of the United States, until the law ultimately says that the corporation must pay damages.

In the course of these remarks I shall have to submit so many series of statistics that I shall not burden the RECORD with any unnecessary material, but a careful investigation has convinced me that the plaintiest and quickest litigants never get a final determination under four years, and that cases have been in the circuit court of appeals (Erie Rwy. Co. v. Kane) four times (118 F. R., 223; 142 F. R., 682; 155 F. R., 118), and the litigation has lasted 10 years. The accident to Kane occurred December 17, 1897; the circuit court of appeals handed down its opinion June 26, 1907. In cases of great historical importance, such as Johnson v. Southern Pacific Co., the injury took place within four days after the safety-appliance act went into effect, in August, 1900. The action was finally decided by the Supreme Court on December 19, 1904 (196 U. S., 1), and finally, in May, 1908, eight years after his injury, Johnson has received a slight sum by way of settlement with the company.

In the Schlemmer case the injury occurred within a day or two after the safety-appliance act went into effect; the case was decided by the Supreme Court on March 4, 1907 (205 U. S., 1), in favor of Schlemmer's widow, who on the second trial obtained a verdict against the carrier recently, and the action is now on its indeterminable route of delay to the higher State courts, and possibly will again return to the Supreme Court of the United States. Now, what do you think, Mr. Speaker, becomes of the widow in the interim? What care is taken of the children, and what has the State done to relieve itself of the duty which it owes to Schlemmer and to Johnson and to thousands and thousands of railway employees similarly situated all over the country? The litigation which these people are forced to undertake under the process of our common law, even if successful, is inefficacious. The fruits of the litigation are wasted in attorney's fees, printing cases, and costs, and to the repayment of debts necessary to maintain the family. The social standard of the survivors has been lowered or else the family has gone to pieces; the maimed man, if he has not died of his injuries, has become a tramp; the children have been taken from school; the families have been split up and separated perhaps forever.

Or let us take the case of a woman who was injured through the violation of the master in not guarding his machinery. St. Louis Cordage Co. v. Miller (126 F. R., 495) is a case in which Walter Sanborn, C. J., of the circuit court of appeals for the eighth circuit, wrote a very painstaking, carefully thought out, and exquisitely inhuman opinion. The woman, after having had her hand mashed in a cog, was thrown out of court. The judge writing the opinion of the court claimed that, although the factory act of Missouri protected her, yet she assumed the risk of her employment and must go forth without damages. Now, what can a factory hand do who has had a right hand or arm mashed? The probabilities are that she is unfit for domestic employment; her tastes, her habits have been fixed; the court throws her out. If there is any method for that woman to earn her living except to go on the streets, it is not due to any care that the State has taken to protect her from the prospective evils; and surely the State owes these people some kind of a fair chance. These are our fellow citizens; these are people whose places may be taken in two or three generations from among the children of those sitting in this Chamber. In this country it is three generations from shirt sleeves to shirt sleeves, and the very thing we may overlook in the case of others may happen to our grandchildren or to their children, caught by and dragged down in the maelstrom of industrial coercion.

The courts will say that the laborer is free; that he chooses his occupation; that if he takes up a dangerous occupation he takes the risk—he does it with his eyes open; he is compensated for it, and that his wages in part may be used, if properly employed, toward buying insurance in some industrial or accident corporation to compensate him for the risk which he is bound to take. Is it not a truism, which must only be stated to be understood, that the choice or freedom of the laborers is entirely illusory; that they have no choice; that the fiction which claims to treat them as free agents is overcome by the actualities of their conditions, which make wage slaves of them all; that the wages are always so small and purchase so little, thanks to the protective system and to the trusts, that adequate self-insurance is impossible, and that very, very few of them have any insurance which will, under the present régime, keep their families out of the poorhouse?

DANGERS INHERENT IN ALL GREAT ENTERPRISES.

Let us briefly consider the financial burden imposed upon railroad employees by the casualties which are an incident of their calling. It is well known that employees in railroad train service are unable to procure insurance in any of the old-line companies except at rates that are practically prohibitive, while most of the companies absolutely refuse to accept such risks under any consideration. Certain of the companies will write 5, 10, and 15 year endowment policies for switchmen—a small portion of the employees under consideration—at premiums based upon a 20-year advance in age; thus, for instance, a switchman aged 25 years may obtain such a policy by paying the 45-year endowment premium rate. Inasmuch as insurance premium rates are based upon broad observation and are always the result of careful and accurate consideration, this fact is vastly significant. It means that the man who embraces the occupation of railroad switchman thereby at once cuts 20 years off his reasonable expectancy of life. If there is any compensating advantage in this occupation to offset the horror of this grim fact, I have failed to discover it in more than 10 years' close observation of the conditions of railway labor.

Being denied the benefits of ordinary insurance, railroad employees have been compelled to establish and maintain insurance societies of their own. Those societies are never called upon to pay death claims as a result of old age. Their payments, however, on account of railroad accidents are surprisingly large, and in most of the organizations represent a major portion of the total claims paid. In the year 1906 the Brotherhood of Railroad Trainmen, with a membership of 82,937, composed of conductors, brakemen, switchmen, and baggagemen, paid 1,350 claims, amounting to a total of $1,671,548.96.

More than two-thirds of these claims, or 927 of the whole number, representing a cash total of considerably more than a million dollars, were paid as a result of deaths and disabilities caused by railroad accidents. During the year ending June 30, 1907, the Brotherhood of Locomotive Firemen and Enginemen, with a membership of about 63,000 engineers and firemen, paid 663 death and disability claims, amounting to $947,100. More than 51 per cent of these claims, or 340 of the whole number, representing a cash payment of $489,500, were paid on account of deaths and disabilities caused by railroad accidents. The Switchmen's Union of North America is a comparatively small organization, with membership confined to switchmen employed in railroad-yard service. Last year (1906) this organization paid 179 death and disability claims. Three-fourths of these claims, or 128 of the whole number, were paid for deaths or disabilities incurred by members while in the ordinary discharge of their vocation.

Why should this enormous toll of life and treasure be exacted from railroad employees? Does the efficient operation of the Nation's splendid transportation system require that this great burden should remain where it now lies? Suppose we admit that the terrible sacrifice of lives and limbs is a necessary concomitant of railroad operation. Suppose we resign ourselves with oriental fatalism to the belief that our transportation juggernaut must continue to crush out the lives of its operatives without abatement. Even then, can we excuse ourselves for saddling upon those operatives the financial burden of providing for the needs of their widows and orphans, made such by the very exigencies of the industry itself? Is it not more to the point and more akin to justice that this burden should be assumed by the transportation industry and, through it, by society as a whole?

At the time when the law of master and servant received the form which we are now contending is utterly unjust, the industries were just beginning to receive the beneficent effect of the application of steam to machinery theretofore driven by human hands. The great decisions upon which the law of master and servant is based were rendered in the early thirties of the last century. They were rendered by men who had reached the place of chief justice long after the conditions under which the old theory of master and servant had developed—Ellenbrough in England and Chief Justice Shaw in Massachusetts. In laying down the law of fellow servants, as applied to railroads, they were but expounding the law as they had learned it when economic conditions were simple, when the master knew every person employed by him, and when the employee had a chance to say to his employer: "This man is a reckless and dangerous fellow, regardless of the rights of his fellow men, and I refuse to work with him. You have the choice between keeping me or discharging him." The mere statement of this rule, applied to modern conditions, shows that it is impossible of application.

LACK OF IMAGINATION.

Lombroso, one of the great psychologists in criminology, has well stated that great crimes—and certainly mass crimes—never can be committed unless there is a dullness of imagination or lack of nervous sentiency on the part of the perpetrator.

Probably the greatest railroad men in this country would shudder at the idea of becoming personally responsible for the existence and the choice of men in the thousand and one different branches of the enterprises in which their companies are involved. The machinery has become so colossal that the master can not inspect, can not supervise, and himself becomes a part of the carelessness induced by the modern forms of corporate management. The unavoidable requirement of specialization necessitates their devoting their intelligence and energy to one definite thing. No one man is therefore deliberately accountable for the horrors which follow the administration of the antiquated system of master and servant's law; each man can shift the responsibility upon that great entity created and sanctioned by the State or Federal governments, the corporation, and say: "We are not responsible. We are paid to do a definite amount of work, and as long as we do that work society at large—the State—should bear the burden." Were it possible to bring these men into one room with the victims and show to them the consequences of their hiding behind the forms of corporate coldness of heart, I believe that many of them would resign their places rather than resist the enactment of a humane compensation act which would avert crushing misery and a lowering of the social standard of the persons involved, if not total degradation of their fellow-citizens.

The accidents which occur in all industries involving dangerous machinery, such as factories, steel mills, coal mines, quartz mines, and other extractive industries, in their widest scope, are not subjects over which the Congress of the United States has jurisdiction directly, and do not concern us in the present discussion.

Limiting the discussion to the employees of railroads engaged in interstate commerce and to such other carriers as are subject to the power of Congress, I propose to show, principally from the statistics based on returns furnished by the carriers themselves, in accordance with law compiled by the Interstate Commerce Commission, that railroads require a regular percentage of life, limbs, and health of our fellow-citizens; that the number of men killed and injured is a regularly recurring number; that this number constantly increases, but is in regular proportion with the mileage operated; that a certain proportion of the manhood of this country is slaughtered every minute of the 24 hours of every day; that a regularly recurring number of our young men is each year thrown aside as "scrap," and, as far as the present system of administration of the law of master and servant is concerned, as far as prompt and effective compensation goes, is as valueless to the community at large as the rotten ties which we see moldering along the tracks of every railway in these great United States.

This is a startling statement to make, were it not proven to the hilt by statistics. These statistics cover a period of 20 years and are taken from the figures accessible to every man, published by the Interstate Commerce Commission, pursuant to the great law of its organization.

ANALYSIS OF SUMMARIES.

Summary A.—The first summary presented shows the number of railway employees killed, the number injured, and the total casualties for 20 years from 1888, the first year after the establishment of the Interstate Commerce Commission, to 1907, inclusive. During this period 53,046 employees lost their lives at the post of duty and over 800,000 employees were either maimed or crippled. The total casualties numbered 865,227, an average for the 20 years covered of over 43,000 a year. The per cent column is introduced to facilitate comparison of the years given with the total figures for the entire period.

Summary B.—The next summary shows the number of employees in service and the proportion killed and injured. The falling off in the number employed, as indicated by the figures for the years 1894 to 1898, was due to the panic of 1893, and reflects one of the economies introduced by the railway managements during the hard times following this financial crisis. The per cent column for employees killed clearly indicates the constant recurring death risk of the railway employee. There is hardly any perceptible fluctuation of this ratio for the years shown, and means approximately that 1 employee out of every 400 in service was killed each year. The proportion of injured has gradually increased each year until for 1907, the last year covered, the 5.24 per cent given indicates that 1 employee out of every 20 in service is injured, or that an employee in the service of a railway for 10 years has an even chance of being injured.

Summary C.—This summary, showing the mileage operated and the number of employees killed and injured per 100 miles of line, reflects from another angle the constant recurring death risk year after year. The number injured increases each year in a greater ratio than the mileage operated, and apparently substantiates the results shown by the injured column of Summary B.

Summary D.—The last summary presented shows the number of minutes elapsing for each casualty and the average number of casualties per day. Approximately in every seven minutes of every hour of every day for the last four years named 1 employee was killed or injured. During the 20 years covered the average was 1 killed or injured for every 15 minutes of this entire period. The average killed each day for the whole period covered was 7 and the average injured 111.

EQUIPMENT MORE VALUABLE THAN HUMAN LIVES.

The necessary factors of railroad operation are sentient and insentient—human beings and the tools and materials with which they work. Both are subjected to wear and tear; both are wasted in the performance of their functions. The railroads bear the expense of repairing and replacing the waste of their insentient instruments of operation—the wear and tear of roadbed and track, bridges and buildings, locomotives and cars—but for the 865,227 men killed and injured in 20 years they have no concern. The waste of human life and limb, the wear and tear of that active, intelligent army of human beings whose labor alone makes their operation possible is not a necessary item in the expense account of railroads.

As was said by Prof. Bushnell in a recent thought-provoking article calling attention to the alarming increase in the number of abnormal dependents in the United States:

"Soldiers suffer because they are professional destroyers, but members of this great industrial army are struck down every year in this country because they are producers. This is the price they have to pay for the privilege of earning their bread in serving civilization."

It is to the credit of President Roosevelt that he has perceived the essential injustice of this situation and has earnestly endeavored to correct it, not alone by advocating the passage of employers' liability and workmen's compensation acts, but by insisting upon a rigid enforcement of Federal statutes calculated to reduce the number of accidents, as well as pointing out the need of strengthening or supplementing such legislation in the interest of greater safety.

The keynote of this effort was struck by the President in his Georgia day speech at Jamestown, when, on June 10, 1907, in discussing the question of industrial accidents, he said:

"Legislation should be had, alike from the Nation and from the States, not only to guard against the needless multiplication of these accidents, but to relieve the financial suffering due to them. * * * It is neither just, expedient, nor humane, it is revolting to judgment and sentiment alike, that the financial burden of accidents occurring because of the necessary exigencies of their daily occupation should be thrust upon those sufferers who are least able to bear it, and that such remedy as is theirs should only be obtained by litigation which now burdens our courts."

Directly, this would affect a very small portion of the community. The freight charges might affect a still larger portion of the community, but, at all events, it is proper that the community which indirectly causes the railways to be so inhuman to the fellow citizens of us all should permit a recoupment, because in the last instance the people at large pay for the maimed and injured. They do this by taking care of those survivors of those thousands of railroad men whose families have fallen in the scale of life, who therefore will breed inferior children, who, in some form or other, contribute to the asylums and the jails, because there is no hope for the unfit and the injured. The vast army of hoboes and tramps, in many instances, is recruited from persons who have been blacklisted because they testified against the railway company on the trial for a fellow servant or have dared to raise their voices for the betterment of their and their fellow workers' conditions. (Adair v. United States, 208 U. S., 161.)

Coxey's army, ridiculous in its way, was a silent and peaceful protest, which some day may become of entirely a different character unless the persons who compose the hobo army are decreased. These hoboes, in part, were persons who were blacklisted by the corporations because of various things which they had done which affected the carriers; and nothing offends the carriers so much as to have a man go on the stand and bear witness against what they consider their rights in favor of an injured fellow employee.

INTERSTATE COMMERCE—ITS REGULATION.

It is characteristic of the workings of a democracy that no coherent plan of regulation is carried out in the beautiful unital way characteristic of bureaucracies. To some extent this is to be regretted, but it is more important that people should be free and make their mistakes than that they should be well governed and simply the slaves of their own servants.

Heretofore our attempts at the regulation of interstate commerce have been principally in the direction of reducing the inequalities of service; attempting to enforce just rates and giving localities an opportunity to protest against discrimination and manifest favoritism. The attempts of the Government to pass an employers' liability bill have been stricken down by the Supreme Court of the United States, and it does not become me, who has once administered justice, to criticize the action of our Supreme Court.

The object of my bill (H. R. 16739), printed hereinafter, is to do away with the necessity or the possibility of any such construction as has been put upon the acts of Congress in the case of Howard v. The Illinois Central and Brooks v. The Southern Pacific, commonly called the "employers' liability act decision." It is a significant fact that the property rights of the carriers are protected; that in the Debs case the Supreme Court found warrant to preserve the movement of postal cars, freight trains, and passenger coaches; that in Lennon's case a man was fined for refusing to haul an empty car lying on a sidetrack, although it was claimed to be a part of the interstate commerce of the country, while in the Johnson case below (117 F. R., 462) Judge Sanborn—of the same circuit court of appeals which decided the Cordage case against Miller—held that a dining car lying at a way station in Utah not equipped in accordance with the safety-appliance act was not subject to the safety-appliance act. The Supreme Court remedied the construction of the law in that particular case, but could afford no proper justice, for Johnson has not received any damages as a consequence of eight years of litigation, and finally was paid a small sum by way of settlement. Whenever a strike is threatened the carrier invokes the Federal character of the commerce and the persons involved go to jail (re Debs); when a receivership is asked for and a strike is threatened, the Federal character of the court having jurisdiction protects the commerce, and the person inciting to a strike is fined for contempt (re Phelan).

RECURRENCE OF INJURY.

This is in exceptional cases. Strikes do not take place every day. Riots, such as were claimed by the railways to have been caused by the American Railway Union in Chicago, are not of daily occurrence, but the movement of freight trains and of passenger equipment is of hourly and daily occurrence to an extent undreamed of by a person who has not watched it, and when in this regularly recurring series of movements of trains one man is killed or injured every seven minutes of every hour of every day and night, his children are left to starve; his widow may be forced to sell all she possesses; the standard of life of four to six people is lowered and an American family is put on the "bum" while the courts for 8 or 10 years are blocked with wrangle of counsel and the pounding out of new distinctions of a law which is archaic, which was unfair when created, and which has become disastrously reactionary when enforced at the present time under modern industrial conditions. The systematized injustice, the denial of justice caused by the enforcement of antiquated laws—laws which the English, who originated them, have long since discarded as inept, as dangerous to their commercial progress—are retained by us as bulwarks of corporate resistance to social betterment and civilizing uplift.

We talk of the enlightenment of the American. We find it necessary to support missionary societies to carry the Gospel to heathen countries. We send thousands of school-teachers to the Philippine Islands; we send battleships to Asia Minor to protect American colleges against the outrages of the Turk, when it is a fact that America and Turkey stand preeminent in this, that no Federal or national compensation acts prevail in either Turkey or the United States, and that on the rest of the Continent the theory which formerly prevailed in England and which now prevails in these United States has been utterly discarded, abolished, and cast aside as antiquated and unfair, as antisocial, as un-Christian, and as dangerous to the modern industrial state.

The tendency of modern civilization in standardizing all things that are in daily use, in fixing the thread on the screw so that the screw that is turned out in Manchester or in Pittsburgh will fit; that the bolts which are put in the bridge at the bridge works in Pittsburgh will fit when laid down on the great bridges across the Nile at Atbara, require such close calculation that commercial progress and national efficiency in the last instance depend upon the perfection of the ways of communication. The country whose railroads, canals, and waterways are most efficient will ultimately win. The size of the country and its resources are nothing as compared with its efficiency. Its efficiency depends directly upon the ease with which the forces necessary to handling the commerce are recruited. Consequently, in a country so vast as ours, where in many instances the only highway known to two generations has been the railway, success depends directly upon the efficiency of this method of communication.

When, therefore, whole classes of citizens have been crushed out, thrown aside as scrap, the feeling of resentment against the carrier harms its efficiency and thereby hurts the national thrust forward in international commerce. For every pensioner that the United States Government maintains in every hamlet and wayside station, we may be assured that the broken families and wrecked men and the memories of some uncompensated loss feed an undying dislike, hatred, or malignant hostility to the great and necessary railways of the country, and indirectly against the country that has permitted 865,227 men killed or injured to be cast aside as scrap without prompt, permanent, and just compensation. The excuse has been the country was growing and we had no time to regard these problems.

A democracy can only take up one or two things in a generation and settle them, but the time has come, Mr. Speaker, when it becomes necessary for us to seriously weigh the danger of permitting corporate cupidity to continue a system of licensed butchery and murder, of permissive breaking up of families, of degrading the standard of American citizenship, infinitely worse than the slavery which was broken up 40 years ago, because that was confined to a small group, which inevitably was bound to come to encounter the economic progress of the rest of the world, restricted in area, whereas our present system, if continued, will inevitably lead to a growth of a feeling that a class, comprising a million and a half of men, consequently seven and a half million of American citizens, is being discriminated against, while the freight that they move and the passengers that they haul are to obtain the most favorable consideration at the hands of this body.

Germany, and in Germany preeminently Prussia, blazed the way. Germany was followed by England, New Zealand, and Bohemia. The social legislation of these countries stands forth as a great step forward against the antisocial theories with which we are still burdened. Their progress has in no small degree been caused by the efficiency of their workmen, and this, again, is the consequence of the compensation acts, in all their various forms and developments, which these countries have forced upon the Continent. They have forced this upon the Continent, not by the force of arms. The "blood and iron" policy of Bismarck ended when he had thrown France prostrate, and he turned his huge energy to the building up and repairing the ravages of war and making a fact that which the constitution of 1871 had held out to the various German tribes—a unified Germany. Politically this was accomplished very soon; economically the Germans, after the French war, were little better than their ancestors in the thirties or forties in this country; and the modern development of Germany has been caused in no indirect measure by the hearty cooperation of master and servants in every industry. This cooperation is due directly to the necessity of master and servants working together, and this working together was brought about by the necessary machinery called forth in the various compensation acts.

Based on the statistical material obtained from very large and thousands of small cities, Dr. Richard Freund, president of the Invalid and Old Age Insurance Co., of Berlin, in 1895 published a summary on an investigation of the question as to what manner the modern social legislation has affected the problems of poor legislation and the care of the poor. This was published in the Twenty-first Book of the German Society for Poor Relief and Beneficence. It is based on exhaustive statistical material and specially prepared interrogatories. Any Member who cares to read it can obtain it from the Library of Congress, and can find on page 83 the following summary of this statistical publication. He says:

"Even if the time within which the effectiveness of the labor insurance laws has been under observation has been much too short to permit a statement that the influence thereof upon public care of the poor should have completely shown its effect (especially since very unfortunate economic conditions in the last year have disturbed the statistical problem), still we may say that now there is a mighty effect to be recognized, and this although in many cases the organizations charged with administering the laws have not given the attention which is required to work out the statistical effects.

"The administration of care of the poor has been relieved in an important measure from the necessity of taking care of all by labor insurance. The labor insurance laws have in a great measure relieved the laboring population from the necessity of applying for poor relief.

"Labor insurance has done more than this. It has raised the standard of life of the lower classes of population in this short time, and has exercised such a mighty influence that the poor relief, bound to take cognizance of these facts, could use the resulting savings through strengthening and expansion of its services, nay, was forced to expend moneys beyond that."

In a summary of Fifteen Years of Social Legislation the president of the federal insurance office of the German Empire (twenty-eighth volume, Yearbook for Legislation, 1904, published by Schmoller), beginning on page 529, in an article on the progress of the German labor insurance in the last 15 years, states, on page 553, that 10.3 million persons were protected by sick insurance; 19.1 million persons were protected by accident insurance; 13.04 million persons were protected by invalidity insurance, for which purpose annually over 550,000,000 marks (over $131,000,000) were collected, and for whom up to the close of 1903 over 4,000,000,000 marks (nearly $1,000,000,000) were expended; a capital of 1,500,000,000 marks (nearly $400,000,000) were gathered and nearly 400,000,000 marks (nearly $100,000,000) were loaned out by the invalidity insurance associations of their employees, for building and loan associations, farmers' banks, erection of hospitals, sanitaria, tuberculosis homes, and other public and quasi-public institutions, for the purpose of raising and improving the conditions of the German working classes.

The Continent followed the Prussian and German system of social legislation, because it found that the betterment, while not directly quantitative, proved to be an absolute qualitative betterment and showed itself in the efficiency of those persons for whom social care was provided by the State.

In the convention of New York, in 1821, William L. Marcy, afterwards Secretary of State, said, in speaking of the growth of the idea of popular franchise, which was growing toward universal manhood franchise, that "Once having been granted, it could never be taken away, save by the force of bayonets."

And so the conditions of the modern workingman, who reads his paper, who sees that in times of prosperity inordinate profits are reaped from the movement of commerce of the country by those who control a very small majority of a still smaller holding company of a great system of railways; that his condition is no better than that of a wage slave, because the wages are paid to him in not sufficient quantity nor with sufficient regularity to allow him to take a share and lay it aside for labor insurance, or care of himself or his family in his old age; this man, I say, Mr. Speaker, is bound to ask us, his representatives, why it is that the Germans, English, French, Austrians, Spaniards, Italians, in their native land, are taken care of by Governments which we are taught to look down upon as monarchical, as bureaucratic, as inefficient, while in this country—the country of the free, the only true freedom—an injured workman has to "sue his company and be damned."

Sooner or later, Mr. Speaker, the railway employees will demand not that something be done for them by the Nation, but that their employers be directly forced to give them the compensation sought to be enacted in my bill H. R. 16739. I am not afraid of the charge that this is an entering wedge into the entire system of labor conditions. I want it to be an entering wedge.

The Congress of the United States can not legislate for coal mines in Utah, Pennsylvania, or West Virginia, for silver mines in Arizona, for the salt works in New York, or for the numerous trust-owned steel mills of Pittsburgh and Chicago; these are within the police powers of the respective States; but the commerce of this country—which is protected by the decision of the Supreme Court in the Debs case and all similar cases wherever the workingmen struck to better their conditions and where hoboes and rowdies burned cars and impeded the progress of the mails—has been taken charge of as being within the regulative power of Congress, and it is our duty not only to protect the commerce, but the human beings, our fellows, who make it move; it is our duty to pass all legislation which makes for its efficiency and which will keep us abreast of the times. The times are changing. The conditions which possibly were fair when 17 railways handled the freight from New York City to Buffalo have become unfair when the traffic from New York to Chicago, a distance of 996 miles, is handled under unital control. The master can have no idea of the details, is not responsible, as a matter of fact, for the employment, and can not exercise any supervision or selection of the employees in handling this traffic; and yet an employee running a locomotive for 40 years, careful and experienced, diligent and honest, faithful and loyal to his company, if wrecked through the stupidity of a telegraph operator or the untoward accident over which he had no possible control, is put to the proof of showing that he was free from negligence. If he is killed, his widow has the burden of proof to show that the engineer who ran into an open switch or whose locomotive was wrecked in a smash-up with a freight train, over which the engineer had no control, and was without any blame, yet under prevailing conditions she should have no effective compensation except after 8 or 10 years' wrangle, trickery, and litigation, while the railway mail clerks in the postal cars, the persons in the sleepers, or passengers who are behind the locomotive obtain fair compensation for their injuries.

On a troop train rushed forward under the requirement of the act to regulate commerce, which provides (sec. 6, lines 8–13, p. 12) "that in time of war or threatened war preference and precedence shall, upon the demand of the President of the United States, be given, over all other traffic, to the transportation of troops and material of war, and carriers shall adopt every means within their control to facilitate and expedite the military traffic" the only persons not compensated in a fatal wreck would be the trainmen, engineers, and firemen, who are doing the work, while the taxpayers would pay pensions or compensation to every officer, soldier, and other military person enlisted to destroy and wreck property.

For a period of years the Government, to its credit, be it said, has authorized the payment of a small sum ($1,000) for every Railway Mail Service employee killed or dying of injuries contracted in the service within one year.

In other words, we have recognized the inevitable and constantly recurring danger and have taken the initial step in the right direction of compensation. The Government has to that extent, in carrying out the recommendations of the President in respect to this bill (H. R. 21696, a bill granting to certain employees of the United States the right to receive from it compensation for injuries sustained in the course of their employment), only extended the operation of former acts.

A combination of conditions such as I have sketched out, and which are within the knowledge of every Member in this House, can not but lead to a decrease of national efficiency. And this national efficiency, as I have tried to show, affects the international standing of the community. The maimed and killed, their widows, their deceased children, must be taken care of by societies or almshouses or by the community at large in an inefficient manner, when the direct burden which they had assumed is our burden, and we should bear it as a necessity. Ultimately we must bear it in some form. Is it not better and more honest to bear it directly and to make that enterprise as an entity which causes these injuries—crippled and maimed and killed, American citizens all—pay proper and timely compensation for the damage fully and as fairly as they pay for repairs to locomotives, headlights to their engines, new equipment, and general replacement?

The Republican Party has been in control of the Government for 40 years. A very small period of this time excepted, it has controlled the Presidency, the Senate, and this House. In all that period of time the argument has been used that the burdens of the protective tariff were proper and necessary for the purpose of affording to the American workman a higher standard of living and more just compensation. I do not take any credit for not using the present condition of economic slowing down as a weapon for pointing out to the majority of this House the unfairness in not having given compensation to the employees. The solution of the problem is new. We have had other problems to deal with heretofore, and, as I have said, it is characteristic to solve one problem at a time.

I shall on another occasion insert as part of my remarks certain portions of W. J. Ashley's book on the progress of the German working classes in the last quarter of a century (1904), which show that Bismarck's commercial and social policy raised the standard of living and increased the efficiency of the German working classes to an immense degree and made possible the tremendous economic progress of Germany throughout this period as a consideration for the burdens and injustice of a moderate protective tariff.

THE LEGALITY OF THE PROPOSED LEGISLATION.

At the outset of this argument I stated that the system under which employees are bound to sue for damages virtually amounts to a denial of justice.

The greatest draftsman that England ever produced—the cardinal legate, Stephen Langton—forced King John to promise that he and his successors would no longer sell or deny justice to any man and that the law of the land should be applied to every man's grievances.

Our Constitution forbids, in the first eight amendments, the Congress to do certain things. The fourteenth amendment forbids the States abridging the rights of citizens or denying them the benefit of due process of law. The leading case, in which all the previous decisions were reviewed, Holden v. Hardy (169 U. S., 380), summarizes the decisions so clearly that all I shall do is to briefly refer to it.

"In the courts of England"—Mr. Justice Brown said—"while the cardinal principles of justice are immutable, the methods by which justice is administered are subject to constant fluctuation, and that the Constitution of the United States, which is necessarily and to a large extent inflexible and exceedingly difficult of amendment, should not be so construed as to deprive the States of the power to so amend their laws as to make them to conform to the wishes of the citizens as they may deem best for the public welfare, without bringing them into conflict with the supreme law of the land.

"Of course, it is impossible to forecast the character or extent of these changes, but in view of the fact that from the day the 'Magna Charta' was signed to the present moment amendments to the structure of the law have been made with increasing frequency it is impossible to suppose that they will not continue and the law be forced to adapt itself to new conditions of society, and particularly to new relations between employers and employees as they arise."

Although this case affected the mining laws of the State of Utah, yet its reasoning is, I believe, apt to this discussion, when we remember that under power to regulate commerce Congress is absolutely supreme, in so far as the power is sought to affect the relation of the carrier and its employees who are engaged solely in interstate commerce establishing and maintaining post routes.

Very little attention has been given to the power of the Government to refuse to contract for the carriage of the mail with any carrier who might refuse to abide by the provisions of an act like my bill (H. R. 16739). But if the people demand some form of a railroad men's compensation act its terms could be embodied in every contract for handling and hauling the United States mail and the protection afforded by the Revised Statutes withdrawn from any carrier who refused to accept and abide by its provisions.

On page 390 the court states:

"Recognizing the difficulty in defining with exactness the phrase 'due process of law,' it is certain that these words imply a conformity with natural and inherent principles of justice and forbid that one man's property or right to property shall be taken with any other, or for the benefit of the State, without compensation, and that no one shall be condemned in his person or property without an opportunity of being heard in his own defense."

On page 392 the court quotes, with approval, the following extract from the opinion of Chief Justice Shaw, in Commonwealth v. Alger, 7 Cushing, page 53, at page 84:

"Rights of property, like all other social and conventional rights, are subject to such reasonable limitations in their enjoyment as shall prevent them from being injurious and to such reasonable restraints and regulations established by law as the legislature under the governing and controlling power vested in them by the Constitution may think necessary and expedient."

The court states that the power to regulate dangerous industries is necessarily inherent in every form of government, although prior to the adoption of the Constitution but sparingly used in this country:

"As we were even then almost purely an agricultural country, the occasion for any special protection to a particular class did not exist. Certain profitable employments, such as lotteries and the sale of intoxicating liquors, which were then considered to be legitimate, have since fallen under the ban of public opinion and are now almost altogether prohibited or made subject to stringent police regulations.

"But in the vast proportion in which these industries (the business of mining coal and manufacturing iron) have since assumed, it has been found that they can no longer be carried on with due regard to the safety and health of those engaged in them without special protection against the dangers necessarily incident in these employments. In consequence of this, laws have been enacted in most of the States designed to meet these exigencies and secure safety to persons peculiarly exposed to these dangers."

The court then instances ordinances and regulations of various kinds guarding hatches, stairways, elevator shafts, and employment of sanitary appliances, protecting persons against fire in theaters, hotels, factories, and other large buildings, and in the case of the mining industry stating the special provisions made for the shoring up of dangerous wheels, ventilation shafts, signaling to the surface, supplying fresh air, and the elimination as far as possible of dangerous gases, limiting the number of persons permitted to enter the cage, the covering of the cages, and the provision for fences and gates around the top of the shaft, besides other similar precautions.

These statutes, one and all, have been held constitutional within the various States, although imposing on the various industries necessary burdens, on the theory that the State at large was the guardian of those who industrially were unable to contract for their own safety, and that it was necessary to provide against their own greed, as well as the exploitation of their masters or employers.

In this great case the Supreme Court well said, in speaking of the argument that the freedom of the laborer to contract had been infringed upon (p. 397):

"The argument would certainly come with better grace and greater cogency from the latter class, but the fact that both parties are of full age and competent to contract does not necessarily deprive the State of the power to interfere where the parties do not stand upon an equality, or where the public health demands that one party to the contract shall be protected against himself. [My italics.]

"The State still retains an interest in his welfare, however reckless he may be. The whole is no greater than the sum of all the parts, and when the individual health, safety, and welfare are sacrificed or neglected the State must suffer."

It might be assumed that this argument should apply with stronger cogency to the enactment of an employers' liability bill than it would to the remarks which I am addressing to this House in the matter of the compensation act.

The sad experience of every person who has studied the enforcement of employers' liability acts, factory acts, or safety-appliance acts, of every form of palliative legislation except a compensation bill, forces one by a process of exclusion to rely upon the enactment of a compensation act as the only method whereby adequate relief can be given to those who have heretofore been judicially disinherited and have been made to feel the strong arm of the law in a peculiarly atrocious method of whittling away the rights sought to be conferred upon them by State or national legislation. I take the credit for my bill (H. R. 16739) as the first Federal general-compensation bill.

THE ULTIMATE VALIDITY OF THE PROPOSED ACT.

It would be futile for me, Mr. Speaker, to have entered on this discussion were I not convinced that ultimately some legislation such as my bill (H. R. 16739) proposes to enact will become the law of this land, and that those who now scoff at its provisions will be the most earnest upholders of the new industrial conditions, of the social betterment and improved civilization, of which it, in its incipiency, is the forerunner. The act to regulate commerce was enacted in 1887, yet people are apt to forget that as far back as 1871 a bill of like character was introduced, and that the first step toward an attempt to force the carriers engaged in interstate commerce to submit to Federal regulation was introduced by Senator Sumner, of Massachusetts, in 1865. Progress in a country like ours is necessarily slow. Besides overcoming the natural timidity of capital, we must convince the Supreme Court of the United States that in the last instance it is a proper, lawful, and civilizing effort to raise the conditions of the persons who may be living in this great country under and pursuant to the Constitution.

The employers' liability act was declared unconstitutional by a majority of one. Five judges were in favor of declaring its provisions repugnant to the Constitution; four judges, on various grounds, dissented. When in the last analysis a statute is held unconstitutional on so narrow a margin, and when its advocacy and framing has had the benefit of the best legal talent in this House and in the other Chamber, it is proper to refer with respect to an opinion handed down by one judge below, whose opinion was not directly appealed from in the cases before the Supreme Court and whose reasoning has never been assailed in any court whatsoever. In the Circuit Court of the United States for the Eastern Division of the Southern District of Georgia, Hon. Emery Speer decided on the 25th of March, 1907, the case of Lucy Snead, administratrix, v. Central of Georgia Railway Co. In the course of his opinion that eminent judge said:

"The steamboats plying the lower river were thus forbidden access to its wharves. The National Government since its organization had been silent. It finally thought proper to act. The railroads were then informed that unless suitable drawbridges were constructed so that steamers might pass through unhindered their bridges would be removed. In other words, the dormant power of the Constitution was aroused, and the railroads, the creatures of the State, whose action had been theretofore lawful, turned the listening ear and caught the words of that mandate and swiftly obeyed. [My italics.]

"The creation of the Interstate Commerce Commission, the enactment against arbitrary and discriminating rates, of the antitrust law forbidding combinations in restraint of trade, held directly applicable to railroads, even though chartered by the States, the law denouncing rebates and forbidding passes in interstate traffic, the law forbidding a railroad engaged in such commerce from dealing in commodities like coal, which it transports (Railroad v. I. C. C., 200 U. S., 361)—all such legislation culminating in the power exercised by the most recent enactment, intrusting the commission, which is the agent of Congress, with the power to fix rates, and the bill to promote the safety of employees and travelers upon railroads by limiting the hours of service of employees thereon, enacted in the closing hours of the last session, are familiar illustrations of the exercise of the right and power of Congress to control such commerce. It is not difficult to foresee that this power may speedily be extended to reach and to paralyze the action of those daring financiers who water the stock of corporations engaged in interstate traffic, and who by this perilous expedient not only compel the public to pay interest upon evidences of fictitious values thus created, but endanger the stability of all business by the panics they engender and the calamities they threaten. In the meaning of the commerce clause, it is thus made clear that the words 'to regulate' impart the right and power to enact laws, and not merely to make rules and regulations. The necessity for such right and such power, more than all things else, contributed to the very establishment of the Government of the United States itself."

Although argument in that case was specifically directed to the contention that the interference by courts was unlawful in so far as it tried to establish a liability in favor of employees against their employers, and that it might affect in a contingent or casual way the relation of intrastate carriage, yet in the wider scope which this bill proposes to enact it seems to me that it enforces the general arguments to a very great degree.

Judge Spear well says, speaking of the employers' liability act:

"The law itself deserves the approbation of the entire country. Its incentive to carefulness on the part of those who control railways will be immeasurable. It will bring to many an honest, fearless heart the consciousness that he and his loved ones are insured against the folly and negligence of his fellows, whom he can not control. Had it been of force in the past, thousands of our countrymen who are sleeping in untimely and tragic graves might now be leading useful lives, and many additional thousands who now spend the interval of life which remains to them in the mortification of mutilation and in its incurable suffering might now be happy and well. Surely at a period when every day brings its story of crashing and murderous collisions, of derailed and shattered trains, the long catalogue of the slain, the mangled, and dismembered, such efforts on the part of the Government to extend its protecting care around its people, employed in its mightiest interest, should not be lightly discredited. The philanthropy and statesmanship which prompted it are not undeserving of such a eulogium as that pronounced by Macaulay on the philosophy of Bacon:

"'It has lengthened life; it has mitigated pain; it has extinguished diseases; it has increased the fertility of the soil; it has given new securities to the mariner; it has furnished new arms to the warrior; it has spanned great rivers and estuaries with bridges of form unknown to our fathers; it has guided the thunderbolt innocuously from heaven to earth; it has lighted up the night with the splendor of the day; it has extended the range of the human vision; it has multiplied the power of the human muscles; it has accelerated motion; it has annihilated distance; it has facilitated intercourse, correspondence, all friendly offices, all dispatch of business; it has enabled man to descend to the depths of the sea, to soar into the air, to penetrate securely into the noxious recesses of the earth. * * * These are but a part of the fruits, and of its first fruits. For it is a philosophy which never rests, which has never attained, which is never perfect. Its law is progress. The point which yesterday was invisible is its goal to-day and will be its starting post to-morrow.'"

The Supreme Court of the United States on May 18, 1908, handed down its decision in St. Louis, Iron Mountain & Southern Railway Co. against May Taylor, as administratrix of George W. Taylor.

The case had been tried twice in the State courts, and eight years after Taylor's death the Supreme Court reversed the judgment obtained against the carrier; but the court laid down in its opinion a salutary rule, which is applicable to the principle of my compensation bill (H. R. 16739). Here is what the court said (my italics and small capitals) in that case which, with Holden against Hardy (cit. ut supra), gives my bill (H. R. 16739) its constitutional justification:

"In deciding the questions thus raised, upon which the courts have differed (158 Fed., 931), we need not enter into the wilderness of cases upon the common-law duty of the employer to use reasonable care to furnish his employee reasonably safe tools, machinery, and appliances, or consider when and how far that duty may be performed by delegating it to suitable persons for whose default the employer is not responsible. In the case before us the liability of the defendant does not grow out of the common-law duty of master to servant. The Congress, not satisfied with the common-law duty and its resulting liability, has prescribed and defined the duty by statute. We have nothing to do but to ascertain and declare the meaning of a few simple words in which the duty is described. It is enacted that 'no cars, either loaded or unloaded, shall be used in interstate traffic which do not comply with the standard.' There is no escape from the meaning of these words. Explanation can not clarify them and ought not to be employed to confuse them or lessen their significance. The obvious purpose of the legislature was to supplant the qualified duty of the common law with an absolute duty deemed by it more just. If the railroad does, in point of fact, use cars which do not comply with the standard, it violates the plain prohibitions of the law, and there arises from that violation the liability to make compensation to one who is injured by it. It is urged that this is a harsh construction.

"To this we reply that, if it be the true construction, its harshness is no concern of the courts. They have no responsibility for the justice or wisdom of legislation, and no duty except to enforce the law as it is written, unless it is clearly beyond the constitutional power of the lawmaking body. It is said that the liability under the statute, as thus construed, imposes so great a hardship upon the railroads that it ought not to be supposed that Congress intended it. Certainly the statute ought not to be given an absurd or utterly unreasonable interpretation leading to hardship and injustice, if any other interpretation is reasonably possible. But this argument is a dangerous one, and never should be heeded where the hardship would be occasional and exceptional. It would be better, it was once said by Lord Eldon, to look hardship in the face rather than break down the rules of law. But when applied to the case at bar the argument of hardship is plausible only when the attention is directed to the material interest of the employer to the exclusion of the interests of the employee and of the public. Where an injury happens through the absence of a safe drawbar there must be hardship. Such an injury must be an irreparable misfortune to some one. If it must be borne entirely by him who suffers it, that is a hardship to him. If its burden is transferred, as far as it is capable of transfer, to the employer, it is a hardship to him. IT IS QUITE CONCEIVABLE THAT CONGRESS, CONTEMPLATING THE INEVITABLE HARDSHIP OF SUCH INJURIES, AND HOPING TO DIMINISH THE ECONOMIC LOSS TO THE COMMUNITY RESULTING FROM THEM, SHOULD DEEM IT WISE TO IMPOSE THEIR BURDENS UPON THOSE WHO COULD MEASURABLY CONTROL THEIR CAUSES, INSTEAD OF UPON THOSE WHO ARE IN THE MAIN HELPLESS IN THAT REGARD. SUCH A POLICY WOULD BE INTELLIGIBLE, AND TO SAY THE LEAST, NOT SO UNREASONABLE AS TO REQUIRE US TO DOUBT THAT IT WAS INTENDED AND TO SEEK SOME UNNATURAL INTERPRETATION OF COMMON WORDS. We see no error in this part of the case." * * *

I also desire to embody in my remarks a copy of my speech on this subject which I delivered on June 6, 1910:

Mr. Speaker, I appreciate the spirit which prompts the objections of the gentlemen to the passage of this resolution. Personally I am very much opposed to the creation of commissions which require large appropriations of money to conduct investigations which result usually in voluminous reports of no consequence. However, I am hopeful that I can convince the gentlemen of the vital importance of the creation of the commission which is proposed under this resolution.

This resolution, proposing the creation of a commission to make a thorough investigation of the subject of employers' liability and workmen's compensation, is the result of a number of hearings had before the Committee on the Judiciary on my workmen's compensation bill, H. R. 1. I would much rather have preferred that the committee would have seen fit to report my bill favorably to this House instead of this resolution.

However, it is the desire of the committee to secure more information and knowledge on the great principles of "workmen's compensation," which are the basic principles of my bill. It is therefore out of the question to secure a favorable report of my bill at this session, and I have but one alternative and that is to accept this resolution in lieu of a favorable report on my bill. No matter what the personnel of the proposed commission under this resolution will be, I am firm and positive in my belief that it will be forced by the righteous and just principles involved in my bill to recommend its passage and enactment into law. Of course it will delay the legislation proposed by my bill for some time, but I am hopeful that the day is not far distant when my efforts and labors for a workmen's compensation act by this Congress will become a part of the statute law of the United States.

I do not contend that the creation of this commission is indispensable, but it is in line with the investigations which are being conducted in the States of Illinois, New York, Minnesota, and Wisconsin since the introduction of my first bill on the subject of "workmen's compensation" in Congress. The objection on the part of the gentlemen relative to the fact that there is no limitation as to the cost of the proposed investigation on this subject, which will result in a great benefit to thousands of our fellow beings, can easily be overcome. I had nothing to do with the drafting of the resolution, and it seems to me that my colleague, who introduced it, was of the opinion that the cost would be decided upon by the House. I am satisfied that the gentlemen from Arkansas and Minnesota would not object to an honest, fair, and impartial investigation of the principles of my bill, even if the cost to do so would reach the sum of $100,000.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I desire to engage the time and attention of the Members of this House upon my bill, the subject matter of which is sought to be thoroughly investigated by the proposed commission to be created under the resolution.

On February 3, 1908, I introduced a workmen's compensation bill, which was the first measure of its kind embodying the principles of workmen's compensation for injuries brought before Congress. Only a limited number of Members of the House had at that time any adequate knowledge of the principles upon which my bill was based, how far-reaching it was, and the great benefit that would result from its enactment into law in the cases of workmen engaged in hazardous employments to which the regulative power of Congress applies. The bill would ameliorate the terrible plight of thousands of families who are annually deprived of either a father or son, who in nearly every instance is the chief support and breadwinner of the family, through the inexorable drain on human life which is annually sacrificed in dangerous and hazardous employments which commerce and industry claims. The dependent survivors—the unfortunate widows and orphans—are thus cast upon the community as indigents, and in spite of such bitter charity which might come to them in the wake of their bereavement they are obliged to endure and suffer indescribable hardships, misery, and want, due to the fact that under our present system of jurisprudence no adequate, just, and timely relief is afforded them, and in their sad affliction the law shifts upon them the entire burden, risk, and responsibility in all industrial accidents. For ought the law cares they might perish from the pangs of hunger. And all this actually happens, is permitted, and even sanctioned in what we proclaim and maintain to be the most enlightened country in the world; and, as admitted by everyone, the richest and wealthiest of all countries—in short, a country of plenty. These pitiful conditions resulting from commercial and industrial accidents are primarily due to the indifference and neglect of our legislators in the States, as well as in this and the other House of Congress. Still I am satisfied that if a majority of the Members would see for themselves the hardship, misery, and want to which these unfortunate people are subjected by reason of the iniquitous method of common-law procedure in personal-injury cases with respect to the recovery of damages by the plaintiffs, there would be no hesitation to pass and enact into law this bill. The justice in abrogating the antiquated doctrines of "fellow servants," "assumed risk," "contributory negligence," and kindred common-law defenses which operate almost exclusively against a recovery for the plaintiff in personal-injury suits would at once assert itself.

Following the introduction of my first "workmen's compensation" bill, I also introduced in the Sixtieth Congress H. R. 16739, H. R. 24339, and H. R. 25408, and on the first day of the first session of this Congress I introduced H. R. 1, upon which I succeeded in securing hearings before the Committee on the Judiciary; and during this session I introduced H. R. 25334, upon which I desire at this time to address you particularly. All of the bills, including the present one, are amplifications and modifications of the original bill which I introduced. By successive redrafts of said bill I endeavored to meet objections urged and pointed out to me from time to time. I believe that the present bill will stand any reasonable and fair test to which you may subject it, and I am sanguine that it will survive the close and critical scrutiny of the Supreme Court.

As I have said at the outset, there were but few Members who had any adequate conception of the problem of "workmen's compensation," and realizing and appreciating the need of legislation along this line, I commenced a campaign of publicity and education, and I have spared neither time nor expense to accomplish my purpose in this direction. I have written articles which have been published in the columns of the press throughout the country and in the magazines. I have sent copies of my bills on "workmen's compensation," together with copies of my speech upon the same, to all the governors, lieutenant governors, and to many Senators and members of the legislatures of the States of the Union; to employers' and employees' organizations; in fact, I endeavored to reach everyone whom I thought to be interested and where it would do some good. To-day I am pleased to say that my efforts were not misdirected, for a majority of the American people have become acquainted with the underlying principles of "workmen's compensation," and I say it with pardonable pride that my bill has met with the approval of a majority of the country's leading men in all walks of life, who have come to realize the vast good and great saving that can be accomplished by its enactment into law.

Since the introduction of my first "workmen's compensation bill" the subject has been taken up in this country with a determination that is bound to bring into universal favor legislation along the lines proposed in my bill. There have been held several conferences, meetings, and conventions of a civic, industrial, and legislative character, where all interests and classes were represented, to discuss and formulate plans with respect to this important question. Later on I shall take the privilege to read or include in these remarks extracts from the Tenth Annual Meeting of the National Civic Federation, held at New York City November 22 and 23 last past, the greater portion of which meeting was devoted to the discussion of "workmen's compensation" legislation and other pertinent articles and reports. In addition to discussions at various meetings and conferences held upon this subject, several States have, through their respective legislatures, appointed special commissions to investigate and report on workmen's compensation legislation. Notable among the States taking this action are Minnesota, Illinois, Wisconsin, and New York. The special commission created by the New York State Legislature to investigate this subject transmitted a report on March 18 and recommended the enactment of an alternative workmen's compensation scheme, preserving the liberty of contract of both parties.

Undoubtedly you are all acquainted and familiar with the employer's liability legislation. In 1906 Congress passed an employer's liability law which tended to give a workman who was injured while in the pursuit of his occupation, or in the event that the injuries so sustained resulted in his death, then to his widow or dependents, a better chance to recover damages. In other words, the act improved their right of action by diminishing to a certain extent some of the defenses heretofore available; but the Supreme Court, in what are known as the Employer's Liability cases (207 U. S., 463), declared the act to be unconstitutional. During the past Congress we passed another similar law, known as the employer's Federal liability act of 1909, with a view toward meeting the objections to such legislation as were noted by the ruling of the Supreme Court on the act of 1906, and it is reported that already some of the judges hold this act unconstitutional, upon the ground that Congress is not vested with the authority and the power to enact such legislation. For argument's sake, let us say that we pass an employer's Federal liability law which the Supreme Court will finally hold to be constitutional. What will we have accomplished? We will have given approximately 100,000 railroad employees who are annually injured or killed, or to their unfortunate widows or dependents, a right of action obviating some of the defenses of the employer to personal injury suits.

In this connection I can not find a more fitting and pertinent expression than that of Hon. A. H. Gill, a member of the British Parliament, in an address to the members of the National Civic Federation, at the tenth annual meeting, on November 23, 1909, where a discussion was had on "Workmen's insurance in foreign countries," "Employer's liability in the United States," "Compensation for injured wage earners," and kindred economical topics. In the course of his address Mr. Gill said:

"I venture to say that every person who works for an employer, no matter in what occupation he is engaged, has a right to be protected in his labor from injury, so far as it is possible to be."

"The present act of Parliament [Congress] that you have in operation, the employer's liability act, does not tend in that direction. It is a similar act to what we had in operation years ago, and we found that it was difficult to get on with it. We found that it did not prevent the accidents taking place which we had a right to expect. We found, also, that it was most difficult for workmen, when they were injured, to succeed in the court in getting compensation awarded. Anything that is indefinite, anything that places a premium on the employer to get out of the difficulty, to cause him, if it is possible, or the workman, also, to suppress evidence will not bring before the public or before the courts the difficulties, the defects that exist in regard to industrial machinery; but as soon as employers find out that they have a definite payment to make for every accident that occurs, no matter how it occurs, whether it is from negligence or otherwise, you can depend upon it that those employers will begin to look around and see if they can not find some means of preventing those accidents taking place."

The present method of requiring an injured employee to sue the employer is both antiquated, vicious, and produces strife and contention instead of rendering prompt, certain, and definite justice. The suitor is subjected to meet the ancient legal fictions of "contributory negligence," "assumption of risk," and "fellow servants" forms of defenses interposed by the employer in nearly all personal-injury suits. The method which has been pursued by the courts in enforcing the strict letter of the law has brought about a feeling that an injustice is done to the employee in nearly every instance, which injustice is due, not to the administration of the law, but to the inherent injustice of the theory and its perverse construction. The litigation which is necessary to enforce the rights of these persons at common law brings out the extreme of the law, which is always injustice.

The suitors in these cases are our maimed fellow citizens or, in the event of their death, their widows or the guardians ad litem for their orphans. In no case do they stand before the court equally prepared with a great corporation which defends the action. It is absurd on the part of any person who has ever practiced even a few years in any court to say that the poor man can hire a great lawyer. His social and economic condition, his lack of relation to the great leaders of the bar, his very maimed condition or the depressed position, through the loss of a father, all prevent him or them having access to any except the ordinary lawyers, who take these cases on contingent fees. That is the average rule.

But let us assume that the injured person or the widow has the very best counsel; that they have counsel who are so impressed with their duty to the public and to the court, and so carried along by the desire to do justice that, although they have been defeated in one court, they will appeal and appeal and follow their case from the lower courts to the Supreme Court of the United States until the law ultimately says that the corporation must pay damages, all of which takes from 4 to 10 years, and I know of a number of cases that have been pending in the courts for 15 and 20 years before an entry of final judgment was had. Now, what do you think becomes of the widow in the interim? What care is taken of the children, and what has the State done to relieve itself of the duty which it owes to thousands and thousands of railway employees similarly situated all over the country? The litigation which these people are forced to undertake under the process of our common law, even if successful, is inefficacious. The fruits of the litigation are wasted in attorney's fees, stenographer's fees, printing of briefs, and costs, and to the repayment of debts necessary to maintain the family. The social standard of the survivors has been lowered or else the family has gone to pieces; the maimed man, if he has not died of his injuries, has become a tramp; the children have been taken from school; the families have been split up and separated, perhaps forever. And this litigation, which is almost tantamount to a denial of justice, these burdens and hardships, are all permitted; yes, encouraged by the State, and at its enormous cost. To-day nearly one-half of our courts are burdened with the trials of personal-injury cases, wherefore justice is delayed in all other cases pending. I am inclined to think that the cost of maintaining our courts, the salaries paid to judges, clerks, and bailiffs, jurors, witness and stenographer's fees, fees for expert testimony, printing of briefs and stationery, and other incidental expenses necessary to defray the costs of these personal-injury cases would pay a fair compensation to all the litigants prosecuting such cases.

Every one of us is sworn to support the Constitution of the United States and by inference to afford to the people, our constituents and our fellow citizens, due process of law. The Constitution is a growing and living organism and entity. It has protected commerce from the canal boat and the post rider to the steam railroad, electric traction, telegraph, and telephone; and there is no reason why the persons employed in interstate commerce should be left to remedies which were thought adequate at the time when the simple relation between master and servant was not interfered with by colossal machinery and a complicated system of industrial organization.

The theory of the American law is that the contract between the employer and his employee, called at common law "his servant," is ample to take care of the person who is injured by reason of the contract. The law, furthermore, proceeds on the theory that the damages may be sought primarily against the wrongdoer. As a matter of fact, the injured person in the complicated system inherent in our modern industrial conditions has no redress, because the person who primarily caused the wrong is financially unable to respond in damages. The law then allows an action against the master at common law on formal proof, with burden upon the person injured to show negligence, and puts the burden, as it should in all cases where negligence is the test, upon the injured employee or widow to sustain the cause of action against the master.

The reason for the rule has changed so entirely and the exceptions which have been ingrafted by the courts have become so noxious that the social problem has been overlooked or pushed aside for the benefit of legal jugglery and hair-splitting distinctions by great judges. The administration of the law has become so refined, delicate, and neat, for the purpose of maintaining the rights of the possessing classes or corporations, that the more important question, the human question, the question of humanity and of social justice of the complainant, is utterly forgotten in the defense of vested rights.

I do not go as far as Lewis, who states that vested rights may always be called intrenched wrongs; but I do claim that the maintenance of a rule which was harsh when it was started, which has become unjust in its operation, which, under the totally changed industrial conditions under which great operations of manufacturing, of commerce, and of interstate commerce must be carried on, becomes a pernicious and dangerous form, because under the guise of administering mistaken and inept theories of law it brings about a denial of justice and induces a feeling of distruct for the courts which it is hard to overcome.

The courts will say that the laborer is free; that he chooses his occupation; that if he takes up a dangerous occupation, he takes the risk—he does it with his eyes open; he is compensated for it; and that his wages, in part, may be used, if properly employed, toward buying insurance in some industrial or accident corporation to compensate him for the risk which he is bound to take. Is it not a truism, which must only be stated to be understood, that the choice or freedom of the laborers is entirely illusory; that they have no choice; that the fiction which claims to treat them as free agents is overcome by the actualities of their conditions, which make wage slaves of them all; that none of the braver occupations are exempt from identically the same perils, and the same doctrines of class prejudice or judicial ineptitude follow the workman into any new job? Thus, in the case of Brinkmeyer v. Missouri Pacific Railway Co. (93 Pac. Rep., 621, and 105 Pac. Rep., 221) the plaintiff—who, after nine years of unsuccessful litigation for the loss of his leg, still owes the Missouri Pacific Railway Co., the defendant, for the bill of costs—lost all the fingers of his right hand in a planing mill on the very day that the railway's counsel again obtained a new trial; that the wages are always so small and purchase so little that adequate self-insurance is impossible; and that very, very few of them have any insurance which will, under the present régime, keep their families out of the poorhouse.

Why should this enormous sacrifice be exacted from railroad employees and others who are engaged in hazardous employments? Does the efficient operation of the Nation's splendid transportation system require that this great burden should remain where it now lies? Suppose we admit that the terrible sacrifice of lives and limbs is a necessary concomitant of railroad operation. Suppose we resign ourselves, with oriental fatalism, to the belief that our transportation juggernaut must continue to crush out the lives of its operatives without abatement. Even then, can we excuse ourselves for saddling upon those operatives the financial burden of providing for the needs of their widows and orphans, made such by the very exigencies of the industry itself? Is it not more to the point and more akin to justice that this burden should be assumed by the transportation industry and, through it, by society as a whole? Commerce and industry should shoulder the burden of compensation for personal injuries to workmen, or to their widows or dependents, and it is but plain sense to say that this burden shall be made a fixed charge added to the cost of commerce and industry, which can easily and readily bear it. The maimed and crippled workmen or their widows and orphans can least afford to bear it, and justice will be done to them.

At the time when the law of master and servant received the form which we are now contending is utterly unjust the industries were just beginning to receive the beneficent effect of the application of steam to machinery theretofore driven by human hands. The great decisions upon which the law of master and servant is based were rendered in the early thirties of the last century. They were rendered by men who had reached the place of chief justice long after the conditions under which the old theory of master and servant had developed—Ellenbrough, in England, and Chief Justice Shaw, in Massachusetts. In laying down the law of fellow-servants, as applied to railroads, they were but expounding the law as they had learned it when economic conditions were simple, when the master knew every person employed by him, and when the employee had a chance to say to his employer: "This man is a reckless and dangerous fellow, regardless of the rights of his fellow-men, and I refuse to work with him. You have the choice between keeping me or discharging him." The mere statement of this rule applied to modern conditions, shows that it is impossible of application.

Lombroso, one of the great psychologist in criminology, has well stated that great crimes—and certainly mass crimes—never can be committed unless there is a dullness of imagination or lack of nervous sentiency on the part of the perpetrator.

Probably the greatest railroad men in this country would shudder at the idea of becoming personally responsible for the existence and the choice of men in the thousand and one different branches of the enterprises in which their companies are involved. The machinery has become so colossal that the master can not inspect, can not supervise, and himself becomes a part of the carelessness induced by the modern forms of corporate management. The unavoidable requirement of specialization necessitates their devoting their intelligence and energy to one definite thing. No one man is therefore deliberately accountable for the horrors which follow the administration of the antiquated system of master-and-servant law; each man can shift the responsibility upon that great entity created and sanctioned by the State or Federal Government, the corporation, and say: "We are not responsible. We are paid to do a definite amount of work, and as long as we do that work society at large—the state—should bear the burden." Were it possible to bring these men into one room with the victims and show to them the consequences of their hiding behind the forms of corporate coldness of heart, I believe that many of them would resign their places rather than resist the enactment of a humane compensation act which would avert crushing misery and a lowering of the social standard of the persons involved, if not total degradation of their fellow-citizens.

The accidents which occur in all industries involving dangerous machinery, such as factories, steel mills, coal mines, quarry mines, and other extractive industries, in their widest scope, are not subjects over which the Congress of the United States has jurisdiction directly, and do not concern us in the present discussion.

Limiting the discussion to the employees of railroads engaged in interstate commerce and to such other carriers as are subject to the power of Congress, I propose to show, principally from the statistics based on returns furnished by the carriers themselves, in accordance with law compiled by the Interstate Commerce Commission, that railroads require a regular percentage of life, limbs, and health of our fellow-citizens; that the number of men killed and injured is a regularly recurring number; that this number constantly increases, but is in regular proportion with the mileage operated; that a certain proportion of the manhood of this country is slaughtered every minute of the 24 hours of every day; that a regularly recurring number of our young men is each year thrown aside as "scrap," and, as far as the present system of administration of the law of master and servant is concerned, as far as prompt and effective compensation goes, is as valueless to the community at large as the rotten ties which we see moldering along the tracks of every railway in these great United States.

This is a startling statement to make, were it not proven to the hilt by statistics. These statistics cover a period of 21 years and are taken from the figures accessible to every man, published by the Interstate Commerce Commission, pursuant to the great law of its organization.

Percentage of increase in number of employees in 1908 over number in 1889, 166.92 per cent.
Ratio of increase in percentage of number killed and injured in 1908 over percentage of number killed and injured in 1889, 91.02 per cent.
Ratio of increase in percentage of number injured in 20 years, 101.41 per cent.
Ratio of decrease in percentage of number killed in 20 years, 7.15 per cent.
Percentage of increase in number of employees killed and injured in 1908 over number killed and injured in 1889, 294.71 per cent.
Ratio of the percentage of increase in the number of employees killed and injured in 1908 over the number killed and injured in 1889 to the percentage of increase in the number employed in 1908 over the number employed in 1889, 191.02 per cent.

The first column presented shows the total mileage at end of each year, single track; the second column shows the number of employees in service at end of each year and the number of employees for each 100 miles of line.

The third column shows the number of railway employees killed, the per cent of employees killed, the average number of employees killed per day, and the average number of minutes elapsing for one killed.

The fourth column shows the number of employees injured, the per cent of employees injured, the average number of employees injured per day, and the average number of minutes elapsing for one injured.

The fifth column shows the number of railway employees who are killed and injured, the per cent of killed and injured, the average number of killed and injured per day, and the average number of minutes elapsing for one killed or injured.

In other words, these figures show that the total casualties for 21 years from 1888, the first year after the establishment of the Interstate Commerce Commission, to 1908, inclusive, 56,516 employees lost their lives at the post of duty and 895,548 employees were either maimed or crippled. The total casualties reached the astounding figure of 952,064, an average for the 21 years covered of 45,336 a year.

These figures further show the number of employees in service and the proportion killed and injured. The falling off in the number employed, as indicated by the figures for the years 1894 to 1898, was due to the panic of 1893, as is the present apparent reduction due to the panic of November, 1907, and reflects one of the economies introduced by the railway managements during the hard times following this financial crisis. The per cent column for employees killed clearly indicates the constant recurring death risk of the railway employee. There is hardly any perceptible fluctuation of this ratio for the years shown and means, approximately, that one employee out of every 400 in service was killed each year. The proportion of injured has gradually increased each year, until for 1908, the last year covered, 5.72 per cent given indicates that 1 employee out of every 17 in service is injured, or that an employee in the service of a railway for 10 years has an even chance of being injured. The columns showing the number of minutes elapsing for each casualty and the average number of casualties per day demonstrate that approximately in every seven minutes of every hour of every day for the last five years named 1 employee was killed or injured. During the 21 years covered the average was 1 killed or injured for every 14 minutes of this entire period. The average killed each day for the whole period covered was 7 and the average injured 117.

Compare these figures with the returns of some battles in the Civil War, and remember that among the men who are not employed to fight, but to move the daily traffic of the Nation, there are no returns for "missing."

The necessary factors of railroad operation are sentient and insentient—human beings and the tools and materials with which they work. Both are subjected to wear and tear; both are wasted in the performance of their functions. The railroads bear the expense of repairing and replacing the waste of their insentient instruments of operation—the wear and tear of roadbed and track, bridges and buildings, locomotives and cars—but for the 953,063 men killed and injured in 21 years they have no concern. It is but too probable that ere the next bunch of railroad returns are gathered and compiled an additional 63,900 men will either have lost their lives or have been maimed in railroading, so that in 22 years the railroads will have wrecked the lives of 1,066,000 men, and have then let them sue, instead of paying them compensation for their injuries. The waste of human life and limb, the wear and tear of that active, intelligent army of human beings whose labor alone makes their operation possible is not a necessary item in the expense account of railroads.

Acting under the authority conferred by section 20 of the act to regulate commerce, the Interstate Commerce Commission promulgated a classification of operating accounts to be kept by carriers by rail. Possibly the most important method introduced were the depreciation accounts, created for the purpose of providing a fund for the replacement of equipment when retired from service. These depreciation accounts are maintained by making monthly charges direct to operating expenses based on the average life of the several classes of equipment affected and crediting these amounts to a replacement fund.

The carriers maintain a fund for the replacement of the insentient factors of operation that are worn out or wrecked and have to be consigned to the scrap heap. But the human being, our fellow citizen, of whom one risks being killed or injured every time seven minutes of the day or night elapse, if wrecked, as a consequence of his professional risk, so as to make him unfit for further service, is cast aside, and the carrier assumes no responsibility whatever for his condition. He must assume his own risk, must bear his own damage, as though it occurred by reason of his fault or his negligence, when, as a matter of fact, his damage is as much the result of the operation of the property as is the damage to locomotives and cars, bridges and buildings, roadway and track, for all of which the carrier provides without question.

The couplers which keep the trains together and make the vast commerce of the country possible are inspected by the carriers and in part by the Government. Skilled employees are required to make this movement possible, without whose aid, without whose intelligence, and without whose energy and watchfulness the entire commerce of the country would lie stagnant and become impossible, bringing about starvation and misery. Yet these employees, when injured through no fault of their own, through a regularly recurring risk, which is an incident of the employment, are cast aside, and no effort is required by law of the carriers to heal or repair them; these men are abandoned and are left without compensation. When broken in body, maimed, and injured, they are forced, under the most disadvantageous circumstances imaginable, to combat the carriers whose commerce they have been pushing through the country.

Every statement herein made can be confirmed. The professional risk—that is, the inherent liability of any person employed in railway traffic being killed or injured—is a permanent and continuous risk. It is a risk which the man can not shift, as is shown by the above tables of the steadily recurring numbers of men killed. In case of death by a railroad accident no question of the employees' inattention, stupidity, carelessness, or similar defenses urged by the defenders of corporate selfishness can well be urged. It is as much a part of the business of the carrier to pay for the injury of the person who handles the traffic as it is to replace the various items of inanimate transportation which I have heretofore mentioned.

I have referred to the safety-appliance acts. I have shown that the Government inspects couplers. The statistics of the Interstate Commerce Commission, in pursuance of the execution of this law, show that the accidents from that particular cause of casualties have decreased. Yet in spite of this decrease from this particular source the slaughter goes on and has increased in other forms of railway activity, showing that the palliative influence of the safety-appliance law, or of all similar laws, is not sufficient to compensate our fellow citizens who are engaged in handling this great commerce of the country from the risks which they are bound to bear. To state it in another form, where a regularly recurring per cent of our fellow citizens is maimed and killed it is the duty of the Nation to force the enterprise itself to bear the expenses involved therein. I may say that I do not care whether the railroads recoup themselves for the additional expense involved in paying just compensation to their employees by raising the rates, or by charging extra passenger fares, or by decreasing the amount of free baggage that they haul, or by declaring smaller dividends.

Mr. Samuel Gompers, president of the American Federation of Labor, in addressing the meeting of the National Civic Federation on November 22 last, on the subject, "Should industry bear the burden incident to industrial accidents," said:

"As to whether the industry itself should bear the risks of accidents to employees or whether society as such should bear the burden is of lesser consequence than that the burden should not be borne either by the injured workman or the family of the workman killed.

"We speak of the imposition of the risks and burdens of accidents upon employers as if the employers really would pay the compensation, or even liability, out of their own pockets. The fact of the matter is that whatever the cost of the finished product may be, the land, the plant, the machinery, the raw material, wages to workmen, insurance, taxes, are all of them counted in the price for which the employer sells his product, and if intelligent, comprehensive employer's liability or compensation were the fixed principle of the industry, the employers would count that as a fixed charge with which they must count and reckon in placing a price upon the finished product; so that, as a matter of fact, that feature of it is simply absurd to hold that that is an objection to the introduction of more liberal employer's liability or compensation laws.

"It is a common phrase in which so many indulge, 'The immense risks which employers are compelled to meet.' No one who has an intelligent understanding of industrial and commercial conditions will minimize that fact, but side by side with the risks of employers should not be forgotten the risks of labor."

But let us examine the reports of the Interstate Commerce Commission with respect to the finances of the railroads and see how the plan of compensation which I provide in the schedule of my bill would affect the roads. The operating revenues for the year 1908, according to the said report, amounted to the enormous sum of $2,393,805,989, and the net corporate income amounted to $395,902,474 for the said period, which amount was placed at the disposal of the boards of directors of the railroads for the payment of dividends and other corporation expenditures. Of this amount there was appropriated the sum of $271,328,453, to be paid in the shape of dividends on the excessively overcapitalized, or "watered stock," if you please, $28,086,454 for additions and betterments to the property, and $21,635,182 as appropriations to reserves and miscellaneous items, leaving a tremendous balance of $74,852,385 to be carried forward to the credit of profit and loss. But no part of this tremendous corporate income, not even a penny thereof, was given to the great army of the maimed and crippled railroad employees, nor to the dependents of those employees who were killed in service—the railroads protected by the ancient, vicious, and barbaric legal doctrines of "contributory negligence," "assumption of risk," and "fellow servant," left unnoticed the "scrap heap" upon which these unfortunate people are thrown under the present industrial system. The operating expenses of the railroads in the United States for the year 1908 amounted to $1,669,938,717. I contend that to carry out the schedule of compensation which I have drafted as a part of my bill will under no circumstances require an expenditure exceeding 1½ per cent of the operating expenses, which, if added thereto, will certainly leave an entirely sufficient and even a great amount of money in the coffers of the railroads to be distributed as dividends on the "watered stock," and enough money will be left to apply to their reserve funds.

From this computation it must be understood that I have not given any consideration to the cost of maintaining the great and expensive legal departments which handle all personal-injury suits. This cost, a tremendous item in itself, running up into many millions of dollars annually, will be greatly diminished. Therefore to say that the railroads can not meet this additional cost necessarily involved in the compliance with the provisions of this bill is utterly absurd. The absurdity is glaring when it is taken into consideration that the system of compensation proposed in my bill will limit the amount of compensation or annuity to practically small payments according to the nature and extent of the injuries sustained by the employee, or in the event an employee is killed, then certain, definite, limited, and reasonable annuities are payable to his dependents who survive him, which payments, however, cease upon the remarriage of the widow, and to such children as attain the age of 16 years, except in such cases where the surviving children are physically or mentally incapacitated from earning their own livelihood. Besides the probabilities of large verdicts will be avoided, and a greater and better efficiency will result in the ranks of the employees, who will realize and appreciate that if any accident should happen to them while at work they and their dependents will be saved from the "scrap heap," and thereby the safety of the traveling public will be increased.

Strikes do not take place every day. Riots, such as were claimed by the railways to have been caused by the American Railway Union in Chicago, are not of daily occurrence, but the movement of freight trains and of passenger equipment is of hourly and daily occurrence to an extent undreamed of by a person who has not watched it, and when in this regularly recurring series of movements of trains one man is killed or injured every seven minutes of every hour of every day and night, his children are left to starve; his widow may be forced to sell all she possesses; the standard of life of four to six people is lowered and an American family is put on the "bum" while the courts for 8 or 10 years are blocked with wrangle of counsel and the pounding out of new distinctions of a law which is archaic, which was unfair when created, and which has become disastrously reactionary when enforced at the present time under modern industrial conditions. The systematized injustice, the denial of justice caused by the enforcement of antiquated laws—laws which the English, who originated them, have long since discarded as inept, as dangerous to their commercial progress—are retained by us as bulwarks of corporate resistance to social betterment and civilizing uplift.

We talk of the enlightenment of the American. We find it necessary to support missionary societies to carry the Gospel to heathen countries. We send thousands of school-teachers to the Philippine Islands; we send battleships to Asia Minor to protect American colleges against the outrages of the Turk, when it is a fact that America and Turkey stand preeminent in this, that no federal or national compensation acts prevail in either Turkey or the United States, and that on the rest of the Continent the theory which formerly prevailed in England and which now prevails in these United States has been utterly discarded, abolished, and cast aside as antiquated and unfair, as antisocial, as un-Christian, and as dangerous to the modern industrial state.

The tendency of modern civilization in standardizing all things that are in daily use, in fixing the thread on the screw so that the screw that is turned out in Manchester or in Pittsburgh will fit; that the bolts which are put in the bridge at the bridge works in Pittsburgh will fit when laid down on the great bridges across the Nile at Atbara, require such close calculation that commercial progress and national efficiency in the last instance depend upon the perfection of the ways of communication. The country whose railroads, canals, and waterways are most efficient will ultimately win. The size of the country and its resources are nothing as compared with its efficiency. Its efficiency depends directly upon the ease with which the forces necessary to handling the commerce are recruited. Consequently, in a country so vast as ours, where in many instances the only highway known to two generations has been the railway, success depends directly upon the efficiency of this method of communication.

When, therefore, whole classes of citizens have been crushed out, thrown aside as scrap, the feeling of resentment against the carrier harms its efficiency and thereby hurts the national thrust forward in international commerce. For every pensioner that the United States Government maintains in every hamlet and wayside station, we may be assured that the broken families and wrecked men and the memories of some uncompensated loss feed an undying dislike, hatred, or malignant hostility to the great and necessary railways of the country, and indirectly against the country that has permitted 953,063 men killed or injured to be cast aside as scrap without providing permanent and just compensation. The excuse has been that the country was growing and we had no time to regard these problems.

We can only take up one or two things in a generation and settle them, but the time has come when it becomes necessary for us to seriously weigh the danger of permitting corporate cupidity to continue a system of licensed butchery and murder, of permissive breaking up of families, of degrading the standard of American citizenship infinitely worse than the slavery which was broken up 40 years ago, because that was confined to a small group, which inevitably was bound to come to encounter the economic progress of the rest of the world, restricted in area, whereas our present system, if continued, will inevitably lead to a growth of a feeling that a class, comprising a million and a half of men, consequently seven and a half million of American citizens, is being discriminated against, while the freight that they move and the passengers that they haul are to obtain the most favorable consideration at the hands of this body.

Should my bill (H. R. 25334) be passed, the persons who are injured have their choice of remedies. They can either sue in the courts as heretofore, bearing the burden of the proof, or else they can take the compensation which this act will provide for their relief.

The countries that have progressed most materially within the last generation have been those countries which have cast aside the reactionary and antiquated forms of compelling the workingman to sue, or compelling their citizens or subjects to go to law for damages, when compensation should have been paid to them by the enterprise which caused the injury as a necessary professional risk.

I desire to read a few statistical figures from the Atlas and Statistics of the German Labor Insurance, by Dr. G. A. Klein. It was published as part of that wonderful showing made by the German Government for the World's Fair in St. Louis (1904), and, of course, I do not claim it to be up to date. The hurry in which these data were collected must also be taken into account. These figures are from page 19, summary 111, "Income, expenses, and capital":

In 1906, 31,088 persons received $1,492,736 compensation within a few weeks of their injuries,-payable from the earnings of the Prussian-Hessian State railways on a mileage of 20,848 miles.

Is there a doubt in the mind of any one of those to whom my words are addressed that the English were forced to give up the barbarous and archaic jurisprudence based upon the common-law system of master and servant by the stress of German competition? Their trades-unions, their system of allowing men's savings to be robbed by speculators, their intense effort to better this by the friendly societies acts and registration acts and the companies acts, all show the futility of applying the theory of laissez-faire in the modern industrial state, in which the employee with his muscles and intelligence stands opposed to the great masses of capital organized in heartless and necessarily efficient corporations.

In Germany and other European countries the percentage of killed and injured workmen upon the railroads is less than 50 per cent of that of the United States. Why? Because there the railroads are made by law responsible to the injured employee, or in the event of his death resulting from injury, then to his dependents, by a system of humane, just, fair, and equitable workmen's compensation law. Under this law the railroads have no recourse to any such defenses such as contributory negligence, assumed risk, nor the doctrine of fellow servants. That law has made the officials of the railroads to be more careful, and they have adopted stricter rules with respect to the operation and movement of traffic, and they are doing all in their power to prevent the occurrence of accidents voluntarily and without being forced to do so by the State or Government. To-day they exercise more care and caution for the safety of their employees than they do for their equipment and rolling stock. Before the enactment of this law the railroads in those countries had directed their efforts chiefly to the prevention of damage to their properties—they pursued the same course as our railroads are now doing—placing a higher and greater value upon property than upon human life, because they are obliged to repair and replace the equipment at their own cost.

In this country, if you will say that the railroads shall be held primarily responsible for damages for injuries sustained by their employees, or we will say that they must repair broken bones as they do damaged cars; but they must care for their employees on the general principle of humanity, and with the same promptness as they care for their rolling stock and other tangible property; and that when an employee is either injured or killed, neither he nor his dependents shall be thrown upon the "scrap heap," as is the case now, because the railroads can draft new recruits without paying the least attention to what becomes of those who are so discarded; and if you will say that the railroads must pay for the lives that they have destroyed, I am satisfied that within three years we will have 50 per cent less of the maiming and killing of employees of railroads alone, and the great number of fatal wrecks will be 50 per cent less, and, as a further sequence, the lives of thousands of passengers will be saved annually by reason of the fact that travel will be made less dangerous because of the increased efficiency of railroad employees and the greater degree of care exercised by railroad officials in the movement of traffic upon their railways.

The rate in the following table will show certain percentages in respect of railroads in the United States of group 2. This statistical group includes the mileage west of the Hudson River and the New York Central, up to Salamanca, to Pittsburgh, and from Pittsburgh to Parkersburg, and from Parkersburg down the Potomac and to the Capes and back again to New York. The territory includes and the mileage corresponds closely to that of the Prussian-Hessian railways. The following figures will show the number of casualties occurring to a million travelers a year—the German railroads are the safest; this table is published by the German Versicherungs Zeitung, a prominent insurance journal, which indicates that German railroads are the safest of all. On the basis of the latest statistics it is shown that among every million railroad travelers a year the following casualties occur in various countries:

	Killed.	Injured.
Germany	0.08	0.39
Austria-Hungary	.12	.96
France	.13	.18
Great Britain	.14	1.94
Switzerland	.15	1.12
Belgium	.22	3.02
United States	.45	6.58

In other words, the number of fatal casualties occurring to a million travelers in one year on the railroads of the United States are about five times more than in Germany, four times more than in Austria-Hungary, four times more than in France, three times more than in Great Britain, three times more than in Switzerland, and twice more than in Belgium.

And the proportion of the same number of travelers who are injured in one year is about as follows:

About 20 times more than in Germany, about 7 times more than in Austria, about 53 times more than in France, about 4 times more than in Great Britain, about 5 times more than in Switzerland, and about twice as many as are injured on the railroads in Belgium.

There is a tremendous financial waste which results from the litigation of personal-injury suits. It is conservatively estimated that but 14 per cent of the moneys which are expended in this class of litigation, including, of course, the judgments awarded on the verdicts, ultimately reaches the plaintiff. The astounding waste amounts to 86 per cent, which provides, of course, for the payment of the verdicts, all the expenses involved in the defense and prosecution of these suits, and the fees of counsel for both sides in these controversies. But the 14 per cent of such moneys which eventually reaches the lucky suitors is practically minimized, because, as a matter of fact, the major portion of this 14 per cent goes to a small percentage of fortunate suitors, who obtain in some rare cases large verdicts. Does it not strike you favorably what great good would come from this tremendous waste if it would be fairly and properly distributed among the vast number of victims of industrial accidents?

Every employer, every manufacturer, every producer, and every corporation is bent on eliminating, or at least minimizing, any possible occurrence of waste in the cost of production and sale of the commodities which are manufactured. No attempt, however, is made either by the employer or by the lawmakers to elliminate, or minimize, at least, the tremendous waste which must be borne primarily by the workman and in the last analysis by the general public in some form or other.

Over the bewildering progress of industry and commerce in this country there hovers a dark cloud, from which peer the specters of its victims who have been cast on the "scrap heap." The risks of the workmen have constantly increased, but the responsibility of the employers to respond in adequate damages for injuries sustained in hazardous occupations of workmen have diminished.

Employers of labor now find it convenient and expedient to shift the financial responsibility which they might incur by reason of industrial accidents to employees to so-called "indemnity" or "casualty" insurance companies, even though the responsibility so incurred might come squarely within the narrow opening still left available for the victims of industrial accidents by our courts from the extremely fine and delicate constructions of the antiquated doctrines of the common law which obtain in personal-injury litigation. These indemnity or casualty insurance companies, of recent origin, assume and take over all possible and probable risks of the employer for accidents to his employees in consideration of the payment by the employer to such companies of a premium. In the November (1908) issue of Everybody's Magazine, Mr. William Hard, a writer on economical topics, stated, as the result of an exhaustive study of indemnity and casualty insurance, that the employers of labor in the United States in 11 years paid the enormous sum of $99,000,000 in the shape of premiums to companies engaged in this line of insurance, so as to purchase complete protection for themselves from lawsuits which might be brought by injured employees or their dependents. Of this enormous sum only $30,000,000 was paid to injured workmen or their dependents. In other words, this shows a palpable waste of $69,000,000, or, to state it in other words, two-thirds of the premiums paid by the employers for insurance against claims for accidents sustained by their employees was retained by the indemnity or casualty insurance companies.

It is pertinent in this connection to quote some figures compiled by the New York State commission on employers' liability:

Percentage of actual payments and gross premiums received for employers' liability-insurance for the years 1906, 1907, and 1908.

Name of company.	Total premiums.	Total payments.	Per cent.
Aetna Life Insurance Co	$5,417,444	$2,145,928	39.61
Employers' Liability Assurance Corporation	4,216,608	1,595,126	37.82
Fidelity and Casualty Co. of New York	3,010,497	1,186,991	39.42
Frankfort Insurance Co	1,321,775	490,015	37.07
General Accident, Fire, and Life Assurance Corporation	506,031	196,929	38.91
Standard Accident Insurance Co	1,502,985	683,937	45.50
United States Casualty Co	1,332,060	472,783	35.49
New Amsterdam Casualty Co	606,195	205,040	33.82
London Guarantee and Accident Co	2,739,036	695,487	25.39
Ocean Accident and Guarantee Corporation	2,870,954	887,523	30.91
Total	23,523,585	8,559,795	36.34

"From this table it is clear that on an average only 36.34 per cent of what employers pay in premiums for liability insurance is paid in the settlement of claims and suits. In other words, for every $100 paid out by employers for protection against liability to their injured workmen, less than $37 is paid to those workmen; $63 goes to pay the salaries of attorneys and claim agents whose business it is to defeat the claims of the injured, to the costs of soliciting business, to the costs of administration, and to profit."

Mr. Speaker, this system of "employers' liability" insurance, whereby the employer is enabled to shift his liability for injuries happening to workmen while engaged in their occupations to these casualty or indemnity insurance companies, is even more vicious and degenerate than all of the "judge-made" rules pertaining to the recovery of damages by the workman or his dependents for industrial accidents. This pernicious system of insurance, which permits the employer to evade his individual responsibility and liability, has a tendency to bring about a condition of disregard and neglect for the safety of the employees. Where a claim for injuries arises, these companies resort to every trick at their command to defeat the right to a recovery of damages by the workman or his dependents, and it practically severs the relationship between the employer and employee which might in some instances tend to effect a compromise in these cases. These companies do no consider the justice of the claims of injured workmen or their dependents; their objects are to settle claims for mere pittances and to contest to the limit every suit brought against an employer who holds a casualty policy. It matters little to them whether the injured workman or his dependents are suffering want and misery; it is even better that they do suffer; for in the end the unfortunate victims will be forced to settle their claims on the inhuman basis proposed by the company's claim agent. I warn you that this class of employers' liability insurance is a serious menace to our labor conditions, which is bound to bring strife and contention between labor and capital. I recall one case in particular which clearly demonstrates the tyranny of these companies. A manufacturer in Chicago retained in his employ a workman who was injured. The employee brought suit, and under the terms of the casualty policy the insurance company took up the claim for investigation. The investigation disclosed a clear liability, and an offer was made to the workman to settle the claim. The workman refused to consider the offer and his attorney brought suit to recover damages for the injuries sustained by the workman. During the pendency of this suit the plaintiff retained his position in the factory where he received his injuries. After numerous visits, during which he was continually harassed by claim adjuster of the insurance company which assumed the employer's liability, he finally ignored every overture made to him for a compromise of his suit. A few days thereafter the employer was notified by the casualty company that if the plaintiff was not discharged from his employment the company will find it necessary to cancel the policy of insurance against risk which the employer held in the company. The result was that the employer weakened and he discharged the employee. Why? Because the employee refused to accede to the terms of settlement proposed by the company which assumed the risk of the employer. Let me ask, How long will the American public tolerate such tyranny and despotism?

The enactment of my bill into law will have a tendency to stop the strife and contention which exists between the employer and employee under the present status of industry and legal jurisprudence, with respect to the payment of a fair and proper compensation to injured workmen or their dependents. Its tendency in this direction will not only be confined to the class of employments or accupations to which the regulative power of Congress applies, but it will prove the forerunner of "workmen's compensation" legislation in every State of the Union, and will comprise every occupation.

It will relieve the community from supporting hundreds of thousands of crippled, maimed, and disabled workmen and their families.

It will secure immediate relief and obviate the cruel and inhuman necessity now in vogue, to bring suit and wait many years for its final determination in the courts, during which time the entire burden of responsibility rests and must be borne by the injured employee or his dependents, who are thus left to shift for themselves, without any relief except such charity as may come to them from philanthropic sources.

It will prevent litigation, thus eliminating the enormous waste which results therefrom, and it will relieve the congestion caused by this class of litigation in our courts.

It will prevent perjury, which is rampant in all personal-injury suits, and the danger of excessive verdicts will be averted, only to be supplanted by a scale of compensation which is certain, definite, and limited, and is payable in the shape of reasonable annuities.

Through the pages of history it will be observed that humanity conquers ultimately. Through all the years that we have permitted this gross injustice to our workmen and their dependents, we have exerted our time and efforts in the interest of our vast industry only from a commercial aspect, but the greater, the nobler aspect—the human side of industry—we have shamefully and miserably neglected. The human side of commerce and industry is beginning to assert itself; in fact, I believe that the crisis is near where the present inadequate, unfair, unjust, and iniquitous system of recovery of damages for injuries sustained by workmen in the grind of industry and commerce must abdicate in favor of advanced and progressive thought and consideration for the human rights of our workmen. Our shame and miserable neglect can only be partially atoned; but let us do so by enacting a fair and reasonable, yet comprehensive, system of "workmen's compensation" law. I believe my bill to be such, and for it I bespeak your earnest and careful consideration.

In this same connection I desire to put in the RECORD the argument which I made in 1911 in support of my contention that Congress has jurisdiction to enact legislation of this character:

STATEMENT OF THE PROBLEM.

The theory upon which employers' liability legislation is based is a recourse to the courts whereby an action for damages is allowed.

The theory on which workmen's compensation is required of the industries causing recurring injuries is based on the recognition of the social obligations and its reciprocity toward the persons engaged in carrying on social effort. The two methods of regulation have nothing in common except so far as the employer in either system may become the object of litigation.

The reason workmen's compensation is the subject of present interest may be sought for by the fact that communities have come to see by a process of exclusion that in tinkering, modification, and amplification of the method whereby employers' liability is used as a method of repairing the loss to the persons injured in dangerous occupations is futile. Employers' liability is at present enforced by litigation, with all its hazards of delay, miscarriage of justice owing to appeals, and the bringing about of results which are not in accord with the duty of the modern industrial state, whose existence depends on a mass of dangerous occupations. It is impossible to conceive of litigation (and that is part of any employers' liability act) without antagonism between the employer and the employee. This furnishes an incentive for delay on the part of the employer. The unfortunate social effects on the witnesses for either side, the economic waste to the community, and finally, but foremost, the inadequate result flowing from the consequence of such litigation, in that instead of giving the injured workman, or if he is killed, his widow or survivors, prompt, just, and certain benefits, it confers on them nothing save a barren right of action which at best pits against one another those whose efforts should be directed toward the benefit of the entire community.

If, then, employers' liability means litigation and strife, a system of compensation for the injured, and for the survivors of those killed in the course of dangerous occupations, means social betterment, for these reasons: Compensation assures peace, while employers' liability foments strife. Employers' liability is a method of regulating violence. Every form of litigation, in its essence, is the result of an interposition of the State between two groups of persons requiring them to submit their difficulties to a court and thus avoiding self-help. No matter how finely worked out the methods under a system of employers' liability may be, their essentials are based on a crude, unscientific, inaccurate, and antisocial method of settling such matters as should be the subject of social settlement.

When a great industry regularly requires a recurring percentage of those engaged in it to suffer either death or injury, the relief which the present system awards to such persons does not conform to the standards of that duty which the Government in other phases of industrial life has permitted to be exercised on behalf of varied interests.

SCIENCE IN PLACE OF EXPERIMENTATION.

An employers' liability act promises verdicts which depend not upon the social loss which the community has suffered, and whose burdens may be accurately balanced in a number of years, but allows great sums to such successful litigants as manage to wedge through the narrow gate of an occasional verdict. These verdicts are rendered after years of litigation during which the persons most in need of relief have fallen in the social scale or have been broken up by the economic needs. A compensation act would, within a short time after the death of the breadwinner, pay a definite, certain, and reasonable sum as an annuity to the proper beneficiaries. Instead of the hazard of a large verdict occasionally meted out to a successful litigant, which must be paid from the current earnings of the industry, a compensation act, based on definite payments made in installments, would provide for a systematized elimination of all the sources of waste both on the part of the complainant and the industry, reducing the amount of friction, of social discontent, envy, and dislike, and bringing about a system of industrial peace. A compensation act, instead of strife, litigation, and hatred, tends to bring about closer cooperation of employer and employee, and is a factor of efficiency in the work done which can not be reckoned in dollars and cents, unless one takes the whole industries of such countries as have successfully carried out such a plan and compares it with the work previously done by the same nation under conditions analogous to our barbarous form of master and servant liability.

My bill affords due process of law. It changes the method of admission of evidence as to what constitutes the causes of injuries. Congress has as much power to prescribe the rule of evidence as the courts had to import into the Federal jurisprudence the State law on negligence; and that is all that is done in excluding questions of negligence.

The Federal courts have no general or common law that Congress can not change. No one has a vested right in a rule of law, and least of all in a rule of the common law evolved after the Constitution went into effect. The only rights protected by the fifth amendment are such as natural persons could exercise and be protected in; that was what the framers of the Constitution could have had in mind. The framers of the Constitution could not have meant to safeguard the rights of mere creatures of the law to maim those upon whom by subsequent amendment national citizenship was conferred.

The rule of negligence is not and was not protected by the fifth amendment, because at that time it had not come into existence. The regulation of commerce was in the minds of the framers of the Constitution, and since the Supreme Court held in the Employers' Liabilities cases (207 U. S.) that (within limits) that power controlled the relation of master and servant, the extent of its exercise is a matter of congressional discretion and power.

The rule of negligence is, however, based on the theory of the exclusion of material evidence, namely, the professional risk inherent in these occupations. This is merely evidence or procedure, and can and must be regulated by Congress, because the inferior courts have no inherent power to maintain that as a rule of evidence which Congress legislates shall not hereafter be considered as evidence. Congress can require the courts to give heed to the evidence of inherent danger. Congress can require in every case brought before Federal courts a direction of a verdict for the employee, whenever it shall have appeared that he was solely and only engaged in the service subject to Federal regulation, and has not voluntarily injured himself for the purposes of being made a subject of compensation. The Congress has ousted the Federal courts of the rule of assumption of risk in the case of violations of the safety-appliance acts. (Section 8 was drafted by Senator White, of Louisiana, now Chief Justice.) In the new employers' liability acts the defenses of contributory negligence and assumption of risk have been shorn of their power to do harm, and thus, by cutting down the power of using obsolete theories of law, Congress has made a beginning, now logically sought to be carried out, to require all those that maim to pay, by saving them the need of litigating.

ON POWER OF TAXATION.

Exercise of the power of taxation in and of itself is due process of law. The taxes are for a public purpose. Taxation under the Veazie Bank case may be used to drive the privately-owned railroads out of existence, and any less amount of taxation is as proper when used on behalf of the employees as it was when used on behalf of national bankers to help the sale of United States securities. The power of Congress under the first clause of the fifteenth amendment has not heretofore been used.

This clause provides as follows:

"All persons born or naturalized in the United States, and subject to the jurisdiction thereof, are citizens of the United States," etc.

Neither was the power to regulate commerce, now so extensively invoked, brought into play for a long period of time. Yet that is no reason against this power being now used to change the status of the employees. That is what is proposed by this bill.

The power of changing the status of employees of mail carriers is a political question (by declaring the employees public servants and their services public services) not subject to the denial of due process of law. The exclusion by the courts of evidence of the inherent danger and the resting their ruling on the so-called negligence is nevertheless subject to legislative change.

In regulating the status of employees of carriers operating on mail routes Congress would be conferring due process on both master and servant, while the rules of law heretofore invoked in master-and-servant cases have been denying the elementary rights of adducing evidence to the disadvantage of the men at risk.

If the courts may under the judicial power group into a common employment all those employed by a common master, for the purpose of denying them damages, Congress must have the same power to group together all those (included by the opinion of the Supreme Court) in Employers' Liability cases under a common employment, with those engaged with the servants of mail carriers, to grant them compensation for professional risks.

The combination in one bill of powers drawn from various sources of the Constitution is as permissible in the interest of those at risk as it was to create railroads in the Union Pacific cases under the claim that they were needed to protect the military and postal service of the Government.

DELICTS.

The maiming and killing of persons is a delict. It may be made the subject of a fine. This fine may be amerced on the tort-feasor, actually the person committing the injury, or the operating influence; i. e., the corporation. In fining the corporation there is no element of fault or negligence safeguarded by the fifth amendment, so as to preclude the Congress from determining what shall be deemed to be a proper amount of compensation to be paid by the tort-feasor. The proceeds of the fines, whether called fines or common-law deodands, are purely within legislative power, and may either be used to pay governmental purposes or may be used in the legislative discretion to pay those maimed by unavoidable injury produced by the inherent danger.

There is certainly power, it is submitted, to make absolutely liable the wrongdoing car or locomotive, irrespective of its intent, or of the operator's intent in handling it, and giving a lien to the person injured or to the Government for the injury done. And the company can not complain if the amount so to be paid is transmuted from the car or locomotive to the other property of the company by public law. If the United States could create, irrespective of intent, a liability in the company causing damage by criminal proceedings due process is not taken away by making it liable for the damage done, irrespective of negligence. It resolves itself merely into a question of power.

The power of taxation may as properly be exercised in favor of one class of public servants, conserving commerce, as it may be invoked for the end of pensioning those who preserved our Union. The disposition of the proceeds of taxation is purely a matter of legislative discretion.

SPECIAL BODY OF THE JUDGE-MADE LAW.

Contributory negligence: If the employee who is injured has failed to use reasonable care, and that neglect contributed to his injury, he can not recover from his master in action at law, unless he can show his freedom from negligence. This rule of law was changed by the act of 1908.

Fellow-servant rule: If the employee be injured by the negligence of a fellow-servant, that fact will bar his recovery under the present class rules laid down by the courts, basing the same on Priestley v. Fowler (1837, 3 M. & W., 1), Abinger, C. B., in the court of exchequer, followed in Farwell v. Boston, etc., Railroad Co. (4 Metc., 49, 1842, by Shaw, C. J.). In the Priestley case Lord Abinger put the exception he was creating on inconvenience to masters to pay damages:

"The inconvenience, not to say the absurdity, of these consequences afford a sufficient argument against the application of this principle to the present case. But, in truth, the mere relation of the master and the servant never can imply an obligation on the part of the master to take more care of the servant than he may reasonably be expected to do of himself. He is no doubt bound to provide for the safety of his servant in the course of his employment to the best of his judgment, information, and belief. The servant is not bound to risk his safety in the service of his master, and may, if he thinks fit, decline any service in which he reasonably apprehends injury to himself; and in most of the cases in which danger may be incurred, if not all, he is just as likely to be acquainted with the probability and extent of it as the master."

Assumption of risk is a vague and shadowy scheme of class justification, constantly shading into contributory negligence. The courts construe in the employee's contract of service an engagement to assume and consent to the ordinary and obvious risks incident to the employment, and if the servant is injured thereby he can not recover from his employer; for the ordinary and inevitable risks of the trade (the so-called professional risk), the accidents which are nobody's fault, the employer does not pay. But assumption of risk covers not only those risks which could not be avoided by the care of the employer, but also, if the employee knows of dangerous possibilities of his work (though such danger arises by neglect or fault of his employer, even amounting to the violation of the mandatory requirements of a statute), and if the servant, appreciating the dangers, does not at once throw up his job he consents thereto by continuing in such employment, then he can not recover when injured by such a risk.

As a matter of fact, this is another form of class justification for an obvious wrong, as it is contrary to the fact that workmen ever consent or bargain about the hazard risk. They work at these dangerous trades because of economic need, and the "assumption" of the risk and the "implied contract" are both fictions of the courts to perpetuate class exploitation without requital. The economic determinism of the courts in crushing labor, rather than hurting the chances for the budding industries, are part of the whole system of class domination, always finding justification in the courts or in those in authority. The development of these pernicious and disastrous doctrines was profoundly influenced by the belief of the courts that the necessity of profits of the masters owning the enterprises demanded protection at the hands of the State, even though the laborers, who then did not have political power at all, should for a few generations be decimated.

Now, it strikes us all as totally unjust that the employee should bear that which inheres in the cost of the product, and that his injuries are never a voluntary injury (in the sense that he would prefer to be maimed or killed than not to be so), and if workmen have as high a value for the integrity of their lives and limbs as we have, then the present system of requiring an action based on the theory of fault is totally misplaced, economically false, and juristically unjust, as well as sociologically indefensible, as long as we pretend to treat these men, not as slaves to be exploited, but as fellows in political life and in part the source of our power.

DISSATISFACTION WITH THE PRESENT SYSTEM OF EMPLOYERS' LIABILITY.

1. The system evolved by the courts has brought it about that only a very small proportion of the workers killed or injured by accidents of employment receive substantial damages or any compensation, and therefore they and their families and dependents as a rule are degraded in their standards of living and fall a burden to the community and are objects of either public or private charity after a useful, socially effective life.

2. The system so evolved by the courts benefits no one, clogs the courts with actions, hinders justice, is expensive to the Government, burdens the employers with litigation, makes perjurers of people, and when all is said and done is of small benefit to the employees, even when some of them do obtain the verdicts paid after years of litigation.

3. The delays incident to all lawsuits, where a poor man's purse is matched against a wealthy corporation's exchequer, is enhanced by the courts, treating the cases like a football match and reversing for trivial technicalities and having appeals follow appeals, so that cases have been in the courts for 7, 8, and even 10 years, and no end yet in sight.

4. The consequences are bound to emphasize the class contracts and the consciousness of antagonism between master and servants, and that is what a well-governed State tries to alleviate as much as is possible.

EXPENSE OF PRESENT CHAOTIC SYSTEM.

In New York we know from the commission's report that the employees received only $37 out of every $100 paid by the masters, and that $63 is spent in lawyers' and claim agents' fees and insurance expenses.

The contingent fees system forced on the laborers is no better, since 17 per cent to 34 per cent is spent before the employees get anything of the recovery.

The employee when injured must sue the men he worked with, as they are practically his master's witnesses, and if they testify too freely for him may be laid off at the first chance. And if he is fighting an insurance company, whose business it is to fight and cut down losses to his former master, he is worse off than before. "The present law, with its uncertain and uneven chances, promotes distrust and ill will between employers and employees to a serious extent."

In addition to this the corrupt practices of both sides, and the class tendencies of the courts to nonsuit the plaintiff, thus causing needless appeals, which, when decided, only give the litigant a chance to do that which of right he should have been permitted to do at the start, are evils for the community.

Then there have been attempts by both sides to completely disregard the laws made by the courts, and thus to arrive at a sensible basis, but this is charity on the part of some New York public-utility corporations. This is analogous to the modes whereby the members of the produce exchange are bound to arbitrate, so as to avoid the New York courts and the costly litigation. The various railroad relief funds are not voluntary, and are in the main built up by the men's own payments to the risk that should be borne by the enterprise.

No kind of an employers' liability act does away with the uncertainty of litigation. The English said of their employers' liability act of 1880:

"That act, however, can not be said to have been successful. The proof of negligence has been found extremely difficult, and in a vast proportion of the cases of accident no negligence of the nature required by the act in fact existed, or at all events could be proved; and even if there were prima facie evidence of negligence, the risks of litigation were most serious both for employer and employed. * * * Regarded, therefore, as a means of obtaining compensation for injury by accident with a reasonable degree of certainty, the employers' liability act of 1880 must be considered to have been a failure."

The New York commission, in their well-considered report, say, on page 39:

"It is hard to overestimate the force and sanity of the deliberate judgment of that report, though there seems very good reason to believe that the chance of the English workman to get reasonable verdicts was very small, compared with the chance of the injured workman in New York."

The memorandum of the home office to the Royal Commission of labor in 1893 (Common Parliamentary Papers, 1893–94, No. 39, Appendix to Minutes CLIX), which bore the approval of Sir Frederick Pollock, characterized it as "an unfair law operating oppressively against workmen as a class," and that under it negligence of the master is "next to impossible to prove."

That memorandum summarized the workings of the common law and the act of 1880 as follows:

"The doctrine (fellow-servant doctrine) is an exception to the general rule; is modern judge-made law; implies a contract founded on a legal fiction not in accordance with fact; has been pushed to extreme length by the judge forcing and straining the meaning of the term 'common employment'; and in practice leads to gross anomalies. The little master who does the work himself is responsible; the large employer by delegating authority escapes responsibility. The stranger who is injured by the employer's servant has his remedy; the workman has none. The law, therefore, is an unfair law, operating oppressively against workmen as a class. The general result is that under the common law a workman can but very seldom have a remedy against his master for negligence. True, the master is nominally responsible for his own negligence, but in all large undertakings his personal share in the work is slight or none at all. To succeed the workman must prove (1) that the machinery was defective, or that delinquent servant incompetent; (2) that the master had personally failed to take reasonable care that the machinery should be proper or his servants competent. And this it is next to impossible to prove. If the master can only show that he bought the machinery in the ordinary way, paying the ordinary price, or that he hired his servants in the ordinary way, there is an end to the charge of personal negligence."

And again:

"The truth is that to the workman litigation under the act has more than its usual terrors. It is not merely that litigation is expensive, and that he is a poor man and his employer comparatively a rich one; it is that when a workman goes to law with his employer he, as it were, declares war against the person on whom his future probably depends; he seeks to compel him by legal force to pay money, and his only mode of doing so is the odious one of proving that his employer or his agents—his own fellow workmen—have been guilty of negligence. Add to this that the legal proof of such negligence is often extremely difficult, the broad result is that a legal claim for damages only answers where the injury is very great and the workman is prepared to leave his master's service." (Lord Salisbury, speaking in the House of Lords on the 20th of July, 1897, is quoted as follows: "To my mind the great attraction of this bill is that it will turn out a great machinery for the saving of life. This is the real history of this law of compensation. The law of compensation at the beginning of the century was taken up by the juries, and instead of compensation for the real injury incurred being given, it was used by them as a punitive instrument to force these great owners and railway companies to strain their efforts to the utmost in avoiding and preventing the accidents, which at one time were so numerous. It has been very successful, as far as regards the ordinary passenger or ordinary citizen, but the law of common employment has damaged its efficacy as regards the workingman. We are now, by wise and general revision of the principle on which the law rests, applying it for the purpose for which it was originally destined, and for which it has been conveniently and most profitably employed, the purpose of forcing all who, by the process of industry or the accident of their position, have the lives of their fellow men in their power—forcing them to spare neither labor nor ingenuity nor money in making our industries as safe as possible to those by whom they are carried on."—Hansard, Parliamentary Debates, 1897, vol. 51, p. 555.)

WHAT OBJECTIONS CAN BE URGED AGAINST THE CONSTITUTIONALITY OF A RESTRICTED FEDERAL COMPENSATION ACT FOR WORKMEN?

The standard objections are that such an act would be (a) deprivation of private property without due process of law, (b) that it would deprive the employer of liberty of contract, (c) that it would deprive the employee of the liberty of contract and a resort to the courts of law.

They who contend that such an act can be sustained rely on four propositions: 1, the commerce power; 2, the post roads clause; 3, the power of taxation; 4, the legislative power of combining any of the above.

Objection No. 1: Due process of law.

The fifth amendment in part reads as follows:

"Nor shall any person be subject for the same offense to be twice put in jeopardy of life and limb; nor shall be compelled in any criminal case to be a witness against himself; nor be deprived of life, liberty, or property without due process of law, nor shall private property be taken for public use without just compensation."

This amendment, adopted in the closing years of the eighteenth century (1791), is by some supposed to be an insurmountable barrier to effecting changes. It is resorted to by those anxious to preserve property rights at all costs, as a reason why rules of the common law can not be changed. Those who maintain that proposition are forced to the acceptance, in this connection, of this syllogism: Although the constitution of 1787 was adopted principally to regulate commerce, and paramount power to do so was lodged in Congress, yet the fifth amendment, adopted in 1791, limits that power to the extent that a rule of construction of the relation between master and servant (based on convenience and public policy) of State courts in South Carolina and Massachusetts as late as 1845 relates back to the fifth amendment, has become a rule of property so sacred and immutable that legislative power is unavailing against it.

To state the proposition in another form, those who contend that a compensation act is bound to violate the fifth amendment must show that a rule of law evolved by State court, when adopted by United States courts as "general law" is beyond the legislative action of Congress.

Resolving the term of this proposition, it means that a standard of care, or the deviation from that standard (negligence) when applied by the courts to actions for the recovery of damages in personal-injury cases, is immutable. Thus in the words (see p. 525, infra) of the New York Court of Appeals in Ives v. South Buffalo Railway Co. such an act "writes into the contract between the employer and employee, without the consent of the former, a liability on his part which never existed before and to which he is permitted to interpose practically no defense, for he can only escape liability when the employee is injured through his own willful misconduct."

LIABILITIES.

Reserving the obvious contention that the courts, without the consent of the workmen, wrote into the contract of employment an exemption from liability that had not existed against any other class of the community, we will first address ourselves to the rule of care.

Due care, the care of a prudent man about his own affairs, may have logical consistence in that rule of the civil law applied by Chief Justice Holt to bailments. Bailments were handled by natural persons impressed by the law with a public duty. The courts applied these standards to public-service corporations where the personal element of supervision or selection was wanting. Thus the standards applied to individuals in fact became a fiction. The writings of all who have studied the matter condemn the logic, as well as the justifications resorted to by the courts, because it is, as a matter of fact, not negligence in any degree that causes the killing or maiming of men in modern industries.

Those who studied the matter with an open mind find that in all enterprises where high-powered machinery is used, or where natural forces are worked or subjugated by man, there is a regularly recurring statistical ratio of killed and injured. Assuming that laborers have as much care for their lives, if not the integrity of their limbs, as do those of more favored economic classes, it would seem that the recurring number of deaths in mining, lumbering, and railroading are capable of explanation by some other cause than deviation from the standard of action of "a reasonably prudent man." The students of that subject claim that those killed and injured are maimed by the incidence of the law of professional risk. That is, that there inheres in all machinery the capacity of steady effort continued indefinitely at the same pitch and force. But human energy is a varying factor, even with a man beginning work. That human psychology and steel machinery have no factor in common except the energy of use. That the capacity of using human energy in controlling machinery flags from time to time, not from negligence, but from too much care or attention given an instant before or rather stored up for the event usual to happen at the next curve or the next station. But if in that interval an unlooked for event takes place, it is not lack of care on the part of the prudent man, but an event that the prudent man never could successfully grapple with, that instead of having hours of discussion as to what should be done, those killed or injured have seconds or fractions of seconds in which to act, and have no chance for reconsideration. That this habit of facing danger begets standards of action, used by the masters to move commerce expeditiously, and encourages the servants to exertions wherein results only count and where the standards of care of the meticulously prudent man are relegated to those of less virile activity.

That the economic factors which forced this activity beget a group standard of courage and energy, encouraged by the masters in doing public work. That it is not giving heed to facts of life where there is applied a standard of care, of watchfulness, of consideration, to factors that are nonexistent in the day's work, and that after disaster are invoked to deny the men a remedy.

By a process of exclusion which is found that there is a factor of danger inherent in the enterprise itself. Statistics demonstrate this fact. Professional risk alone explains the recurring factor of the deaths of those at risk.

The courts, bound by the duty of stare decisis, can not undo the rules evolved by former judges. They are not at liberty to permit the plaintiff to show the inherent danger of the work, but Congress has the power of changing the rule of evidence.

"Evidence—

It was said by Bentham (Rationale of Judicial Evidence, book 9, Pt. III, ch. 1)— —is the basis of justice; exclude evidence and you exclude justice."

In place of deciding master and servant cases by a rule in which deviation from an inapplicable standard of care is the criterion of recovery, it is contended that Congress, having plenary power of abolishing inferior Federal courts, has power to regulate the procedure therein; that since evidence is part of the procedure, it does not play part of the judicial power with which Federal courts, once called into being, are invested, and that therefore the requirement of giving force to procedure whereby such courts shall take into account inherent or professional risk, would not violate the due-process clause.

Due process of law.—The New York Court of Appeals (in Ives v. So. Buffalo Ry. Co., 201 N. Y., 271), the only court that so far has passed on the constitutionality of a modern compensation act, found no difficulty in declaring that the act violated the due-process clause, as we would say; that is, that it took property by not affording the proprietor that standard of protection that the courts seem to think is sacred and taboo. Says the court (p. 14): "If it is competent to impose upon an employer who has omitted no legal duty and has committed no wrong a liability based solely upon a legislative fiat that his business is inherently dangerous, it is equally competent to visit upon him a special tax for the support of hospitals and other charitable institutions," etc., and in support of this view quotes Wynehamer v. People (13 N. Y., 378), where it was said. "These constitutional safeguards in all cases require a judicial investigation, not to be governed by a law specially enacted to take away and destroy existing rights, but confined to the question whether, under the preexisting rule of conduct, the right in controversy has been lawfully acquired and is lawfully possessed."

The case relied by that court (Wynehamer case, 13 N. Y.) contains a mass of barbaric dicta, long ago exploded by the Supreme Court of the United States. In that case the court of appeals said (p. 397):

"The statute under consideration * * * by force of its prohibitions alone, sweeps them (intoxicating liquors) from the commerce of the State, and thus annihilates the quality of sale, which makes them valuable to the owner. This is destructive of the notion of property. * * * It is certain that the legislature can not totally annihilate commerce in any species of property, and so condemn the property itself to extinction (p. 399). There is no offense except the misfortune of being the owner (p. 404)."

All this based on the theory stated on page 387:

"In a Government like ours, theories of public good or public necessity may be so plausible, or even so truthful, as to command popular majorities. But whether truthful or plausible merely, and by whatever numbers they are assented to, there are some absolute private rights beyond their reach, and among these the Constitution places the rights of property."

On page 454 we find this gem of the sociologic insight of the New York Court of Appeals:

"The Constitution surrounds liquor as property, with the same inviolability as any other species of property. There can be no room, I think, for difference of opinion as to the meaning of the phrase "due process of law," as used in the Constitution. It means an ordinary judicial proceeding. * * * It is not pretended, nor can it be, that property which is not per se a nuisance can be annihilated by force of a statute alone, or by a proceeding in rem for the punishment of a personal offense. Liquor is not a nuisance per se, nor can it be made so by a simple legislative declaration."

This venerable decision of March, 1856, was not regarded as law by the Supreme Court, which, in the Mugler case (123 U. S., 623), Harlan, J., writing, said:

"The entire scheme of prohibition as embodied in the constitution and laws of Kansas might fail if the right of each citizen to manufacture intoxicating liquors for his own use or as a beverage were recognized. Such a right does not inhere in citizenship."

And so there may be enough sociologic insight in the Supreme Court to see to it that due process of law does not require us to bound, perpetually, by what the Kansas Supreme Court has aptly termed "with the discredited common-law manacles." (Caspar v. Lewin et al., 109 Pac., 667.)

Again, there is the same power in Congress to change the rules of the incidence of loss as there is in State legislatures to change the rules of property. On this point Soper v. Lawrence Bros. Co. (201 U. S., 367, 368) is instructive. There Holmes, J., said:

"The distinction between trespass and disseizin may be modified by statute as properly as it may be established by common law. Also statutes of limitations may be passed where formerly there were none. So far as the fourteenth amendment is concerned, there is nothing to hinder a State from enacting that in future the doing of such overt acts of ownership as are possible on wild land * * * shall bar an action for the land."

The fourteenth amendment goes no further than the fifth amendment limits the Congress, and thus the changing of the rule of incidence of loss is merely a legislative question.

The civil-rights cases (109 U. S., 3) do not negative the right of Congress to pass legislation of a character such as is proposed here. In that line of cases the Supreme Court held that the primary object of those cases was to contract that what the States had a sole or subsidiary power to do, viz, to regulate the conduct of their citizens, and that the thirteenth and fourteenth amendments were not intended to oust them of that right. But here a new relation has been created in respect of the Federal control of master and servant, where the paramount authority of Congress makes the rule and where therefore the State legislation heretofore enacted for the protection of the servants is ousted by Federal legislation. In such circumstances there must be the same power of Congress as have the States, to award new remedies under the fourteenth amendment. And the two amendments, the fifth and the fourteenth, must be reconciled.

But, it is urged, a compensation act does not require a suit at law; it aims at ousting the courts of their functions.

It has been held in Hammond Packing Co. v. Arkansas (212 U. S., 559):

"We must trace the power to its true source, and if, from doing so, it results that the authority exerted flows from a reservoir of unquestioned power, it must follow that the action below was not unlawful, albeit in some narrower aspect that action might be considered as unlawful. The essential basis for the exercise of power, and not a mere incidental result arising from its exertion, is the criterion by which its validity is to be measured (per White, jr.)."

In other words, the source of power, not the incidental use of it, determines its constitutionality.

If there is power in Congress of obliterating one defense after another, as has been enacted by the eighth section of the safety appliance act (originally drafted by Senator White, of Louisiana, now Chief Justice), whereby assumption of risk was removed in those cases, and in the new employers' liability acts, approved April 2, 1908, and April 5, 1910, Congress may deprive the carriers of any defenses, based on a standard, objectionable to public policy, "held by the prevailing morality or strong and preponderant opinion to be greatly and immediately necessary to the public welfare" (Noble State Bank case, 219 U. S., 104), so long as the carriers are given a right to a judicial or administrative hearing. (Hurtado case, 110 U. S., 516.)
